TEMPERING THE DISPOSITION.

Steel is tempered by heat and cold. People's dispositions are tempered by the experiences of life. But there is this important difference: steel acts uniformly and the result can be foretold, whereas people, possessing volition, determine for themselves how they will be affected, and respond variously to the incitements of experience, so that the result is always in doubt. Under the same conditions some dispositions grow sweet and genial; others, bitter and morose. These changes are a work of time, but the process is going on daily, and it is well to know how it is done.

How to Grow Sour and Surly.

Look for the evil element in people and their doings. No one is without defect and no action is perfect. Look constantly for people's faults and try to imagine a bad motive for their conduct. In all things try to find something to complain about, and you will in the course of time find your temper bad enough. Your friends won't enjoy it and you will loathe yourself, but you can blame nobody but yourself, for under the same conditions you might have grown into the opposite disposition.

How to Become Sweet and Kind.

1. Cultivate a thankful spirit. Every hour, every moment, brings its blessings. Think of the good and overlook the evil and be grateful for the good. Behind the passing cloud of ills there is the enduring blue sky of God's pure goodness. Don't forget that, the everlasting goodness of God, and your own unworthiness. Then don't fail to appreciat the goodness of men. There is some good in them all. Look for it and be glad that you can find it.

2. Pray for people you know and people you casually meet. See in them what Christ saw when he consented to die for them. This will awaken a kindly feeling toward even the most degraded man or woman. Be a brother to every one, losing sight of the accidental difference in view of the spiritual affinities. How superficial and unimportant are differences of dress and manners and speech in comparison with the profound moral likenesses of men! Toward all you may feel fraternal if only you will see the brother in them.

3. Look on the bright side and be hopeful. Darkness will pass away, and enduring light will come. Believe it and be cheerful. God is at work for the betterment of the world. Christ came and projected into the world's life his mighty influence. The Holy Spirit of God is operating in the hearts of men. All good men and women are banded together for the banishment of evil. Have faith in the forces that make for righteousness, join yourself to them, and your positive attitude will help to make you hopeful and happy.

Don't be a miserable, complaining failure of a man or a woman when you can just as easily and with infinitely more satisfaction be a thankful, hopeful, happy, earnest child of the King.

TEN GREATEST INVENTIONS OF OUR TIME.

The Scientific American recently offered a number of prizes for essays on the ten greatest modern inventions. The first prize was won by William I. Wyman, of Washington, D. C. He selects the following as the ten greatest inventions of the last twenty-five years and gives his reasons for so estimating them: (1) Electric furnace, 1889; (2) steam turbine, 1894; (3) gasoline automobile, 1890; (4) moving pictures, 1893; (5) wireless telegraphy, 1900; (6) aeroplane, 1906; (7) cyanide process, 1890; (8) linotype machine, 1890; (9) induction motor, 1890; (10) electric welding, 1889.

—Rev. W. E. Swain preached in Henderson last Sunday, Rev. J. D. Williams remaining in Greensboro to preach in Grace Church, whose special meeting continued till Sunday night.

—The editor of the Herald met Bro. Swain's morning appointment at Hebron and Bro. Fogleman filled his night appointment in Mebane.

—We found at Hebron a live Sunday-school with Bro. Lytle McAdams as superintendent, and a good congregation of attentive hearers in the church service. The Sunday school had had its annual picnic on Saturday and Mrs. Swain had gone out to be present. She was in the congregation Sunday morning.

We are indebted to Bro. Fogleman for kindly taking us out to Hebron on Sunday and to Bro. John Nicholson, Sr., and his son Albert and the latter's wife for entertainment in their home. It is very interesting to hear the elder Nicholson tell of events of long ago. He is now eighty years old, but stands erect, walks in preference to riding, reads without glasses, takes contracts to superintend large building operations, and is preparing to resume the manufacture of chairs left off sixty years ago. He was a soldier in the Civil War, was taken prisoner and held for more than a year in the prison at Elmira, New York, where he supported his family (at that time a wife and four little children) though he received only ten cents a day for his work in the prison. But he was resourceful and pieced out his salary in various ways. He received an allowance of tobacco, but he did not use tobacco, and so sold his portion. He also bought and sold finger rings made by some of the prisoners. In these and other ways he managed to keep the wolf from the door of his home in Orange county, N. C. One day want seemed to stare them in the face; his wife wrote a letter saying that there was not a thing left in the house to eat, but that same day a man came bringing a wagon load of provisions provided by the far-away imprisoned husband. The prison fare was insufficient to keep away hunger and some were seen to drink the dish water from the kitchens. The supply of tobacco also was too small for some who made it a practice to search the grounds for chews of tobacco that had been chewed and thrown away. They would gather these up, wash them and dry them and chew them again! More pleasing is it to hear him tell the history of Hebron church, which, like most churches, has come up against odds and overcome its difficulties by the faith and earnest, self-sacrificing toil of a few heroic souls.

THOMAS JEFFERSON'S GREAT MISTAKE.

By W. A. Harper, President of Elon College.

Jefferson Aimed at a New Type of Education.

Thomas Jefferson was not only the author of the Declaration of Independence, but the founder of the University of Virginia, and in this latter accomplishment he took an even greater pride than in the former. Jefferson had been educated in France and the free-thought philosophy which then infected French education fastened its tentacles upon his mind. He believed in freedom and realizing that all the institutions of higher learning in his country were controlled by the church, he felt that religious thought could not be free unless religious control were in some way removed from the colleges and universities. He therefore founded the University of Virginia with this distinct aim in view, believing that a new type of Christian man would result in this atmosphere of religious freedom.

And the People Took on to It.

Since his day the various States have been establishing their universities, technical schools, normal schools, all based upon the same philosophy and all inspired with the same purpose. The public school system in its primary, secondary, and high school grades is directed to the same end. The people did not object to the expenditure of their money on these enterprises, because they believed in freedom in politics and tolerance in religion, and inherently felt that church and state should be separated. We believe the same, but experience has taught us certain facts in respect to the matter which they did not perceive. For they did not realize that in accepting Jefferson's doctrine they were cutting off the possibility of religious instruction for their children and opening up the way for the sure entrance of instruction inimical to the very existence of the religious life. But they were. The thing was insidiously done, done with the hilarious acclamations of praise of the citizens, who were charmed with that sweet-sounding word, freedom, but it was done, nevertheless.

But They Got What They Had not Planned for.

President Van Hise, of the University of Wisconsin, says: "Religious instruction in the University of Wisconsin is impossible under the State Constitution." It is presumably so in all the States. Not only do these institutions not offer courses in the Bible, but they even refuse credit for such courses, when taken in Christian colleges, when the graduates of such colleges come to them for graduate study. So that it is not a case of religious freedom, but of freedom from religion, that we find in our State institutions of higher learning. Do not misunderstand me. I am not saying that all the teachers in such institutions are irreligious. I know many men and women in them who are devout Christians, but some of them are irreligious and, though I regret to say it, not all are able to be freed from the charge of dissoluteness. The State institution, whose cementing bond is patriotism, can make of religion only an incident. In order for spiritual life to ripen in its fulness, the very atmosphere environing the young must be tense with religious sentiment. It is not so much the lack of religious instruction in the State institution as the absence of the religious atmosphere that unfits for developing the noblest type of Christian manhood.

Jefferson's Educational Aim Impossible and Inconsistent.

The trouble with Jefferson's aim is that it cannot be realized, and as wise a man as he should have known it. He was the advocate of civil liberty, but he gave the man no exercise of the rights of suffrage till he should be twenty-one years of age, and denied to adult individuals coming from foreign lands the rights of citizenship till they had met with the conditions of naturalization. These two provisions of our fundamental law argue and that, too, rightly that preparation is necessary for the profitable enjoyment of civil liberty. Jefferson knew the folly of granting the suffrage to boys and immature young men and to adults reared in an atmosphere not conducive to training for free suffrage, and if he did not know, the supreme folly of negro suffrage has since taught us the lesson. Seeing with such unerring accuracy the unconditional necessity for a long apprenticeship before the privileges of civil freedom could be profitably invested in men, how could Jefferson with such blindness confer the privileges of religious freedom on persons immature and untrained for it? The inconsistency is inexplicable and the consequences of it alarming in extent and in spiritual poverty.

Its Consequences Deplorable.

In the public schools of many States, for example, the Bible cannot be read nor prayer offered. In many others it can be read, but no explanation offered or prayer made. But there is no law against teaching things inimical to the Bible, and teachers have been frequently known to go out of their way to criticise the Bible and the church, nor have the Christian people any redress against this paralyzing condition. In seeking for a false liberty in religion, we have given up what religious instruction we had in our public schools. That is serious enough, but that is not the worst of it. We have not only given up our right to have our children instructed religiously, but we have acquired the chance of having them instructed irreligiously. It is true that the home and Sunday school and other church auxiliaries can counteract the irreligious tendency in our public schools, but does it and ought it to have it to do? And how are we to correct it in the institutions of higher learning, with the home influence removed? When we pay our money for education, have we not the right to say what kind of education it shall be? But we have forfeited that right, if we wish religious instruction, because the courts have frequently held that the Bible is a sectarian book and its teachings are sectarian and therefore cannot be given in the public school system, whether of the secondary or of the higher order. And yet we repeat, there is no court that has yet forbidden any teacher in these schools to find flaws in the Bible. We have sold our religious birthright for a mess of liberty-seasoned pottage.

Blind Leaders of the Blind.

The National Educational Association gives large space in its annual programs to problems of school and college administration, to technical education, to vocational training, to the futility of classical education, to the study of child nature, to the problems of adolescence, but is silent in respect to the need of religious instruction. This association is our highest educational body. It is representative of the educational thought of the day. And in that thought there is no space for the consideration of religious instruction. Not only do we not have this instruction, but we do not even realize that we need it. Truly do the educational leaders of our day need to see a great light and they can find it in the simple language of Holy Writ in many places, but nowhere more plainly stated than in Proverbs 22: 6: "Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old, he will not depart from it." And we all need to realize that "whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

Frank Acknowledgment of Incapacity.

But the States have not only established their public schools and rounded out the educational system with their institutions of higher learning and their technical and normal schools, they have gone further and introduced an economic reason for patronizing these institutions by granting free tuition to all who will fulfill certain trivial conditions. This is a frank acknowledgment of their inability to secure patronage in open competition and so they take the money out of your pocket and mine to pay it. And many are decoyed by this practice into sending their children, who would much prefer the spiritual environment of the church college. A little investigation, however, will show that, even with free tuition, education in them will cost more than in the church college, where the life is simple and the demand for extras reduced to a vanishing point. And further the State frequently discriminates against graduates of church institutions in favor of the graduates of its own schools in the matter of certification of teachers—another frank admission of their inability to secure patronage under normal conditions of open, free, fair competition.

Behold a New Educational Power—Carnegie's Money!

But this is not all. For recently there has appeared on the educational horizon a spectacle not before seen in the world's history—the spectacle of a man immensely rich buying the church colleges and universities away from their allegiance to the bodies creating and so far supporting them, through offers of retiring allowances for their decrepid teachers and other good and valuable considerations. And last year thirty-three colleges and five universities were false to the pledges given in their foundation in order to dwell in the tents of the wicked, and I use this word wicked advisedly, because an ancient commandment, if I mistake not, enjoins upon honorable people not to steal. One of the most disreputable things that have happened recently in the educational world was the attempt of this same man to wrest from the Methodist Church the control of the Medical Department of Vanderbilt University by the offer of a large sum of money made through steel, and the bishops of that Church in a published statement with due severity properly characterized him as "an agnostic steel monger," making an "impudent proposal," which is "not so much a donation as an attempt to denature the institution."

Higher Education Impossible Without Bias for or against the Church.

But to return to our original statement that Mr. Jefferson's aim of education for the young with religious freedom is impossible of realization, we have to remark first that it is impossible to teach literature, science, philosophy, history, social science, pedagogy, psychology, ethics, and kindred branches, all of which find liberal space in the curricula of both State and church colleges, without taking position for or against the Christian religion.

In the Christian college it is always for the Christian religion. In the State college and in the so-called free colleges it is sometimes for the Christian religion. Last year Columbia University, one of your free colleges, out of a graduating class of more than 500, had only one professing Christian. Elon, in twenty-four years, has graduated but one who was not a member of some evangelical church. It is evident, then, that we are not talking theory when we say that these branches of learning are so interwoven with Christian thought and life that there is absolutely no escape from making them tell tremendously in favor of the church or with equal power against it. It is, therefore, a matter of religion or irreligion, of religious or irreligious instruction, in our institutions of higher learning. It cannot be non-religion, because there is no midway ground. Did not the Master Himself say: "He who is not for me is against me?" It is simply a question of which kind of instruction Christian parents desire for their children, and Mr. Jefferson's dream, based on the infidel philosophy of France in his college days, cannot make it otherwise in its consequences—consequences freighted with life or death to the soul.

Because Religion Touches Life at Every Point.

One other fatal error of the Jeffersonian educational aim is embodied in its conception of religion as a separate department of life. But religion is no such thing. It is not a matter to be put on or off at will, but a spirit that enters into every department of life and is an ever-present force or it is nothing. It cannot be left at home when you go off to college and taken up when you return home. It is an abiding presence, giving its color to every act and thought of life, and nothing else can take its place without direful consequences to the spiritual man. The human heart demands religion all the time and must have it, or the life will not be full-orbed. Nor can the religious life be well-rounded unless the atmosphere of its daily duties is tense with spiritual power. It will not do to lug religion in from the outside, thus making it a secondary rather than a primary matter, but this is the best that can be done for it in the State school. If the State cannot provide this essential ingredient of life through its educational institutions, and experience has shown that it does not and the courts declare that it cannot, would it not be economy for these citizens of the State to see to it that the State hand over the business of education to the church schools which can and do supply that spiritual culture so needful for the proper ripening and fruiting of the life in Christian character?

Shall We Follow This False Educational Aim?

We of the South have followed Mr. Jefferson a long way in politics and in education. We must not let our veneration for him as a great political prophet blind our estimate of his failure as a religious leader. We do not impugn to him improper motives. His aim was high and his purpose holy, but it simply could not be realized, and I have an idea that were Jefferson living to-day he would be pleading for the Bible in the public schools, in the secondary grades, and for religious instruction, not sectarian, in the State institutions of higher learning, in both of which he believed, but which experience has taught us cannot be realized and the courts have shown to be inconsistent with the genius of our government. You call this religious toleration gone to seed, and I agree with you. I go further and declare it a false toleration, the consequences of which Mr. Jefferson either did not or could not foresee. But we see them and it is entirely within our power to escape them, if we will.

Education Must be either Christian or Un-Christian—It Cannot be Non-Christian.

Enough has been said to make the issue plain. Our education is to be Christian or un-Christian. It cannot be non-Christian. I cannot believe the State school will ever go out of the business of education. I am sure the church school is here to stay. My appeal is therefore to Christian parents to weigh this matter well. They can give their children either a Christian or un-Christian education. It is with them to say which it shall be. By the grace of God many who go to the State institutions come away Christian men and women, in spite of the lack of, and not because of the presence of positive Christian example and teaching—but what of those who do not so come away? The element of risk, irreparable risk, is inherent in each case. You must be satisfied in your own mind that you can take it in the case of your children. I have no more to say. It is your matter. But remember that a remedy that kills more than it cures is a poor one and further remember that the chances are always with the majority. Therefore, as for me and my house, like Joshua of old, we will serve the Lord in education as in missions and as in all other relations of this life to His Kingdom.

NOTICE.

I have placed all ministers, preachers and delegates whose names I have in hand. Several delegates have not been reported to me.

As you will observe I have made two new committees that I consider important; Church Extension and Superannuates, and I have placed men on these committees who I am sure are interested in this line of work, and if the Conference does not rule the composing of these committees out I am expecting to hear something that will do us all good.

You will see I have asked the editor of the M. P. Herald to speak to the Conference in the interest of the paper.

FROM OUR PASTORS

Brown Summmit.

I filled our appointment at Brown Summit last Sunday at 3 o'clock, which was our last appointment this Conference year. All finances fully met. On the fourth Sunday at 11 a. m. we received Miss Nora Carpenter into the church on certificate. We appreciate the kindness of Mrs. E. H. Flagge, while in Greensboro last week, in sending us 25 pounds of sugar. Our pastorate with these people has been very pleasant. Fraternally,

G. F. Millaway.

Orange Ct.

We held a circuit rally for our Sunday schools at Efland church last Sunday, Nov. 2d. We had a fine day. The attendance was good, but not as large as we expected. Mr. J. Norman Wills came down from Greensboro and gave us two excellent addresses, and two "talks" that were instructive. We deeply appreciate his being with us that day and will be glad to have him with us again.

We expect to hold another S. S. rally at Chestnut Ridge next Sunday. Dr. T. C. Amick and Dr. J. P. Lawrence of Elon College are to be with us that day and give us some addresses. We are looking forward for a large attendance and a good time that day. All denominations are invited.

We expect to put all the churches on Orange Circuit on the Honor Roll this year as paid in full—we hope not to be disappointed.

This charge has made many improvements and done a good work this year, but we will not use the space to tell about it at this time.

R. C. Stubbins, Pastor.

Nov. 2.

Albemarle Ct.

I don't know whether you want to know what Albemarle circuit is doing or not. However that may be, I venture a short report of what is being done down here in the east.

Since the last report from this work we have tried to have two meetings. At Rehoboth we were rained out after three days preaching. At Mt. Hermon the weather and the "busy times" with the farmers was against us. Bro. Chas. J. Edwards was the pastor's help. He did all the preaching at both places. The results of the meetings were far from what we should have liked. As far as I know there was only one profession at the two meetings. Of course I am aware of the fact that we do not see all of the good that is accomplished when God's word is faithfully preached. Bro. Edwards certainly did what he could. And if the word preached did not profit them who heard it the cause was beyond the control of the preachers.

The fourth quarterly conference met at the Creswell church on Sat., Nov. 1, at 11 A. M. The usual business was transacted. The financial report looks encouraging. Mt. Elma church has paid every cent of all claims. The other churches are so near paid out that I am now sure of sending a clear report to the Annual Conference. What do you think of that? Besides raising the pastor's salary and paying the conference assessments the circuit has raised $153.80 for painting, for lamps, repairs, for pulpit help, etc. By the end of this conference year the circuit will have raised for all purposes not less than $645. That is not so bad, and that all done in six months, is it? And the good part about it is that everybody who helped to do it is happy over the result. "'Where there is a will there is a way" is as true in church affairs as in other things. Try it and see for yourself.

Just a word about Church Union. I hesitate to say even this little word, because I am not fully persuaded in my mind either way. If union with the United Brethren in Christ is for the glory of God then by all means let that union be consummated as speedily as is consistent with good reason and sound judgment. For my own part I am glad for the trend toward closer Christian unity among the different denominations. God speed the day when denominational strife shall give place to a united effort on the part of all churches for the salvation of the world.

However, I fail to find from the Bible or from reason that organic union, to the extent as advocated by some, is the thing most needed. As long as human temperaments, ideas, and interpretations differ—in short, as long as men are men, thinking for themselves, there will be different ecclesiastical as well as different civil governments. This is my opinion, be it worth what it may.

Linley W. Gerringer.

Creswell, N. C., Nov 1.

Asheville.

Before this appears in print, the concrete foundation for the church will have been completed, unless something unforeseen stops the progress of the work. The concrete part of the foundation only goes to ground level. From there to the sills, the foundation will be of brick.

Last Friday night, while the ghosts were preparing to come forth for their annual revelry, our Juniors were having a good time at the home of Mrs. Miller. The admission fee was a potato for each year of the guest's life. The total number of birthdays of those present totaled up to about two bushels of potatoes. The potatoes have been sold, and the money realized will go into the building fund.

The ladies of the church held a little sale in one of the store windows on the Square on Saturday. They cleared $7.25. This will be applied on the balance due on the parsonage furniture. The ladies will have another sale this Saturday when they hope to complete the amount they need to complete the furniture fund.

Yesterday was a good day with us. We had one new member unite with the church, and added three new scholars to the Sunday school roll. A number of strangers worshiped with us.

The canvass for funds is progressing nicely. I desire to make special mention of one item in the financial report this week, that of Mrs. M. A. Brown. Mrs. Brown lives in Hendersonville. A week or more ago, pledge cards were sent to Col. S. V. Pickens with the request that he try to get his friends to help us. The check sent us by Mrs. Brown is the result, and shows Col. Pickens' interest in our work here. We very greatly appreciate it. C. W. B.

Reidsville.

The fourth quarterly conference was held here today, Oct. 31. Each church represented, but not what we expected, and not as many as had thought of coming. Bethany has paid every claim. Sandy Cross all of pastor's claim and intend to pay all. Reidsville I think will pay all. The salary was assessed at $500, and they elected Bros. Geo. D. Williams, T. F. Humphrey and J. A. Gunn as parsonage trustees. They decided to buy the house and lot at $1,500, and the trade has been closed. This with the advance of pastor's salary will make a hard effort for them, but it shows they mean to move forward. They ask the Church Extension Board for $250 on the pastor's salary. I do hope this will meet the approval of those concerned. The conference worked as harmoniously as any I was ever in. After the reading of the minutes I excused myself and left Bro. J. F. Dixon to dismiss after they had consulted as to their wish for their pastor next year, and I can't say as to whom they instructed for. Now with the churches as they now stand, the salary promised, a parsonage to live in, a good six-room nearly new house, splendid neighborhood, and a good kind people to serve, I can truthfully say I am glad I came to Reidsville.

C. E. M. Raper.

High Point.

We have just closed a rather remarkable meeting in High Point. Nine of the churches here united in this special effort, and the meetings continued for two weeks.

It was a quiet, and yet most splendid revival of religion throughout the city. It is difficult to get at the number of confessions of faith in Christ, but as a result of the meetings 130 have already joined the churches here, and we trust many more will follow.

In our own church Rev. W. F. Ashburn was the pulpit help, and he did most splendid preaching. Our people and the people of other denominations were well pleased with his preaching. He preached twice in Washington St. M. E. Church, and twice in the First Baptist Church while here. Our people learned to love Bro. Ashburn, and will be glad to have him come again. Our church was strengthened by the meeting. Some sixteen or seventeen professed faith in Christ, and ten joined the church last Sunday. We are hoping others will join next Sunday. Up to date we have received just 30 members into the church here during this conference year. We have received into the church here during a pastorate of five years 154 members, with a net gain of about 110.

We have a faithful, loyal people to serve, and with their cooperation, and with the blessings of the Lord, the work moves forward with some degree of success. To the dear Father be all the praise. In His name, A. G. Dixon.

High Point, Nov. 3.

Forsyth Ct.

Our 4th quarterly conference will be held in the new parsonage at Rural Hall on next Saturday at 1:30 P. M.

We have our new parsonage almost ready for the parson. However, it is not painted yet, nor is the stable built; but this too will soon be done.

Bro. R. M. Cox will represent this work in our next Annual Conference. Bro. E. F. Kiger is the alternate delegate.

We are now holding a few days' evangelistic services at King. Bro. Lassiter is our pulpit help. I trust that we shall have a good meeting.

It is at King that we hope to build an M. P. church soon. As yet, we have not been able to begin work. But surely there is an opportunity for us here and a need of an M. P. church.

A. O. Lindley.

Attention, North Carolina Pastors.

I am planning to attend your conference at High Point, and will bring a large display of books etc. If any desire some special books, kindly write me at once and I will be glad to include the same. Owing to the Christmas rush which will be on at the time your conference convenes, I will not be able to stay longer than Saturday. Kindly plan to transact all business with me as soon as possible, which will be greatly appreciated. Chas. Reiner, Jr.

Those wishing to be examined in Logic at the coming Conference will please inform the undersigned of the fact as soon as possible. J. F. McCulloch.

THE BEST THANKSGIVING EVER.

From every source come reports of abundant crops. Even those sections which have suffered for the past two years are now able to rejoice in a bountiful harvest.

Such abundant blessings call for a better method of giving thanks than we have employed heretofore. The idea of an over-loaded table, at which one eats far beyond the bounds of prudence, rendering himself sluggish, or, perhaps, bringing on a fit of indigestion, is not a suitable one for Thanksgiving. Yet, to many of us Thanksgiving meaus self-indulgence, instead of gratitude to God, expressed in praise to Him, and in acts of helpfulness to the needy and unfortunate.

The best Thanksgiving demands the best way of observing it. Chairman Millikan, of the Board of Trustees of our Children's Home, has a suggestion to offer which we would do well to heed. That is, that each one give one day's income, wages or profits, to the Children's Home. The children are now comfortably housed in a splendid building near High Point. Friends and neighbors will see that they have a joyous Thanksgiving, no doubt. Let us make sure of our part in that Thanksgiving, by making the suggested contribution.

Surely we cannot be properly grateful for our own blessings, if we fail to take account of the helpless little ones who are dependent upon us for shelter, food and clothing. J. Norman Wills.

TO EVERY FRIEND OF THE CHURCH IN ————.

So many of our citizens are non-church goers or irregular attendants that I feel moved to write a few plain words on this important subject. I cannot believe our non-church going friends fully realize how displeasing to God, how disloyal to the church community and how hurtful to themselves this negligent church attitude must be. If these plain words shall but set sensible men to serious thinking I shall feel thankful.

Jesus loved the church and gave himself for it. Ought we not then to love the church, for which Jesus died, well enough to attend its services, unite with its people and help to support it? I am sometimes asked, "Can't a man be a Christian here and get to Heaven at last without going to church?" Yes, if he wants to go to church and cannot, he may get to Heaven, but the man who is glad to find excuses for neglecting public worship is badly deceived if he imagines he wants to get to Heaven.

If Jesus lived in ————, as when on earth he lived in Nazareth, and were I the only preacher here he would attend my church and be a respectful, reverent worshiper. "As his custom was he went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day." Do not the Sunday home stayers in —— need to worship God? Are they too good, or too bad, to go to church? Jesus went to church.

Perhaps all the citizens of ——— are in favor of having churches here. They would hate to live in a community without churches. How long would ——— have churches if all its citizens were as careless about church as some of its citizens are? Is it right, is it fair and honorable—for any citizens to withhold their sympathy and cooperation from the churches in their community whose property values are increased, whose morals are maintained and whose social life is made safe and happy by these very churches? Can an honest, fairminded man permit his neighbors to do all the praying and paying and church work for the common good in which he shares so valuable a part? Can he stay at home because he is ashamed to go and pay nothing, and too stingy to go and pay something—and be an honorable man? I am not here speaking of men and women who cannot pay. Let them come and take freely. The poor man who would but cannot is worth a score of those who could but will not.

People who do not go to church deprive themselves of the richest blessings civilization can give. The songs and prayers ascending to God from reverent, loving hearts; the sermons filled with the sublimest thoughts the preacher has studied out of God's word; the association with the best of people under the best circumstances, and all the inspirations to a better life felt in the worshipful heart —all these blessed influences help to make a church going people better and happier and nobler than those who do not go to church. Individuals, families, communities and nations that love the church and honor the Sabbath are far superior to those that disregard these institutions. Every man in ——— owes it to himself, his family, his community and God to go to church. One great writer says, "The destruction of the church going habit involves the destruction of every thing that may worthily be called mentality and morality." And Daniel Webster says, "There can be no good education without morals; no morals without religion; no religion without public worship."

I feel grieved for the children whose parents do not encourage them to attend the church services and the Sunday-school. It seems to me that these children are robbed of their rights, and I seriously fear that some of them will after awhile bring their parents to grief. Parents who neglect God's house, however moral they may be, are not fully training their children aright. Parents and children need that help for right living the church alone can give. I am sadly aware of the many excuses that even the most ignorant home-stayer can offer for his not going to church. A large proportion of these excuses are falsehoods, pure and simple. Almost all the people can go to church if they want to go; they go to other places, for money, for pleasure, for business, or labor—why not to church? If it could be published that ten dollars in gold would be given to every attendant at every service during our union meeting in the school auditorium, the building would be crowded every time. The poorest man in town would be there with all his family, down to the baby. People would go for the money, and they could go to worship—if they wanted to.

Some families say they are too poor to go to church; they are afraid they would be looked down upon there. I venture to say, every poor family in ——— that goes to church is respected by sensible people, and is respected more than it would be if they stayed away from church. As a general rule, industrious, self-respecting people can dress well enough to go to church, unless they are too proud, and can send their children to Sunday school. If any are too poor, the churches are willing to help them.

Almost all our citizens, even the non-church goers, are expecting the honors of a Christian burial. But I must think that if I refused to go to church while I live I would in my will, disinherit any of my heirs who would carry me to church when I could no longer keep myself away. Preachers are sometimes seriously embarrassed having to preach the funeral of a man in church the very first time the man is there. It is impossible to preach a comforting funeral sermon over an habitual non-church goer.

Let us who go to church encourage our neighbors to go with us. "O come, let us sing unto the Lord; let us make a joyful noise to the Rock of our Salvation. Let us worship and bow down; let us kneel before the Lord, our Maker, for he is our God."

May God's Spirit move the hearts of all our people to attend our union services beginning next Sunday night, and may our citizens become "a people whose God is the Lord."

Respectfully and Fraternally,

T. J. Ogburn.

(The foregoing was used in the form of a circultr letter in Asheboro recently and the attendance on the union services was good and partly attributed to this invitation. We have printed a blank in the place of "Asheboro."—Ed.)

THE BROTHERHOOD.

The idea of the Brotherhood originated in the mind of Bro. J. Norman Wills of Greensboro. The Brotherhood is an organization within the North Carolina Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church. Originally the Brotherhood was composed of the ministers of this Conference, and as many of the laity as could be induced to join it. The purpose of the Brotherhood is to pay the last nurse and medical bills and funeral expenses of its deceased ministerial members, and help their bereaved families across this difficult passage.

The conditions of membership for ministers are application for membership, the payment of an initiation fee of fifty cents, and the obligation to pay three dollars on the death of each member of the Brotherhood.

For some reason not well known to the present Secretary the lay membership of the Brotherhood was dropped a few years ago. Since that time it has been discovered that his action was a mistake, and the Brotherhood has decided to reopen its doors to the laity of our Conference. The conditions of membership for the laity will be application for membership, the obligation to pay one dollar as a minimum and ten dollars as a maximum on the death of each ministerial member of the Brotherhood.

We believe there are many people in our conference district who will be glad of the privilege to contribute from one to ten dollars to help bear the last nurse and medical bills and funeral expenses of the minister who has faithfully given his life to Christ in trying to help others; and in this way do something for the woman who has sacrificed herself and denied herself of almost every earthly pleasure to make it possible for her husband to give himself wholly to the ministry.

Below is a form of application for membership which those who wish to become members of the Brotherhood will please sign on the line opposite the sum they obligate themselves to pay on the death of a ministerial member of the Brotherhood, and inclose in a letter and send to the Sec., J. A. Burgess, Henderson, 343 Andrew's Ave., N. C.

Form of Application.

I desire to become a non-beneficiary member of the Brotherhood of the North Carolina Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church. On the death of a ministerial member of the Brotherhood I obligate myself to contribute to his medical and nurse bills, burial expenses and the support of his family the amount opposite my name:

THE TREE OF LIFE.

There is an old legend, which, in days long agone, formed the subject of many a mosaic in cathedral nave, of many a stained-glass window in ancient fane. It tells of how the twisted, rugged tree on which Christ Jesus died came out of the Garden of Eden. The story goes that after Adam had been driven from Paradise he fell grievously sick, and dispatched his son Seth to the Angel with the Flaming Sword, who kept the Gate, craving readmittance to the Garden in order to obtain a medicinal herb which Adam knew grew in one corner of Eden. The request was refused, but the Angel of the Sword said to Seth, "Thy father shall surely recover. This time he shall live and not die. But when his full tale of years shall have been lived out and he goes the way that all flesh must follow, plant these two seeds which I give you —they are from the Tree of Life in the center of the Garden—on thy father's grave. What shall spring therefrom shall be for the saving of the world."

In due time the father of all the living died; and Seth did as the Angel of the Flaming Sword had commanded. He planted the seeds, and upon the grave of Adam sprang up a spreading tree. Out of its branches Moses cut the rod of Aaron that budded. Under it David sat and mourned for his sins. King Solomon, regarding it as a sacred and precious tree, had it hewn down, in order to have it used in building the House of the Lord. Its timber proved so hard, however, as to be practically unworkable, and the trunk of the tree was flung by the workmen, who had failed to make something of beauty out of it, into the bottom of a stagnant pool. The waters of this foul pond not only cleared, but became known throughout the land as the Pool of Healing, the virtue of the waters springing from the log of Adam's tree, lying hidden away in the bottom of the pool. In the days of Jesus of Nazareth the waters dried up, and for years the tree lay in the hollow where the Pool of Healing had once been. And when in the fulness of time Christ Jesus must needs suffer for the redemption of the race, the tree that once had grown on Adam's grave, the seeds of which came out of the Tree of Lofe in the center of Eden, was taken from the hollow of the dried-up pool, and out of it was fashioned the cross on which the Savior died.

"Only an old legend," say you? Assuredly—but one pregnant with the highest, the most glorious truth. The Tree of Death—of Calvary—is the Tree of Life, and the fruit of its branches is for the healing of nations, for the salvation of the race. It flings its shadows across life's dusty highways, and weary, foot-sore travelers drag themselves within the restfulness of its sheltering shadows. Some, like Bunyan's Pilgrim, are sorely burdened, most are sorrow-stricken, many pierced with poignant pain. Yet none who, in their hour of dire need, turn to the solace of the Spreading Tree of Calvary ever fail to be gladdened, rested, refreshed, made glad.

I am told that the eucalyptus tree is, when growing, such a powerful microbicide that no sort of bacteria can possibly exist within the radius of its germ-destroying properties. It is even so with the Tree of Calvary—the Cross of Jesus. It exerts and exudes a sin-destroying virtue. Beneath its crimson shadows the sons of Adam rest secure. They sit down under its shadow with great delight and its fruit is sweet unto their taste.—Presbyterian Banner.

HIS LAMP AM I.

His lamp am I,
To shine where He shall say;
And lamps are not for sunny rooms
Nor for the light of day.
But for the dark places of the earth,
Where shame and wrong and crime have birth,
Or the murky twilight gray,
Where the wandering sheep have gone astray;
Or where the light of faith grows dim
And souls are groping after Him.
And as sometimes a flame we find,
Clear-shining through the night,
So bright we do not see the lamp,
But only see the light,
So may I shine—His life the flame—
That men may glorify His name.

FROM LOCAL REPORTERS

Albemarle, Stanley Circuit.

Our revival closed Sunday night. Bro. D. A. Braswell did all the preaching, and it seemed to me that it was the best preaching that I ever heard. There were no converts, but the good that was done we cannot tell. We know that God was in the services, for we felt His presence. Sunday afternoon we had an experience meeting, and when our good fathers and mothers began to tell how much they love God and what He has done for them the tears began to flow, and I think every person in the church rejoiced. And then the young people began to rise and thank the Lord for what He had done for them, some that had never spoken in public before.

We were sorry that our pastor could not be with us in the meeting. We know that his prayers were with us. May God bless him and his precious family.

Please pray for Bro. Braswell's health that he may do his work. We want to thank him for the great work he did here. Pray for our little band at Albemarle that we may be faithful.

Our fourth quarterly conference was held at Friendship last Sat. We had a large attendance and much important business, and it seemed that everything worked for good. J. E. Gantt, Rep.

Burlington.

There were 206 present in our Sunday school last Sunday and $4.26 was the amount of the offering.

Our meeting closed on Friday night of last week. It was the intention of the pastor and the church to continue the meeting through part of this week, but Rev. Mr. Hutton was obliged to return to his work on Sunday, and as the interest on the part of the people did not seem sufficient to justify it, the meeting was closed. While there were not many visible manifestations of interest on the part of the unsaved people, yet there is reason to believe that the real gospel seed sown by the preacher will ultimately bring forth fruit for the Kingdom. Mr. Hutton's sermons received the commendation of all who were so fortunate as to hear him, and they were uplifting and a source of real benefit to the church.

The fourth quarterly conference was held Tuesday night. The Ladies' Aid Society, in a splendid and commendable manner, gave a social hour, the feature of which was a most enjoyable supper, just preceding the session of the quarterly conference. Everything palatable was spread upon an extension of tables, round which about fifty gathered, and, after divine blessing was invoked by the pastor, each one partook of the good things to eat with much enjoyment. The church treasurer's report to the quarterly conference showed that the financial condition of the church is much better than it was last year at this time, and we are very hopeful of sending a report of all claims paid to the Annual Conference. Our delegate to the Annual Conference, Bro. J. D. Payne, notified the quarterly conference that it will be impossible for him to go to Conference, so Bro. G. L. Amick, alternate, will represent our church at Conference.

Miss Flossie A. Byrd, of Greensboro, who is general secretary of the Baraca-Philathea movement in North Carolina, will speak in our church next Sunday morning. She will first address our Sunday school at the Sunday school hour, and speak to an assembled audience of the Baraca and Philathea classes of the town at eleven o'clock. We are expecting a big day in our Sunday school.

Star, Why Not Ct.

Our fourth quarterly conference convened here Saturday, Nov. 1st, with most of the churches represented. Business done in harmony, and everything seemed to be in fairly good condition. Unanimous call for the return of our pastor, if it suits him and the Conference to send him back. He preached us a soul-stirring sermon Sunday to go forward in the Master's work. He also preached at night. We are still hoping to build a church house in the future, but don't see our way yet to build as good a house as we ought to have in this growing town.

Well, wife and I visited the Children's Home Oct. 18th, and it is a grand home, well arranged and convenient in every way. Any M. P. to see it will be proud of it, and to see the crowd of motherless children around the table, just as well behaved and quiet as any family. They show that they are well trained. Bro. Garrett and the boys were out in the field at work, getting things arranged out doors, and the girls doing the house work. Every one seemed to know their place. It is one of the best and most charitable works the M. P. Church has ever taken up. Peter Vuncannon.

We will publish railroad schedule for reaching High Point next week, also a provisionary program for Conference procedure. High Point is on the main line of the Southern R. R., so any one can easily find how to reach here.

Notice to Pastors.

Will each pastor please furnish me the total his work pays this year on all the general interests? Example: Alamance is assessed $270; this includes president, church extension, foreign missions, home missions, superannuate, ministerial education, theological seminary, Bible society, young people, General Conference fund, N. C. Conf. fund. Now if Alamance pays a total for all these of $260, please write on a piece of paper "Alamance, $260," and hand it to me as near the opening of Conference as you can.

This information is very needful for your committee on Ways and Means.

J. H. Bowman, Chmn.

NOTICE.

Nearly all the names of delegates and preachers are in at this writing. We are securing homes for you and trying to get you comfortably placed. Of course we will not provide for you unless we know you are coming. We will endeavor to meet trains, but should we fail to meet you, go direct to the M. P. Church on N. Main St. or phone the pastor.

Yours for service,

High Point, N. C., Nov. 3, 1913.

Dear Editor:

I am a girl at the "M. P. Children's Home." We have a beautiful home, and we feel that it is going to be more beautiful before long. We are trying to make an honest effort to do things that will be pleasing to Mr. and Mrs. Garrett. They certainly are nice and good to us. I feel sure that every one in the Home loves them. The people are all so nice to us. We want to thank them all, and show our appreciation to them for being nice and kind to us. And we would be very glad indeed for the people of our church especially to come and see our Home, and any others that will. We all go to a graded school near here. We have good teachers. We go to High Point to Sunday school. Mr. Dixon is our pastor. He certainly is a good preacher. Mrs. Dixon is so sweet and kind to the children at the Home. She often provides for some one to come out in their cars and carry us to Sunday school. And we want to thank especially Dr. J. R. Reitzel and Capt. A. M. Rankin for sending their cars out for us so often.

The Resurrection of Peter Slewfoot.

Mr. John Judgemall has had his fun preaching the funeral of Peter, but Peter has just returned from his aeroplane flight and is very much alive. It is a fine thing John has had his laugh. He reminds me of the Irishman who laughed for a half hour thinking how he was going to hold the bull's nose to the ground. No sooner than attempted the Irishman found himself on the bull's horns, then on the other side of the fence. "Faith!" said the Irishman, "it was good I had me laugh beforehand." So if John Judgemall hadn't laughed in his imagination while he was preaching Peter's funeral, perhaps he would never have laughed. John doesn't seem to be an expert preaching funerals, anyway; and if he can't do any better preaching the funeral of the dead than he did of the living Peter Slewfoot, it will be hard for his hearers to know just whose funeral he is preaching. Like the minister Peter once heard of, who preached a funeral, and after he was through one of his hearers said he could not tell whose funeral the minister had preached —his wife's, his children's, his mammy's, his grandmammy's or Mr. Glenn Potts' till he finally went round and looked at the corpse. Judgemall says he was appointed to preach Peter's funeral. I do not know whether he was appointed to this task by God or the Devil. Like a holiness preacher I once met who had had the misfortune to get his tent blown down. Soon after the accident Peter happened to meet with him and he said the Lord or the Devil, he did not know which, had torn up his tent, but whichever it was tore it up at a mighty good place, for he sold every yard of it for plant-bed covering.

Judgemall seems to be uncertain about dates; in fact, about everything. He would have a hard time to tell a tow wad from a bullet since he thought our editor shot the gun that killed "poor Peter." The editor and Peter are on the best of terms and Peter felt no fire at all by the editor.

Now Peter has from the beginning stood for the faithful pastor and all others who report things as they are and do not exhaust the whole alphabet in enumerating little articles and giving a great list of names. Sometime ago Peter read an article in the Herald; the reporter went on to report the children's day service at his church and spoke of how well the children did considering the fact that they had had no training; then went on to say we want to thank our good sisters ——— for their faithful efforts in training the children for the occasion. This needs no comment. A wise man, though a fool, could not but see.

Bro. Bethea said the other week that he did not want any more of Peter's soap advertising. Peter is not a soap advertiser. He only went for the fellow who had gotten a few bars of soap and a little soft soap and was either so proud of it or feared he'd not get another that he wrote out a long itemized list of articles and names of donors and sent them to the church paper for a free ad. Beg your pardon, brother, you don't seem to know which was doing the advertising. I am reminded of an incident. A lady became very much offended at a young man for staring at her dressed up in one of the late styles. Let women have their tailors measure from the throat to the ankles and make the garment accordingly. If Bro. Bethea don't want Peter to say anything about soap, why, don't advertise it in our church paper.

Bro. Shelton—didn't he step light?—as if walking on glass. That was a nice report of the pounding your people gave you. Peter enjoyed reading it. But if you had stopped to give us the names of all who contributed a nickel, and I suspect several gave that little, Peter would have skipped.

Now since Peter is not dead, I'll let this suffice for the present. I have enjoyed reading the Herald for the last few months since the enumeration table has been eliminated. Now as many as think Peter has done more harm than good, stick up his head. And those who concur, say amen! Peter Slewfoot.

—Bro. Barber, of Mt. Zion, brought his wife to Greensboro last week to be treated by Dr. Moseley for disorder of the stomach. Bro. Barber also suffers from indigestion, and is a pioneer in the "sand-cure" treatment, having tried it as long as ten years ago.

—A friend has sent us a book printed in 1816. It is John Wesley's translation of Thomas a Kempis' "Imitation of Christ." It was printed by J. C. Totten, of New York.

—Bro. J. G. Rogers, of Burlington, was in Greensboro last week to visit his sister, Mrs. Stafford, who is a patient in St. Leo Hospital.

—Bro. Charles B. Way, of Burlington, came up last Saturday and stood the civil service examination in the postal department.

—In the election on Tuesday Sulzer, the deposed governor of New York, was elected a member of the state legislature from New York City. Tammany's candidate for mayor of New York city was defeated by Mitchell, a fusion candidate. It is thought that New York has elected a Republican legislature. Massachusetts and New Jersey went Democratic.

—The following eight young men are students in Elon College, preparing for the ministry of the M. P. Church: J. H. Trollinger, Jr., C. C. Lindley, J. W. Bowman, W. D. Loy, J. C. Auman, B. M. Williams, H. M. Neese, and J. F. Minnis.

These men seem to be trying their best to make good. Most of them have to work of evenings to help pay their expenses. The writer thinks he expresses the desire of all when he asks the prayers of all our people that these may obtain an education and thus better prepare themselves for the great work of the ministry. AMERICA'S FIRST PUBLIC SCHOOL.

The first public school in America—to be supported by the taxes of the people—was organized in Dorchester, Mass., in 1639. Although there were other schools of earlier date throughout the country, no records remain to show that they were public institutions of learning, maintained by an assessment upon the people.

The words "public" and "free", as applied to schools of this period, had a vastly different meaning from that which they bear today. The income set aside for these pioneer schools was seldom sufficient to defray all the expenses, and so the parents were called upon to furnish fuel and light for the building. The words "public" and "free" merely signified that persons of all classes were privileged to attend, if they were willing to conform to the requirements of the town.

In 1637 the General Court of the colony granted Thompson's Island—situated in Dorchester Bay, half a mile from the shore—to the town of Dorchester. Before that date the island was owned and occupied by David Thompson, who since 1619 had made it the seat of an English trading-post, where he carried on a thriving fur business with the Indians.

After the grant of Thompson's Island to Dorchester, the income from rentals, or assessments on it, was to be used to support a free public school on the mainland. But the islanders were slow in making their payments. At last, on May 20, 1639, the town took legal action against the delinquent taxpayers. It voted to place a tax of twenty pounds on each of the 120 occupants of the island—which, according to the records, "included the principal part of the adult male inhabitants."

The income from the island was sufficient to provide for building a schoolhouse and for the payment of a modest salary to the schoolmaster; but it did not provide for lighting and heating the building, which was probably a log cabin of the most primitive kind. In consequence of this lack of funds for the running expenses of the building, the parents were obliged to furnish "two feet of wood, or two shillings and sixpence, to be delivered to the schoolmaster within a month after the twenty-ninth of September." If these requirements were not met, the parents were promptly notified to remove their children from the "free public school." As late as 1732, fuel and light were supplied by the parents; but after that date the town appropriated an adequate sum for the purpose.

The first schoolhouse was built on what was then known as "Settler's Street," Dorchester, near the corner of the present Cottage and Pleasant streets. It was a one-room affair, poorly constructed; it remained in an unfinished state for some years. Round the building, a clearing was made, and was left destitute of shade-trees. Such a clearing was always made round schoolhouses and meeting-houses, in order that the approach of a hostile Indian or a hungry wolf might be detected. The roof of the school-house barely shielded the children from storms, and the fierce rays of the summer sun.

The master of the school was Rev. Thomas Waterhouse, a graduate of Cambridge University, England. He was, undoubtedly, the first public schoolmaster in America. The town records tell us that Mr. Waterhouse was a very useful man, of a blameless conversation, and especially firm in his non-conformity." His duties were many and arduous. Not only was he obliged to look after the mental welfare of his pupils, but he had to attend to their physical and spiritual needs as well. It it not known just what sum he received for his services, but it is more than likely that one-half his salary consisted of produce, such as corn, barley, potatoes, and fuel.

"From the first day of January to the end of September," ran the regulations, "the master shall—every day— begin school at eight o'clock in the morning, and end at four in the afternoon."

An intermission was granted between eleven and one o'clock—except on Mondays, when he called the pupils together at twelve o'clock "to examine them what they have learned on the Sabbath Day preceding."

These carefully compiled "rules and directions" for this first American institution of learning show great care and excellent management on the part of the city fathers. They were always liberal in giving financial support to the schools Among those who gave generously were John Clapp, Christopher Gibson, Governor Stoughton, and others. Many of them have monuments in the shape of modern school buildings bearing their names and erected to their memory by the city of Boston, of which Dorchester has been a part since 1870.—F. A. Cummings, in Youth's Companion.

—The self-made man stalked into the office of a great financier with whom he had an appointment. HOW SAILOR HELPED.

Sailor was a funny little Rhode Island Red hen. Her mane was given her because she had a peculiar rolling gait, like that of a seaman just in from a long voyage. She looked so comical walking about that everybady who saw her laughed. But Sailor was worth a good deal to the farm, in spite of her awkward gait. When Mr. Bradbury hoed the garden she was always on hand to pick up the worms and grubs that he uncovered. She spent much time in the field where the calves were tied, catching the grasshoppers which flew up as the bossies moved about. When the cowe were being milked she caught many of the flies that annoyed them.

Beatrice and Baby Rob loved Sailor. Father had given her to Beatrice when she was a tiny chicken. When Baby Rob saw her he would laugh and clap his chubby hands and say, "Biddy, Biddy," in his cunning little voice. Sometimes Sailor pecked at the buttons on his shoes to see if they were good to eat, which made him laugh louder than ever.

Early in the summer Aunt Jeannette came to the farm for a visit. Aunt Jeannette was a district nurse in the city. One day the children took her out to see the hens and chickens, and, like every body else, she laughed when she saw Sailor. She laughed, too, at Baby Rob's delight. "You darling," she cried, as she kissed his plump, rosy cheeks, "how I wish my pale little city babies could look like you!"

"Tell us about your city babies, please, Auntie," begged Beatrice. So Aunt Jeannette sat down under a tree, and told about the babies who live in the crowded streets where the houses are so tall and so close together that they shut out the sunshine and the fresh air—where there are no trees, no green fields, no flowers—and especially she told of a pair of tiny twin boys who, she was afraid, would not live through the hot summer for want of good milk and pure air.

While Aunt Jeannette talked, Sailor ran about catching grasshoppers, but now and then she stopped and cocked her head, first on one side, then the other, and uttered sharp little cut-cuts, which might have meant: "I am interested in what you are saying," "What a shame!" "Something must be done about it."

The next day Sailor was not to be seen anywhere. For two days she was gone. No one knew what had become of her. Then she showed up long enough to get a few kernels of corn and some water, and disappeared again. "Don't worry about her," advised father. "Probably she has stolen a nest somewhere." And sure enough! At the end of three weeks Sailor rolled up to the farmhouse followed by ten downy yellow-brown chicks.

"Oh, I wish Aunt Jeannette could see them!" cried Beatrice eagerly. Then her face grew thoughtful. "How much do you suppose I could get for Sailor's chicks if I should sell them, papa?" she asked.

"Want to sell so soon?" laughed father. "Well, well, what do you think of that, Mr. Collins?" he said to a man who had come to the house to buy some milk. "She wants to sell her chicks as soon as they are hatched."

"I want some money for the city babies," explained Beatrice. Then she told what Aunt Jeannette had said about the twins.

"What your aunt says about the city babies is true," said Mr. Collins, whose home was in the city, but who was spending his vacation in a cottage near the Bradbury farm. "Now, if I could hire a little girl to take care of the chickens for me until fall, I would like to buy them and pay in advance. Would a dollar apiece be enough?" he asked smilingly.

"That would be ten dollars!" cried Beatrice, clapping her hands.

"That's much more than the chickens are worth, Mr. Collins," said father.

"Chicks that are going to save babies are worth a good price," said Mr. Collins, earnestly.

Two days later there came a letter from Aunt Jeannette. "Dear Beatrice and Sailor," it said, "your money for the babies came today, and we thank you very much. We shall use it for the twins. Their mother is a brave little woman. She has worked hard and needs the fresh air as much as the babies do. We are going to try to get them all into a fresh-air home for a week or two."

That evening after Beatrice and Baby Rob had gone to bed, father and mother sat down for a quiet talk. "Beatrice and Sailor have done their part," said mother. "I have been wondering if we cannot do ours by having the mother and twins with us on the farm for two weeks."

"That would be fine, if you feel able to do the extra work," answered father. "Beatrice and Rob would enjoy it, I know."

"From what Jeannette has said, I am sure the mother will not make much extra work. She will do her part," mother replied. "We will live out of doors as much as possible, and it will do us all good. I will write to Jeannette tonight."

So the tired mother and the baby boys came out to the farm, and such a happy fortnight as they had. "It was Sailor who got you out here," explained Beatrice, when the little red hen came into view with her brood.

"Yes, Sailor and an unselfish little girl," added father.

And the babies laughed and crowed their thanks.—Ida Blaisdell Tibbetts in Zion's Herald.

AN INTERESTING PUZZLE.

This puzzle has appeared in the papers off and on for a long time, but it is new to one of our readers, and he has sent it to see if any of the Herald readers can explain it. It can be explained and some of our readers have we presume read the explanation. We will give a small prize to the youngest reader that studies out the explanation and mails it to us by Nov. 15. Here is the puzzle:

Take a piece of paper eight inches square. It will of course contain eight times eight or sixty-four square inches. Now cut off a strip three inches wide from one side, then cut this strip along a diagonal into two triangles. Then cut the wider strip obliquely across so that one edge will be five inches and the opposite one will be three inches. You will then have two equal trapezoids and two equal triangles. Put a trapezoid and a triangle together so as to make a triangle with a base five inches and an altitude thirteen inches. Do this with the other two figures, then place the two triangles thus formed together so as to make a rectangle five inhees by thirteen inches and containing five times thirteen or sixty-five square inches. The puzzle is that a piece of paper that in the beginning covered only 64 inches of the table now seems to cover 65 inches.

All can compete that are willing to Any one can compete from the oldest to the youngest, but the prize goes to the youngest.

THE MOTHER'S HOPE.

She took me in her lap.

"Look into your mother's eyes, lad," she said, "and say after me this: 'My mother' "—

"My mother," I repeated very solemnly.

"Looked upon my heart"—

"Looked upon my heart," said I.

"And found it brave"—

"An' found it brave,"

"And sweet"—

"An' sweet."

"Willing for the day's work"—

"Willing for the day's work."

"And harboring no shameful hope."

"An' harboring no shameful hope."

Again and again she had me say it, until I knew every word by heart.

"Ah," she said at last, "but you'll forget."

"No, no!" I cried. "I'll not forget. 'My mother looked upon my heart,'" I rattled, "'an' found it brave and sweet, willing for the day's work an' harboring no shameful hope.' I've not forgot! I've not forgot."

"He'll forget," she whispered, but not to me, "like all children."

But I have never forgotten—that, when I was a child, my mother looked upon my heart and found it brave and sweet, willing for the day's work, and harboring no shameful hope.—Dr. Luke of the Labrador.

KING DAUDI CHWA IN LONDON.

On the recent visit of the young king of Uganda to England (referred to in the August Review) he went to the C. M. S. office and met the Missionary Committee. King Daudi Chwa is just 17 years old, and has occupied the throne of Uganda 16 years. Next year, if spared to see his 18th birthday, King Daudi will be of age and will assume the full responsibilities of his royal rank, which are now borne in part by three Regents, of whom Sir Apolo Kagwa, the Protestant Katikiro, is the chief. His visit to England has been planned with an edutional purpose, to help to fit him for his future duties. Colonel Williams told the young king that there were gentlemen present who remembered the reading of Stanley's letter in 1875 and the Committee's resolution to respond to the challenge by sending a mission to Uganda, who had shared in bidding farewell to the first party of missionaries and who had watched, sometimes with anxiety but oftener with wonder and praise, the fluctuating experiences of the mission from then till now. He exprest the joy and the thankfulness of the Committee in welcoming as a brother in Christ the sovereign of that land of many prayers.—C. M. S. Review...

Jesus Christ possesses an unimpeachable and absolute right over us. He has the right of Creator: "It is he that hath made us, and not we ourselves." He has the right of Benefactor, not only in the realm of temporal, but of spiritual existence. He has the right of Redeemer.. This is the greatest claim of all. But our decision demands declaration: He will not have His servants live in secret and retirement. They are to proclaim and publish the fact that they are for Him.—F. B. Meyer.

The Dangers of Bad Pie.

Resolved, That it was not more dangerous for Caesar to establish electric fans in the basement under the Campus Martius than it for us to eat pie.

Such is a favorite question for college debate. It is an evidence of some of the fun that is poked at pie. But pie is a national food, and as such the securing of wholesome pie is a part of the question of securing pure food.

Not long ago the question of pure pie and the legal responsibilities of the producer of poor pie became especially important to a Massachusetts man named Wilson. The Wilsons purchased a blueberry pie from a retail dealer, and partaking thereof became very ill.. Wilson suffered long from an attack of ptomaine poisoning caused by eating the pie. He sued the manufacturer of the pie and recovered damages. The pie merchant carried the case to the Supreme Court, only to be beaten again. The court had the following, in part, to say:

"It (the pie company) represented by advertisement that it was engaged in making and selling pies which were not only wholesome but of excellent quality. Apart from any expectation of pecuniary gain or apprehension of loss, it was bound in their preparation to take every reasonable precaution to supply an article of food which would not be deleterious to the consumer's health. The pie having been unwholesome, and the dealer free from blame, the question is, whether there is evidence from which it could have been found that the plaintiff's injuries were attributable to the defendant's negligence. The selection of the berries, the manner of assorting and preparing them for use, and the large volume of business transacted, are described in detail by the defendant's witnesses. The evidence, however, need not be minutely reviewed. Its essential features only are important. It seems that a well-defined period of demand for blueberry pies of the defendant's brand had been established in the trade, for which it prepared by buying and keeping on hand large quantities of berries. But as they were not all used when the public appetite slackened or ceased, the unused portion for eight or nine months, or until the succeeding season, was thereupon stored in whiskey barrels, where the extent and force of the fermentation caused the heads to burst. The jurors from common experience have inferred without difficulty that the fruit as a result of the process had become merely a mass of pulp thoroughly unfit for culinary purposes, and if used it might be highly injurious or dangerous. The decomposition moreover, according to medical testimony, had developed different toxins and poisons, making the berries noxious. If. to neutralize or overcome these properties, the defendant, with knowledge of the qualities of the ingredients, mixed fresh berries with the product of the barrels, nevertheless the fact remained that the pies consisted in part of fermented or decayed fruit. It therefore could not have been ruled as matter of law that the agency of fresh berries had counteracted the poisons and caused the compound to be healthful, and the jury, as the judges correctly held, were to determine whether the pie the plaintiff bought and ate had been properly prepared."

Thus we notice that the manufacturer of pie who advertises that he produces pure food owes to the consumer a duty to make wholesome pie, and if he does, not do so, and injury results to the person who buys and eats the pie, the producer may be required to pay the damages. This applies not only to dealers in pie, but to dealers in food of every variety and description. The purity of everything that is eaten by humans is of the most vital interest and so comes within the safeguard of the law.

One who sells food at retail knows that he is selling it for consumption, and he is understood as giving assurance to his customers that the article which he sells is fit for human food. If it is not in a condition proper for human consumption, and he knew of it, or should have known it, he will be held responsible to the person who purchases the food and suffers loss because of it lack of purity. One may also advertise his products as being pure, as did the pie manufacturer in the above case, and he will be bound by what he states in his advertisement to the public. One may hold himself out to the public as a provider of proper food, as does a caterer who places himself before the public as one skilled in providing and preparing food for entertainments and similar occasions. In a Massachusetts case a public caterer was engaged by persons giving an entertainment to serve food and drink, and a person who attended the entertainment was injured because of the impurities of the food. The person injured sued the caterer and was allowed to recover.

Not only does the law provide redress for the person who is injured because of impure food, but the national and state governments have enacted legislation with a view to preventing the sale of improper food. It is now generally understood that it is one of the proper functions of government to guard the food supply of its citizens. The power of the government extends to providing for inspection of food by public officials. Food supplies may be inspected at the place they are produced, and if unfit, sale may be prevented, or they may even be condemned and destroyed. Both the United States government and a majority of the states provide for rigid inspection of many classes of foods and give to their inspectors a wide authority in preventing the sale of food not up to the proper standard.

Regulation of food not only extends to preventing the preparation and sale of impure food, but also to protecting the public against imitations and adulerants, which may be perfectly harmless. The sale of imitations, as oleomargerine, may be regulated by the government, with a view to protecting the public against imposition. The sale of a harmless substitute for a standard article made be made lawful, but the requirement may be added that by coloration, label, or other device the public may be informed as to the exact nature of the product

The laws which have very generally been enacted against the sale of oleomargerine colored so that it is an exact counterfeit of butter, have given rise to much bitter litigation. In states such as Vermont, where the butter producers are in the ascendency, some very stringent laws have been passed. One state enacted a law requiring that all oleomargerine be colored pink. This was defeated in the courts, it being held that the only proper purpose of legislation regulating the preparation of food was to protect the public against impurities, and that requiring a pure and wholesome article be colored in a ridiculous manner that would in effect prevent its use as food was not proper. But the laws which now exist in many states forbidding the sale of oleomargerine colored at all have been upheld, and this though in the same jurisdictions the sale of artificially colored butter is allowed. So when the legislature enacts that colored oleomargerine may not be sold or offered for sale, its decision in the matter is final.

BAPTIST DOCTRINE.

We have for our consideration this month the very important subject of the Lord's Supper. None of our distinctive doctrines are so much misunderstood and misrepresented as this. Even our own people are sometimes dissatisfied because they do not fully understand our position and the reason for it. This is what Baptists believe and practice about this ordinance and the reasons.

V.

"The Lord's Supper is not a social ordinance, but a memorial celebration of the death of Christ, in which bread represents His body, and wine represents His blood. Only those who have been baptized are scripturally qualified to partake of this supper, so we cannot consistently unite in this celebration with those who have not been immersed or invite them to unite with us; not because we do not believe in their conversion or piety but because they have not been baptized."

Baptists believe that the Lord's Supper is a sacred memorial of Christ, and His death for us, and is intended to be celebrated only by the church. We do not believe there is any mysterious virtue in the emblems used: but they are only symbols or types to bring before our minds inportant facts and truths concerning Christ. We believe that only immersed believers ought to partake of this Supper, because (1) the meaning of this ordinance shows which ought to come first; (2) Christ and the apostles always confined it to those who had been immersed. We do not find anywhere in the New Testament that unbaptized people ever were admitted to the Lord's table. "And they that gladly received His word were baptized and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls. And they continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrines and in fellowship and in breaking of bread. Acts 2: 41, 42. The order is plain: first belief, then baptism, then breaking of bread, or the Lord's Supper. Paul says, "Keep the ordinances as I delivered them unto you." 1 Cor. 11: 2.

Nearly all Protestant Christians agree with us that people ought to be baptized before they are admitted to the Supper. Otlier denominations invite only baptized people, and we do the same thing. They claim that sprinkling, pouring and immersion are all baptism; but we believe that only immersion is baptism. They can invite us without sacrificing any principle, because they know we are baptized; we cannot invite them because we know they have not been baptized. If we were to commune with them we would do what they would not do, for we would commune with unbaptized people. So no one who believes that immersion is the only baptism can commune with unimmersed people without changing the order which God has fixed for these two ordinances, and this is certainly disobedience.

It is clear that if Baptists practice open communion they endorse sprinkling and pouring as baptism, or they fail to keep the ordinances as they were delivered to us. We do not deny or doubt the conversion, piety, or usefulness of other Christians when we refuse to commune with them. In voting to receive candidates into our own churches we assert our faith in their conversion and piety, but do not admit them to the Supper until they have been baptized. We are glad to show our love for other Christians in many other ways that are proper and right, but we dare not sacrifice a principle which we would do, should we invite them to the Lord's Supper unbaptized. In this matter we are not narrow, bigoted or selfish, but simply consistent and loyal to Christ. Intelligent and impartial Pedobaptists justify and commend us for our consistent position.

Bishop Coxe, of the Episcopal Diocese of Western New York, says: "The Baptists hold that we have never been baptized and they must exclude us from their communion table if we were disposed to go. Are we offended? No; we call it principle and we respect it. I should be the bigot, and not they, if I should ask them to violate their discipline in this or any other particular.", The New York Observer, one of the oldest and best Presbyterian journals in this country, says: "It is not want of

DIED.

Crawford.

Mrs. Harriet Catherine Crawford was born June 12, 1842, and died at the home of her daughter and son-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Williams, October 25, 1913.

She was married to J. K. Crawford April 2, 1861, and for more than 52 years they "had walked arm in arm down life's pathway, sometimes to the banquet, and sometimes to the grave." To them were born seven children. One died in infancy, one son was killed in a railroad wreck after reaching years of maturity; one, Mrs. Herring, the wife of a Baptist minister, awaits the resurrection morn in Flat Rock cemetery; three sons, Robert Crawford, of Stokesdale; E. H. Crawford, of Greensboro, and a son in the West whose name I have not before me now, and one daughter, Mrs. W. J. Williams, together with the aged and greatly afflicted husband and a number of grandchildren survive her. The aged husband can linger only a little while before joining her on the other side of the river of death.

Mrs. Crawford was converted at old Double Springs Camp Ground in 1859 and subsequently joined Bethlehem M. E. Church, South, in Forsyth county. Later, while living in Winston, she transferred her membership to Burkhead M. E. Church, South, and after moving to Rockingham county she connected herself with Flat Rock Methodist Protestant Church, in which communion she died.

Mrs. Crawford was a woman of very strong character; full of energy and perseverance, and of vigorous mind until enfeebled by severe affliction. One year ago she became very feeble and had symptoms of organic heart trouble. On the 15th of last December she suffered a severe though not complete stroke of paralysis. From this time on she was as a little child in mind and spirit—and as a little sick child at that. She and her husband were taken to the home of her daughter, where she was carefully nursed and tenderly cared for. Often, like a little child, she would beg to be taken home; would become peevish and fretful because she could not go. Once, when told it was wrong for her to fret so, she said, "The Lord knows and He will make allowance for me," and I am sure the Lord did make allowance, for He knew that His child was sick. Before her sickness I had talked with her about the Father's House of many mansions and of her readiness to go hence and she expressed herself as being ready.

On Wednesday, Oct. 22, she suffered a second and complete stroke of paralysis and remained in this condition until Saturday morning at about 1 o'clock, when the spirit was freed and went to God who gave it. Funeral services were held in Flat Rock church Sunday, October 26, conducted by the pastor. A vast congregation, overflowing the church, gathered to honor her memory, among whom were many relatives and friends from a distance. It was touching to see the little children weep as they looked for the last time on the face of "grandma." Her body was tenderly laid to rest in Flat Rock cemetery, there to await the glad resurrection.

May her children and grandchildren emulate her virtues, trust and serve her God, and finally meet her in the Father's house above.

OPENING THE HEART.

There was a little boy whose heart was touched by a sermon on the words: "Behold, I stand at the door and knock."

His mother said to him: "Robert, what would you say to anyone who knocked at the door of your heart, if you wished him to come in?"

He answered: "I would say, 'Come in!'"

She said to him: "Then say to the Lord Jesus, 'Come in!'"

Next morning there was a brightness and a joy about Robert's face that made his father ask: "What makes you so glad today?"

He replied: "I awoke in the night, and I felt that Jesus was still knocking at the door of my heart, and I said, 'Lord Jesus, come in,' and I think he has come in. I feel happier this morning than I ever was before."—United Presbyterian.

charity which compels the Baptist to restrict his invitation. He has no hesitation in admitting the personal piety of his unimmersed brethren. Presbyterians do not invite the unbaptized however pious they may be. It is not uncharitable. It is not bigotry on the part of the Baptists to confine their communion to those whom they consider baptized." The Christian Advocate of New York says: "The regular Baptist churches in the United States may be considered to-day as practically a unit on three points; the non-use of infant baptism, the immersion of believers only upon profession of faith and the administration of the holy communion to such only as have been immersed by ministers holding their views. In our opinion the Baptist church owes its amazing prosperity largely to its adherence to those views. In doctrine and government, and in other respects, it is the same as the Congregationalists. In numbers the regular Baptists are more than six times as great as the Congregationalists. It is not bigotry to adhere to one's convictions, provided the spirit of Christian love prevails."

But some think it is hard not to join with those we love at the Lord's table. This very feeling is wrong, because the Lord's Supper is not intended for us to show our love for each other or to enjoy each other's fellowship. It is not in any sense a love feast. It is wrong to make it so. Jesus did not invite His own mother and other Christians then in Jerusalem. Christ says, "this do in remembrance of me." L. 22:19. If I am concerned about my husband or wife, my mother or father, brother or sister, when I partake of the emblems, if I am happier because they are present, or sad because they are absent, then I am communing with them and not with Christ. Instead of doing this in remembrance of Him, I take my mind off of Christ and put it on some present or absent loved one, and so I pervert the ordinance, dishonor Christ, and lose the benefits I ought to derive. Other churches destroy the sacred and impressive symbolism of bap-m when they substitute sprinkling for mersion, and we would destroy the sig-icance of the Supper, if instead of do-ng it in remembrance of Christ, we should do it in remembrance of each oth-er—if instead of using it as a memorial Christ we make it a memorial of Chris-fellowship. We do not invite im-sed members of other churches be-use they endorse the doctrines of their hurches, for which they would be ex-luded from a Baptist church. How ould we consistently commune with a an whom we would exclude for his doctrines if he were a member of a Baptist church?—Rev. W. C. Tyree, D. D.

"MURDER WILL OUT."

It may in some cases be a long time before murderers are detected and punished, but they usually are. A terrible sense of guilt in some instances becomes unbearable and the criminal is driven to confession by his own conscience. Sometimes the criminal's own recklessness leads to his discovery. Last Sunday, Dr. Turrentine gave this striking example:

A Virginia merchant named Dameron went north to buy goods. He was followed by a man who intended to kill him and rob him. His courage failed him for a time, but at length he accomplished his purpose and left Dameron's body under a tree near Baltimore, and fled. No clue could be found. Twenty years passed. One day the editor of the New York Sun was passing that way and the tree was pointed out to him under which Dameron's body had been found. He remarked that it was a very unusual thing for a murderer to remain undiscovered so long. He wrote an article about the case and published it in the New York Sun. A copy of this paper found its way to Florida and a man stopping at a hotel sat reading it one day. After reading of the murder of Dameron he walked into the hotel and saw a man under the influence of liquor walk up to the bar, lay down a small coin for drink, saying as he did so, "That's the last of Dameron." This remark of his and the Sun article led to his arrest, trial, conviction, and execution, though twenty years had passed since he committed the murder.

"Be sure your sin will find you out."

—Rev. W. F. Kennett made our city a brief call on Monday.

—We thank Dr. Davis, chairman of our commission on church union, for his frank statement published elsewhere of the considerations that led our commissioners to choose the course they have taken. They were given a difficult and delicate task. They may have made some mistakes—we believe they have—but they should be given credit for honest intention even where they may seem to us to have erred.

They had to guide them this resolution of the General Conference:

"Resolved, That if in their negotiations for Union * * * the Commission on Church Union shall find speedy action advisable, they are hereby authorized to overture the Annual Conferences in regard thereto and upon a favorable action of two-thirds of the said Annual Conferences they shall call a special session of this General Conference in accordance with the constitutional provision to act thereon."

The intent of this resolution is not wholly clear, but we understand it to mean simply that in case speedy action was found advisable, the commissioners should appeal to the Annual Conferences for authority to call a special session of the General Conference to act upon the matter, and in case the Annual Conferences approved, to call the present General Conference in special session. Our commissioners, it seems, have seen much more in it, and have felt themselves authorized by it to frame and submit an overture adopting a basis of union! This is somewhat amazing. Our church law gives to the General Conference the authority to initiate legislation looking to amendment of the Constitution of the Church, but that it can delegate this authority to an uninstructed committee would be most extraordinary if it were true. We do not believe it is true. The Constitution is too important a matter to be changed in such a way. As we see the matter the committee, if convinced that speedy action by the General Conference was desirable, were authorized to submit to the Annual Conferences the basis of union agreed upon—not for adoption by the Annual Conferences—but to enable the Annual Conferences to judge whether the prospect of a desirable union is sufficient to justify the assembling of the General Conference in special session to take further action in the matter.

The basis of union proposed is not satisfactory to many Methodist Protestants who yet hope that it may yet be made so. But to ask us to vote to approve changes not yet made and not knowing how they will be made seems unreasonable. The Annual Conferences that have voted for the resolutions proposed seem to be trying to impose on the General Conference responsibilities that the law of the church places upon them. What would we think of State legislatures that would refer a proposed amendment to our national constitution to Congress instead of voting upon it themselves? When the representatives of these Annual Conferences meet in General Conference to consider the hitherto unproposed changes in the basis of union, how can they know the mind of their own Annual Conferences on these new questions? As we see the matter, the basis of union, completed in every detail, should first be approved by our General Conference and then submitted by overture to our Annual Conferences, and by the Annual Conferences to the local churches. If the Gen. Conf. votes to go into the union and many local churches vote to stay out, the result will be, not union, but disruption and disintegration. There is need of walking carefully and prayerfully, and of avoiding suspicion of the motives of those who do not agree with us.

—To get all claims paid up before Conference, it will be necessary to hustle on many charges. Wouldn't it be fine if this year every charge should report all claims paid in full! We expect that most of them will so report.

—Rev. D. G. Helmick, of the West Virginia Conference, and a member of the commission on church union, is dead.

—Grace Church is in the midst of a series of evangelistic meetings as we go to press. Rev. J. D. Williams is doing the preaching with his usual earnestness and discrimination. The congregations are good, but they are composed mainly of Christian people. How to get the unsaved to go to church and hear the Gospel is a problem. The church will have to do more work out in the "highways and hedges."

OUGHT I TO SING IN CHURCH WHEN I CANNOT SING?

In a revival meeting a few nights ago the pastor on announcing a hymn urged everybody to sing. I was very hoarse and utterly unable to control my voice. Aiming at A flat I would strike G sharp, and would occasionally have naturals, flats and sharps all together, making a jargon worse than a rattle trap or a horse-fiddle. If I had tried to sing I should have failed; for singing is making musical, harmonious, melodious vocal sounds; and I could have produced only harsh, grating, discordant noises, having no more music in them than the croaking of a bullfrog. Nor could the worshipers sitting near me have sung easily and pleasantly, if at all; for my discordant notes would have jarred upon their ears and put them out of tune. The object of singing in church, I think, is to give joyful, beautiful, attractive and inspiring expression to our love for God and to His truth as we feel it in our hearts. It is to "make His praise glorious." It seemed to me it would be wrong for me to give the precious truths the hymns contained a repulsive, shocking setting. What if I had brought with me to church some musical instrument all out of tune and frightfully disagreeable to the ear and had played it off on the congregation! Had I any more right to impose my discordant voice upon my fellow worshipers than I would have had to disturb them with my crazy violin? Should I not be unkind, thoughtless and unreasonable to disturb the religious happiness—to break the holy spell—of rapt worshipers rendering sublime and inspiring praise to God? I remember well an awful experience I had at a funeral service a few years ago. A choir of fine voices would have rendered such beautiful, soothing, comforting music but for the persistent effort of an earnest friend to aid them! Words fail me, dear reader. But just imagine if you can a glass building struck by lightning and a band saw running through a car load of dry gourds! Does the Lord require me to do what I cannot do? Should I permit my religion unnecessarily to disturb the religion of others? Should I try to make music when my best efforts, impossible of success, destroy the music my fellow worshipers make? "Let every thing that hath breath praise the Lord." True. But that does not authorize one man, that has breath only, to so praise the Lord as to prevent a hundred men who have good voices from singing His praise. I have a friend who says he has no idea of tones. But while others sing aloud he moves his lips speaking in a voice so low as to be heard only in heaven. He sings praises unto God so silently that others may "make a joyful noise unto Him with psalms." Several years ago there was an old elder in our State who showed a very different spirit. It was utterly impossible for any body to sing while he was trying to. The young people laughed; the boys and girls ran out of the church; the old people became worried, and the good preacher had to pray. To the various committees appointed to try to induce him to desist from trying to sing he would reply, "I will praise the Lord." As the last resort he was tried in a civil court for disturbing public worship, and was found guilty; but his appeal to the supreme court was sustained, and I suppose he continued to "make a fuss" in church as long as he lived. Let us try to trust he is now in the good world with a voice as well as a disposition much improved. After all, I firmly believe everybody ought to try to sing in church—except those who have tried and cannot. And no preacher shall ever keep me from singing while I can sing, nor make me sing when I cannot—as long as I keep my present sense and religion.

T. J. Ogburn.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE RESOLUTIONS.

The commissioners of the Methodist Protestant Church have proposed a number of resolutions for adoption by the annual conferences, these resolutions being specific and comprehensive, and looking straight toward the object so manifestly desired by the two denominations concerned. These resolutions endorse the basis of union adopted at Columbus, "subject to such changes as may be agreed upon by the two General Conferences," acting separately and conjointly; provide for calling a special session of the General Conference; and clothe the General Conference with full conventional powers.

These resolutions, having been endorsed by the National Executive Committee, and having been successively adopted by seventeen of our annual conferences, while not a single conference has rejected them, have acquired an official standing which puts them quite beyond the reach of anxiety on their own behalf. The conferences thus far adopting the basis of union, including the resolutions under discussion, are as follows:

The Iowa, the Indiana, the Ohio, the Michigan, the West Virginia, the Kansas, the Pittsburgh, the Onondaga, the Muskingum, the North Illinois, the South Illinois, the Missouri, the North Missouri, the Virginia, the Kentucky, the Eastern and the Tennessee.

But certain questions have been raised as to the steps implied in these resolutions; and we shall undertake to answer them herein as briefly as the nature of the subject will permit.

1. If a special session of the General Conference is called, will that call convene the present body, or will a new election be required? It will most assuredly convene the existing General Conference. This is true in a broad and general way, because the GeneralConference is a legislative body, belonging, in its legal status, to the same class as the American Congress and the British Parliament. Furthermore, the continuous existence of the General Conference is inherently recognized by our Discipline, both in its structural essence and in its administrative provisions. The very existence of the Executive Committee, with its General Conference functions, and every duty assigned to the General Conference officers, whether president, secretary-treasurer or Executive Committee, is sufficient evidence in this direction. Specifically, also, the Discipline provides as follows:

"In the event of a vacancy in the office of president of the General Conference, the Executive Committee shall elect one of its members as chairman; and he shall act as president of the General Conference until the succeeding meeting of that body."

This is a clear and indisputable recognition of the General Conference as a continuous body; for how could a president be legally chosen for a body which had ceased to exist? But while each of these reasons is sufficient in itself, there is yet another evidence of clearest record, even if all others were omitted. For it is enough simply to quote the resolution authorizing and directing the special session, which distinctly says, "They shall call a special session of 'this' General Conference."

2. Does the adjournment of the General Conference, 'sine die' affect in any manner this organic continuity of the present General Conference? No more than would such a vote affect the organic existence of the American Congress or of the British Parliament. Adjournment, 'sine die,' never dissolves a legislative assembly, as all good authorities testify. The term is used in America to dissolve what the Century Dictionary calls "those bodies whose existence terminates with the business for which they are convened." But the term in itself, rather than dissolving a legislative body, expressly emphasizes its future existence and its later functions, the term being the American equivalent to the English term "prorogue," as applied to the Parliament; and temporary organizations, when they wish clearly to express the fact of their dissolution, should, in the opinion of the highest authorities, vote to dissolve, rather than using the term 'sine die;' which, by its very etymology, implies the very opposite of dissolution. But, in any event, it has no effect whatsoever on a legislative body, such as our General Conference; and nobody need therefore give place to the slightest suggestion of worry on that point.

3. As to clothing the General Conference with conventional powers? To accomplish church union between any two denominations, a two-fold process is absolutely necesstry. In the first place, of course, the work must begin and proceed along the lines clearly defined by the constitution. This fundamental requirement has been carefully observed at every step. We are calling the General Conference in special session as directed by the General Conference itself; but we are doing this through a constitutional method so plain that the annual conferences could have done it as effectually without the intervention of a commission. We are overturing the annual conferences as to the basis of union; but we are doing this under the specific authority and direction of the General Conference, which delegated its prerogative to the commissioners in this matter, the Baltimore resolution saying: "And they shall overture the annual conferences in regard thereto."

But there is another process absolutely necessary to organic church union; and this process is grounded in the following considerations:

(a) No church in Christendom has ever made constitutional provision for union with any other church. All the law we have is merely as to amendments to the constitution.

(b) By what law or right, then, may negotiating churches finally become one? Simply by the inalienable right which belongs inherently to every Christian denomination as an independent sovereignty.

(c) How can any given denomination express this sovereign right? Through the highest court of the denomination, which is, in our case, the General Conference.

(d) Why is the highest court of the church, that is to say the General Conference, the only and final agency thru which this sovereign right can be exercised and consummated? Because the Supreme Court of the United States has proclaimed, by a most sweeping decision, that only the deliverance of the highest court of a denomination will be recognized in all matters as the determining and final word; and the Supreme Court further declares that they will not inquire into the merits of the decree of the highest church court "as between the parties before us."

(e) Why should the General Conference be clothed with conventional powers? Because in the act of negotiating the union, in every act beyond the simple constitutional provision as to amendments, the General Conference is exercising conventional powers, whether they are specifically invested with them or not; and all their work toward union, while not unconstitutional, is extra-constitutional, being the expression of the sovereign right of the Methodist Protestant Church. The resolutions should expressly invest the General Conference with whatsoever rights it is bound of necessity to exercise.

(f) But has not this custom, or law or provision been "done away with?", Who has done away with it? And when? And how? If it has been constitutionally "done away with," then there must be some constitutional record of the fact. There is no such record. If it has been presumably "done away with" by a conference resolution, or by omission, then let it be remembered that the legislative act or omission of one General Conference is not binding upon any other General Conference. And even if it can't be done constitutionally, there is certainly no occasion for worry; because in that case it will not have been done. If the General Conference, on the other hand, already possesses conventional powers, then again there is no occasion for worry; for the resolutions in that case will simply reaffirm the fact, without affecting it in any manner.

4. Are the people to vote on the question of union? The people are to do just as they please about it, either voting instructions, or voting their endorsement, or leaving the question to their representatives in the annual and General Conferences. For while popular government is supreme both in the Methodist Protestant Church, and in the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, let us remember that ours is a republic while theirs is a democracy. The Methodist Protestant Church, being a representative government, provides for amendments to its constitution in the following language:

"Alterations of this constitution may be effected by means of overtures by the General Conference, and confirmed by two-thirds of the annual conferences."

The United Brethren Church, being a democracy, provides for constitutional changes in this language:

"Amendments to this constitution may be proposed by any General Conference—two-thirds of the members elected thereto concurring; which amendments shall be submitted to a vote of the membership throughout the church, under regulations authorized by said conference. A majority of all votes cast upon any submitted amendment shall be necessary to its final ratification."

The Methodist Protestant commissioners have followed with exact steps the path blazed for them by the law of the Methodist Protestant Church, beginning and ending in the conferences, simply because the law begins and ends there; the announcement to stations and missions required in the Discipline being for the purpose of making provision for the expenses of the delegates at the special session of the General Conference. The United Brethren General Conference, on the other hand, ordered a direct vote of the people because they were required so to do by their constitutional law.

If the president of the General Conference, or the commissioners as a body, had proclaimed a popular ballot on the question, thus expressing or implying this popular vote as a requirement or a necessity, they would thus have clearly departed from the law of our representative government, and in so far, as we were well advised, would have in some degree jeopardized the union. That is so, primarily, because the constitution makes direct provision in this respect, recognizing only the conferences, and yet recognizing the people, because their chosen representatives form an equal part of every conference. There in another consideration which must be kept in mind, if we would take every step legally and cautiously. Let it be remembered that our church is pre-eminently a mutual rights church. But if we should call for a separate, independent vote, either of the laity or of the ministry, thus giving either branch of our well-balanced government a practical veto power, that would destroy the essential principle of mutual rights, and, in a separate vote of the laity, this would necessarily be true, because the ministers, not being members of local churches, would be totally disfranchised; for membership follows amenability; and as our ministers are amenable only to the annual conference, they are therefore members of the annual conference only. These two reasons, big with jeopardy for the union if they are disregarded, have dictated the various steps taken by our commissioners.

What is the conclusion, therefore? The conclusion, like the opening proposition, is simply this, that the people on their own prompting, in their various local congregations, must be permitted to do just what they wish to do. But their vote must be in harmony with their representative government, which becomes in our system the broadest kind of popular sovereignty. The laity can vote to instruct delegates thus taking the initiative; or they can vote to endorse or disapprove what the delegates in annual conference may have done, thus exercising the referendum. For even General Conference representatives will certainly take cognizance of the popular sentiment of our beloved church, in whatsoever way that sentiment may find expression.

The annual conference resolutions, as they are being adopted by the annual conferences, are written in the clear light of the law, with only such projections as will express, in harmony with the highest deliverances of church and state, the inherent sovereignty of every religious denomination in America; and we have enough good legal advice upon these resolutions to give us confidence that they will ultimately answer all questions to the complete satisfaction of every friend of the proposed union.

JAPANESE MOVE TO BRAZIL.

In consideration of the many articles appearing in the press recently concerning the Japanese question, the coming great struggle between the two races—the yellow and the white—for world supremacy, and the possibility of the assimilation of these two races, it is interesting to note Brazil's favorable attitude toward the Japanese. The Japanese have situated themselves very strongly in some parts of North America, particularly along the North Pacific coast in the United States and in Canada, and also on many islands of the Pacific, and now there is to be a great move of the Japanese to South America.

At present there are some 4,000 immigrants in Brazil, mostly employed on coffee plantations. A recent decree by the Brazilian government grants "Brazil Takushoku Kaisha" (Colonization Company of Brazil) concessions of land in the States of Sao Paulo, Rio de Janeiro, and Minas Geraes, where Japanese colonies are to be founded. A seaport city which is to be inhabited by Japanese only, is to be built at once to the south of Iguape. Its name will be "Rodriguez Alves." Ten thousand Japanese families must settle there within five years, and then 100,000 more Japanese are to settle in the State of Sao Paulo. Their main industry is to be the culture of the silkworm. This section is also said to be suited to the culture of rice, which is in demand in Brazil and will soon be in demand in Japan.

In Japan the amount of arable land possessed by the farmers is estimated at almost two and a half acres each, while in England, Holland, and Belgium, the most denselp populated countries of Europe, the average is about 27 acres, 12 acres, and 5 acres respectively. This shows that Japan has very little room for her coming increased population. As yet her 250,000,000 bushels of rice a year supply her 50,000,000 population, but at an increase of 500,000 population yearly, the proportion of rice to people will soon become seriously unbalanced. These considerations make the movement toward Brazil a matter of wise forethought.

According to the agreement with Brazil, the Japanese are not to be scattered among the natives, but are to live by themselves, speaking their own language, and adhering to their own habits and customs. They are to be free to communicate with Japan, to ship their products back home, and to receive from home whatever they want.—Selected.

THE PERSONAL TOUCH.

Mrs. Daniel Upton.

He saw that it was good. When God created the heavens and the earth, He left the impress of His own hand upon all material things and "God saw that it was good.'

When he touched the forehead of clay and gave man intellect, touched the inanimate heart and awoke the power to love, breathed into the body a living soul with power to choose, the record is that "It was very good."

Throughout the history of His chosen people we find Jehovah ever leading with His own personal hand. Abraham recognized the fact that national life rested not upon a declaration of independence of men, but upon a declaration of dependence upon God, the leading hand of God. Here and there, God touched a man and gave him a special work to do, as Moses, Joshua, Samuel, who in turn touched others.

Finally. in due time, He sent His Son to establish the Kingdom of God upon founding of that Kingdom and its growth is that of the Personal Touch.

Christ was essentially a social being. He never lost sight of the social side of the Kingdom. He belonged to His own age and His method of work was to go from one man to another, pointing out the way to the Father through the Son, an dthe relationship of God's children to each other.

As we read the story of the three years of our Saviour's ministry, it is one continuous moving picture of personal touches. The extended hand upon the leper, the fingers upon the eyes of the blind, the touch of His garment by another, the healing of many where they pressed upon Him. "And the whole multitude sought to touch him, for there went virtue out of him and healed them all," the deaf, the lame, the rich, the poor, the wise and the ignorant, all fell under the spell of His personality.

Thus did His disciples continue the work here, there and beyond, with their man to man message. So, too, did Paul, the first great missionary, carry the Gospel of his beloved Lord and Master to the then uttermost parts of the earth. In like manner did th early missionaries carry on their work among the unenlightened nations of the earth, Morrison, Judson, Carey, Livingstone, and those of more recent years, even to our late Miss Shattuck and Mrs. Coffing. The Christianizing of the nations cannot be accomplished except through the vitalizing touch of humanity, the purified, consecrated personal touch of the humble followers of Jesus Christ. It can do, nay, has done, what neither pen nor sword could accomplish.

Truth and love and spirituality are forever right. Today, as never before, Truth can come out. All has been prepared. We are told that there is not a language into which the Gospel of Christ has not been translated. At home, as abroad, opportunities offer as never before to bring forth the principles of light. The message is not for us or for our neighbors alone. We are its trustees and must pass it on. Christ is depending on us, His disciples, to disseminate the knowledge of His Kingdom. We truly live only when we begin to be spiritual and help others to become so.

With these thoughts in our minds, the questinos naturally arise, how can we better serve our Master and His cause; how can we make our work more effective; what are the problems that come to us as churches, societies and individuals, and how shall we solve them? It is the purpose of this paper to arouse such interest and inquiry as will lead to the betterment of our work during the coming year.

One of the first essentials, it seems to me, for the success of the missionary work in any church or community is the interested pastor.

One great detriment to the work, especially in the smaller churches, is that the ministers change pastorates so frequently and that so many of them have not enlarged views of missions. When the pastor is the leader and constant inspiration along all missionary lines, there is little question about the missionary interest through the church. Let us pray for missionary ministers, who will put their personal touch upon the work.

Second. Every Church (or Society) should have a "vision of the work."

"By what shall Christian people promote their own spiritual growth so surely as by the acceptance of the world as their parish? It deepens the faith to see what God can do. It broadens the sympathy to see what other people suffer for the sake of Christ. It enlarges Christian joy to see liberty actually experienced, the liberty which is always the product of truth."

With this vision before us, we build schools, academies, colleges, and send boys and girls of dusky complexions into them, hardly realizing that among them will soon be found the great leaders, thinkers, discoverers and preachers of the world.

Third. There should be the prayer touch. When Peter in his weakness failed, his Master, Jesus, said, in loving tenderness, "I have prayed for thee." His was a personal prayer for a personal need, an urgent prayer for an urgent need. Then with assurance of the prayer being answered, Jesus said, "When once thou hast turned again." We need to touch our missionaries with our prayers as we would pray for personal friends. Jesus knew Peter and his personal needs. How can we pray for our missionaries, most of whom we never met, and of whom we know so little?

This brings me to the fourth thought I would suggest, that as churches and societies and individuals we should come into personal touch with our missionaries. The ideal way would be for one church to adopt a missionary and make him their own. This, however, is possible with only the larger churches. It is possible for each church and society to have a part in some one missionary, and they can come into close touch with him through visits, correspondence and gifts, as well as prayers.

But, you say, how can we interest people in special missionaries who are not interested in missions at all? Let me give you an incident. A minister had in his congregation a very wealthy man and a good man, but he was not in sympathy with foreign missions. It had been talked over many times, but it seemed impossible to present the subject in a way to change the man's opinion. One day, after trying to convince this friend, the minister said: "Will you pray for missions? You can do that, anyway. Will you?" "Yes, I will do that. It is easy to pray." That night he began to do as he had promised and he prayed for missions. But soon he found he couldn't pray for anything so indefinite. He must at least have a country for which to pray.

He went to his minister and talked it over. The minister gave him "China" and loaned him a book on China. He read and learned of this far away land and of the 400,000,000 of people there. That night he prayed after this fashion, "Lord, I read there are 400,000,000 people in China. I don't know much about them, but I pray that thou wilt bless them." This satisfied him for a few times, but the need of something still more definite sent him again to the minister's study to learn of a city in China that he might substitute for the country itself. So he prayed for this city by name, he read about it, and the more he read the more he wanted to know.

Finally, he called upon the minister once more and asked for the name of a missionary working in that city. This was furnished him, also material on his work and his need. This was the real thing, and he prayed often and earnestly. It was done. The man was converted to missions, and he became an interested man and a generous supporter of missionary work.

Let us consider for a few moments the local society and its needs. Careful and prayerful consideration should be paid to the organization of the work. To accomplish the best results means consecrated service. The officers should be chosen, not haphazard, anybody who will consent to serve, but with much thought and prayer, and always there should be kept in mind the interesting and trainin of the younger women, who must take the places of the more experienced as the years pass on.

To serve well means the sacrifice of time, strength and social life. Much, very much, depends upon the president and her executive board. The president should be in touch with every phase of the work. It is not enough to appoint committees and expect them to act. She is an ex-officio member of every committee, and should know at all times just what is being done by them.

A vice-president should not be a figurehead, one simply to take the place of the president in presiding, should she chance to be absent, but should have such constant sympathetic touch with the president as to be her helper and counsellor at all times. So with the other officers. The secretary, with her heart in the work, will be mindful of the details that mean so much for the success of the work; the sending of notices of meetings to the papers and the pulpit, the note of sympathy to the sick and sorrow stricken, the regular attendance at all meetings, even to the sacrifice of social joys. Above all, the treasurer must use the personal touch here, there, and all the time, always with patience, wisdom and tact. I might keep on indefinitely with the whole list of heads of committees, but it is one story—just personal work and personal responsibility all along the line.

But after all, in this as in all matters of personal influence, it depends much more on what we are than on what we do or say, do you not think so? A woman whose personality challenges respect and love will, without many words, persuade others that what she is interested in must be worth while. If she is a woman who always thinks before she speaks, and never acts without good reason, her espousal of any cause will carry weight, and if she is known to be a woman who is always ready to sacrifice freely and gladly for the object of her espousal, her influence is thereby multiplied. If, in addition, she be fortunate enough to have the winsomeness and personal charm that always goes with self-forgetfulness and love of others, she is a woman whose influence is bound to win.

"Thou must be true to thyself
If thou the truth wouldst teach.
Thy heart must overflow if thou
Another's heart would reach.
It needs the overflowing heart
To give the lips full speech.
Think truly and thy thought
Shall the world's famine feed.
Speak truly and thy word
Shall be a fruitful seed.
Live truly and thy life shall be
A great and noble creed."

THE HAMMER JESUS USED.

"If I could hold within my hand
The hammer Jesus swung,
Not all the gold in all the land,
Nor jewels countless as the sand,
All in the balance swung,
Could weigh against that precious thing
Round which His fingers once did cling."

POPULAR TALKS ON LAW.

Who Owns the Air?

W. K. Towers, A. B., J. D., of Mich. Bar.

"Free as air" is proverbial and so long as man had not succeeded in mastering the air this was true enough. There was air sufficient for all of us and as none could navigate it with any success, questions of the control of the air did not arise.

But now we have the aeroplane and the airship and we are in what promises to be the beginning of an age of aviation. So it is that the law is beginning to develop; to keep pace with the development of aeronautics. As yet, flying machines are few in number, but it seems that we may well look forward to a time in the not far distant future when the passage of aeroplanes and airships above us will be no uncommon spectacle. What right has the aeronaut to pass above our property? What are his liabilities in case he causes injury to those below him? These and many similar questions are arising, and the law is preparing to answer them as they arise.

If one passes over your land, on the surface, without permission, he has committed a trespass and though he may have caused no appreciable damage to your premises you may recover small damages in a court of law by way of vindication of your rights. What are your rights against the aeronaut who passes through the air above your property? It is a fundamental rule of English law that a person's property extends indefinitely upward and downward. This rule has existed since the beginnings of law, and under it one has control of the area above his land. A strict observance of this rule would lead to this result: An aeronaut who passes above your land is a technical trespasser, and though he drops nothing upon you or yours, though he causes you no real injury, he has violated your rights—he has trespassed—and you may sue him and recover damages. Such would be the logical result of the application of the law as it has long existed in English-speaking countries.

But it seems highly improbable that the law will be allowed to remain in this condition. Aviation has come to stay and it would seem to be necessary that aeronauts be allowed to pass freely over the property beneath, whether it be privately owned or a public highway. This necessity seems certain to cause a change in the law, which is likely to come in the form of legislative enactments concerning flying machines. The French have already taken action, a law having been recently enacted, which extends to aeronauts free right to navigate the air passing where they will. The nation retains the general control of the air, however, so that it may prevent any but French airships from flying over French territory, and make such regulations as may be necessary.

Among the American states Connecticut has taken the lead in passing legislation of this character. A law entitled "An Act Concerning the Registration, Numbering, and Use of Air Ships, and the the Licensing of Operators Thereof", was passed by that state in 1911. Under this law, airships are subject to regulations similar to those generally applied to automobiles. The owner must file certain information with the Secretary of State, pay a fee, receive a certificate entitling him to fly, and a number. This number must be displayed on the airship in letters not less than three feet in height. Airships may be operated only by licensed aeronauts.

This law fixes the responsibility for all resulting damages in the following section:

"Every aeronaut shall be responsible for all damages suffered in this state by any person from injuries caused by any voyage in an airship directed by such aeronaut; and if he be the agent or employee of another in making such voyage his principal or employer shall be responsible for such damage."

The states of Massachusetts and New York are considering similar legislation and before many years it seems probable that every state will have acted on this subject.

The question of fixing the responsibility for damages, which has been cared for in the Connecticut act is one that is likely to be of immediate importance. The dangers of airships passing over property are considerable. Parts, baggage, or ballast might be dropped, causing injury to persons or property.

The fall of an aeroplane upon a city might occasion severe damage to those on land, as well as to the unfortunate aeronaut. But fancy the damages resulting from the collision between two giant airships of the Zeppelin type!

With the present interest in aviation and the popular encouragement which it is receiving, the attitude of the lawmakers is likely to be favorable to them as far as granting to them the right to freely navigate the air is concerned. Landowners are not likely to endeavor to demand a fee from aeronauts passing over their property. The legislators are likely to grant great freedom of passage and the courts are likely to sustain the legislation. Of course, a property owner might object that when the legislature grants the right to navigate the air freely it gives a right to pass over his land and thus takes away from him a portion of his property. Such a contention, if made, will raise some interesting cases, the result of which no one can foresee.

But as to fixing the responsibility for injury resulting from the operation of airships, the law seems inclined to hold the aeronaut to strict account. If the aeronaut wishes to take the risk of riding in the air, he must further take all the risk of causing injury to persons or property over which he passes. As matters stand now, even in the absence of a statute fixing the responsibilities, as in Connecticut, a person injured by an airship may almost certainly recover damages from the aeronaut. If a passing airship lets fall any object which injures your property you may sue the person who is responsible for the operation of the airship.

A few cases have already arisen in England. A British aeronaut was driving his aeroplane and attempted to descend into a field. The field was occupied by a cow and the cow apparently resented the appearance of this strange object from above. As the aeronaut descended the cow rushed toward it, making hostile demonstrations. The aeronaut endeavored to avoid the infuriated bovine, but was unsuccessful and her cowship succeeded in plunging beneath the machine just as it reached the earth. The results were disastrous to the cow, and the sequel came when the farmer who owned the cow sued the aeronaut and recovered damages for the loss of the cow.

The aeroplane has found its way into the classified ad columns as well as into the courts, as witness the following interesting ad which appeared in a German newspaper:

"Lost from an aeroplane, gold watch and chain. Last seen disappearing in large stack of rye on a field near Ulzen."

NOTICE.

To Other Members of the Committee on Entrance Examinations and All Persons Wishing to Take this Examination:

Please meet me not later than 2 P. M. Tuesday, Nov. 18, at North Main Street Methodist Protestant Church. Pastors will please see that all candidates come properly recommended and that they get in on time, as it is difficult to find time for examinations after Conference opens.

Siler City.

It was the writer's privilege to visit this thrifty little city last Sunday and be present at the dedication of the First Methodist Protestant Church of that place. Having spent two years in school there many years ago it was a joy to refresh the memory of those days when boyhood is blending into manhood, and to live over again for a few happy hours those years in school. The boyish and girlish faces of those days have lost something of the freshness of youth, but the spirits seem just as young as of yore and their hope in God seemed brighter.

The little city has grown almost beyond the recognition of the old T. S. student who has not had the good fortune to visit there within the past decade. Many nice residences have been built and a great numebr of splendid business houses greet one where once the red soil, often mud, was the only thing that attracted the traveler, some of which too often went with him.

The First Methodist Protestant Church of Siler C. was begun several years ago under Rev. W. C. Lassiter, then pastor of Alamance Ct., who solicited funds for it. The building was erected under the pastorate of Rev. W. D. Reed, if we mistake not. We are writing from memory without advice from the people there. It has since been completed and recently there was spent something like $1,000 in completing the building. It is a beautiful little church with a seating capacity of something like 350, easy to speak in, and has some of as loyal members as can be found anywhere.

Sunday was a lovely day; not a fleck to obscure the blue sky, just warm enough to be pleasant. Thus nature ushered in the day that had been looked for with fond anticipation by many of the people of that little city. They have a good Sunday school, not so large as many of us have, but a most aggressive body of officers and teachers. Bro. Hanner has been a most efficient Supt. of the school there I think since it was first organized. Being a man of intelligence and consecration, the school must prosper under his wise leadership.

The church was presented by Bro. L. L. Wrenn and was dedicated by the writer. The full service in our ritual was used most impressively and our people went home feeling very glad of the privilege to erect and dedicate to the glory of God another temple for worship.

We were entertained in the hospitable home of Brother and Sister Cooper, who while still holding their church membership at Piney Grove M. P. Church are faithful workers in the church here. Bro. Cooper being chorister and teacher in the S. S. We were sorry to have to hasten away early in the afternoon, but glad of the privilege of mingling with these earnest people of God and of renewing many acquaintances. May the Lord continue to bless these dear people and prosper them greatly in the work of His Kingdom.

Spring Church and Greenville Circuits.

Since my last report we have been in the financial work. Much progress has been made in this. The effect of good revivals held during the summer. Matthew's Chapel paid all the assessment for general interests third Sunday in Sept. Ebenezer has largely overpaid pastor's salary. The other churches have right much in hand already for general interests. Spring Church is doing well. Those noble, loyal people there can be depended upon to do things. Just begun to take the monthly collections for Orphanage. It was great to see the eagerness with which they contributed.

Lebanon yesterday did nicely, overpaying on general interest. Overpaid pastor's salary. The years before it seemed hard for them to pay out, but the church is getting in it a body of hustling young people. It was a joy to see the young women working to get all of general interests assessment. Bro. A. T. Allen began early in the year to do his part as steward and now three weeks before Conference every cent of every claim paid and more.

This work as a whole is doing well. Many improvements are to be made in the near future.

Now, I have never said anything about church union. Such warping of Scripture, trying to make it teach things that it does not teach. Some guided one way and some another by the same Spirit? The people are becoming disgusted at the whole thing. Bro. Taylor seems to think that there is only a hopeless minority that are opposed to it, but if he will just go out on some of the charges he will find a still more hopeless minority in favor of it. Yours for the M. P. Church,

J. A. Ledbetter.

Winston.

The following appeared in the Daily Sentinel of Winston last Saturday:

The congregation of the First Methodist Protestant church expect to open their handsome new church, corner of Seventh and Liberty streets, on the third Sunday in November.

The building, which is nearing completion, is not only attractive, but most conveniently arranged. The main auditorium has two entrances on Liberty street, the principal entrance and vestibule being on the northeast corner. Entering the auditorium, and in the center of a graceful quarter circle is the chancel and pulpit, to the left of which is a spacious choir stand, this being immediately in front as one enters the south door. The main auditorium will be attractively finished in dark oak, with handsome circular oak seats, and the gallery will be fitted up in the same manner. Connected with the gallery also is a large Baraca class room.

Separated from the auditorium by heavy rolling partition is the Sunday school room, which is arranged in another quarter circle. The main floor of this department will seat nearly 200 people, while in the rear are five class rooms to be curtained off and also an enclosed section for the Sunday school library. In the rear of the quarter-circle gallery five other class rooms are arranged very similar to those on the main floor.

Raising the partition, these two departments, the Sunday school room and the auditorium combine gracefully into a semi-circle auditorium with a seating capacity of more than seven hundred.

Plans are being laid for a big demonstration on the opening day. The pastor, Rev. S. W. Taylor, is in correspondence with members of the General Conference of the M. P. Church for the purpose of securing one of the denomination's strongest ministers to deliver the opening sermon.

The new church will not only be a source of pride to the membership in this city and section, but is a credit to the community.

Albemarle Circuit.

The fourth quarterly conference will meet in the Creswell church at eleven o'clock on Saturday, Nov. 1. Let every official member please be present. This is the most important quarterly meeting of the year for this circuit, and you are needed. May I expect you?

The Pastor.

Asheville.

The work of excavating for the foundation of the church was stopped for two days last week by bad weather, but what time the men were able to work made a considerable hole in the ground, enough to make us sure that the work of building really is commenced.

The canvass for funds is going forward with considerable success. No large sums are being reported, but the pledge cards are being signed quite generously, practically no one refusing to help us a little. Contributions are not confined to the members of our denomination, but friends in all the churches are helping.

The Ladies Aid held a Hard Times Social a few nights ago at which $7 was realized and a good time had. It was evident, from some of the costumes worn, that our people are, sometimes at least, very hard put to it to find something to wear.

It is gratifying to know with what apparent anticipation the people in the neighborhood of the church look forward to its completion, this even from the members of other churches in the city. We started out with the expectation that there would be considerable opposition to the church being located in the section of the city in which it is being built. But, with two exceptions, that opposition, if there was any, has not materialized. On the other hand, nothing but the friendliest interest is being manifested. We believe we have the ideal location both for our people and for the opportunity of reaching a large number of people who are not actively connected with any of the central churches of the city. C. Siler City Circuit.

The 4th quarterly conference was held at Siler City on Saturday, the 25th. Attendance was unusually good. Each church was represented. The reports were all good. Three of the churches report every cent of every claim paid in full. The general interests reported paid in full at all the churches. Balance of pastor's salary in good shape. Sunday schools all reported in good shape. Considerable improvements have been made in some of the churches, especially at Siler City and Hickory Grove. Hope has been insured for a term of three years. Other improvements are in contemplation. The year has been a very successful one. With proper management it seems to me that this circuit should become one of our most desirable ones. The quarterly conference expressed their appreciation of the pastor's faithfulness by a unanimous rising vote; for this token of confidence the pastor does not know how to express his appreciation.

May God's providential care lead them to nobler things. J. H. Bowman.

Dedication of Siler City Church.

One month ago it was decided to dedicate this church on the 4th Sunday in October. Accordingly Rev. R. M. Andrews, pastor of Grace Church in Greensboro, was invited to be present and preach the dedicatory sermon and assist in the dedication. He very kindly consented to do so. The church was beautifully and tastefully decorated with flowers and potted plants. I doubt whether Van Lindley Co. could have excelled it. The weather was ideal. The congregation filled the house to its capacity. Bro. Andrews' sermon was very appropriate and met the highest expectation of all. The beautiful service as laid down in the Discipline was carried out almost to exactness, and was very much enjoyed by all. The church was presented by Bro. L. L. Wrenn. We have in Siler City a beautiful house of worship, built at a cost of about $3,000. (I haven't the exact figures at hand.) Recently there have been improvements made on and in the church to the amount of nearly $1,000. In the next ten days electric lights will be installed which so far as I can see will add the finishing touch, and give us a church that not only our people in Siler City are justly proud of, but our entire denomination in the State should be proud of. It is centrally located in the growing town of Siler City and is the gathering place for M. P.'s from the surrounding country. While our membership is not yet large, it is as true and good as the very best. The membership has one member of the General Conference, and while he is highly in favor of church union, no one need have any fears but that he will safely guard our rights. We have one member on the board of Conference trustees, one on the Standing District Committee, one on the Ways and Means committee, one of the prime movers, best supporters and truest friends of the Children's Home is Mrs. Emma B. Siler of this church. May this already important church soon develop into greater usefulness. J. H. Bowman, Pastor.

THE POSTAL CARD

W. F. KENNETT, EDITOR

A special service was held at Flat Rock last Sunday in the interest of the Children's Home. The exercise was opened with words of welcome by Miss Mary Ogburn. Her words of welcome were well spoken and well received. Mr. Andrew Hosford delivered a short and interesting address. Mrs. J. B. Ogburn gave a very appropriate and touching reading. This was followed by a short sermon by the pastor based on the text, "For ye have the poor with you always, and whensoever ye will ye may do them good." The fact that the fatherless and motherless children are among the most helpless and dependent of the poor and that we always have them was emphasized. I have never seen so many people contribute in one congregation. It is true most of the contributions were small, but the contributing was general. Something over $23 was the total. This will probably be increased to $25. The exercise was a success and many people will be more interested in the Children's Home.

The 4th quarterly conference.

Remember next Saturday at 11 o'clock at Gideon's Grove. Be sure to attend.

Charlotte.

A Methodist Protestant church has been organized in this thriving city. The membership is small, but they are some of the very salt of the earth. They have the old-time religion. We will tell you more about what they have done and are doing and are going to do when we write again. Then you will think they are some of the salt of the earth. Some time in July they gave the pastor a new suit of clothes that cost $22 but the Belk Bros. gave $4 on the suit, and later Bro. C. O. Garmon paid $5.73 on a pair of shoes and other things for the pastor. God bless you, dear brethren and sisters. I thank you with all my heart for your kindness in giving me these things, and for the money you have paid me and the gifts you have given our little orphan girls. You have made our hearts glad more than once in our struggle this year. I wish I could give all your names but time and space forbid it here. But our Heavenly Father knows every dime and every little dress and every hand that gave them all and He will reward you every one. I hope to be at Charlotte on the night of November 5th and preach that night. Will all the members who see this publish it and get all the people together we can on that night. We will hold our fourth quarterly conference on Saturday night before the 3rd Sunday in November. I want all the members to be present on both these nights mentioned. I hope we can put a pastor at Charlotte next year that can spend the most of his time there. If we can place a working pastor there it will not be long until we can build a good church there with a little help from the church at large. I have not had the pleasure of being with our people at Charlotte much during the summer and fall months. I have been engaged in revival work about all the summer and fall. I have been busy all the year. I have been in a number of good meetings during the year and I have seen a number of places where we can build M. P. churches. Will it be wrong to build any more M. P. churches?

I have received many calls to help in meetings this year when I could not help. The brethren of the Conference have been very kind to me in calling on me to help in meetings and the most of the churches where I have helped hold meetings have paid me very well. I wish I could have helped every brother that called on me to help. There are many things that I would like to say about my year's work and about our dear old M. P. Church. I will say this: I like the reival work above all other work, and I feel like it is my work, and I for one am not ready to take down our old M. P. altars around which God has saved so many souls. I thank all you brethren for your kindness to me. God bless our beloved Zion. Fraternally,

D. A. Braswell.

NOTICE.

It is important that I know at en early date who is coming to Conference. A few have reported, but the great majority have not yet reported. We are looking forward with pleasure to your coming, but of course can only provide for those who we know are coming. Nov. 19 to 24 is the time. All members of the faculty and students to be examined are expected to arrive here on Tuesday evening, Nov. 18th. We will try to meet the trains, but if we fail to meet you at the train, come direct to the Methodist Protestant Church on Main street, about three blocks from the depot and you will be cared for.

All organizations wishing a place on the Conference program will please let us know at once. The president of the Conference and the writer will undertake to map out a program, and it must be done soon. Yours in service,

A. G. Dixon.

PERILS OF THE MINISTRY.

Contrary to the opinion of the world, the ministry is full of moral perils. It has pitfalls on every hand and byways on every side. There is a widespread impression that the life of a minister is one of sheltered security. It is a sort of quiet, land-locked bay beside the stormy sea. And of all impressions of which I have ever heard, that is the farthest from the truth. The life of a minister of the Gospel is one of storm and stress. The work of the ministry creates temptations of which others do not dream. There is the temptation to become hardened and perfunctory in the handling of holy things. I had not been in the ministry a year before I made the horrifying discovery that a man can be proclaiming the evangel, burying the dead, praying with the dying, and yet slowly losing his own personal hold on God. There is the temptation to be worldly in mingling with worldly people. "The world offers itself as a climate, and we may be led into accepting it as the atmosphere of our lives." I remember with grief a number of good men who, starting to bring others to Christ, have ended by descending to them. Yes, and there is the ever present temptation to the baser and more bestial of sins. There is the lust of the flesh as well as the lust of the eyes and the pride of life. The peril to the minister's moral manhood is more deadly than the world has ever dreamed. It inheres in the very nature of his work, in the tasks given him to do. The preacher's very emotional intensity often brings him to the point of danger. The pastor's work leads him into situations where moral wrongdoing is made easy. Sometimes he is cast headlong to the very center of the crucible. Sometimes he is compelled to withstand the subtlest assaults on the citadel of his soul. One day Jowett and Hugh Price Hughes were walking the streets of London. Long did they talk of their common tasks and triumphs. Suddenly, however, the impetuous Hughes stopped and grasped his confrere by the arm. "Jowett!" he cried, "Jowett! The evangelical minister is always on the brink of an abyss." My brethren, Hugh Price Hughes was everlastingly right. His cry was a cry of warning and appeal to every man who dares to preach the Gospel. The abyss may differ at different times, it differs with different men, but its yawning maw is ever there.—From a Sermon by Rev. Dr. Andrew Gillies in Zion's Herald.

—Rev. J. T. Black, of the Muskingum Conference, M. P. Church, has been appointed pastor of a United Brethren Church in Sacramento, California.

—The church has never been authorized to content itself with saying to the world, "Meet us in the meeting-house." Its commission is to go and preach to every creature.

—Prof. M. H. Holt has been away for months for treatment for his health. He returns to take up his work improved in health.

—Rev. John A. Gilmer, pastor of Mt. Airy and Madison Presbyterian churches, died a few days ago.

—Woodrow Wilson Melvin is the name of a Greensboro baby born last November. This boy was pronounced a "perfect baby" in the recent contest, and President Wilson wrote a nice letter to the parents. And that was not all: President Wilson stopped at our station ten minutes on Tuesday and called for Woodrow Wilson Melvin. Woodrow Wilson Melvin was not far away, but such was the throng about the President's car that the two did not meet.

—Dr. Turrentine, president of G. F. College, preached a fine sermon for us of Grace church last Sunday.

A Word from Prof. Holt.

I passed the Orphanage last week, and I must say that in design and location it does great credit to our denomination —and would do credit to any church in the State. I want to congratulate the committee. J. Allen Holt.

A Question for Boys.

Why are the fore wheels of a wagon made smaller than the hind wheels?

GINGER AND THE CATS.

Annie Balcomb Wheeler.

Ginger is a big shaggy dog the exact color of ground ginger. He is such a pet of the family that he is allowed to sleep in the house. His bed is on the kitchen lounge, and Mistress made him a little mattress to keep him warmer. This is kept during the day at the foot of an unused stairway. When it is bedtime, Master says, "Come, Ginger, it's time to go to bed."

"Bow-wow," says Ginger, and off he trots, seizes his mattress, drags it across the floor, then pulls it up to the foot of the lounge. It is funny to see him chase around in a circle two or three times before he curls himself up for the night. In the morning he drags his mattress back to the stairway.

Buff and Peggy are two coon cats who live in the same house. Buff is big and good-natured, but Peggy is little, old and somewhat spoiled. Ginger has been taught to be kind to the cats, and they in turn are more friendly than cats usually are, still they are more or less jealous of his greater privileges. They have to sleep out in the barn.

One cold winter morning, Master had business for Ginger before he had time to do his chamber-work. When Ginger came in again, Buff and Peggy had taken possession of his bed. Buff was jubilantly working her paws up and down, and purring like a big automobile. Peggy was curled into a fluffy ball, and merely opened one eye when Ginger appeared. Ginger looked at the cats, then pranced and whined. No doubt he was trying to say, quite politely, "Excuse me, but it is time to put my bed away." He whined once more to make sure they heard him.

"Now there'll be a scrap," declared Mistress. "I'll bet on Peggy."

"I'll bet on Ginger, if it is two to one," contradicted Master. "Here, Ginger, go put your bed away."

"Bow-wow, bow-wow," barked Ginger, going a bit nearer the cats.

Buff stopped treading and purring, huffed up her back and spat defiantly. Peggy didn't move at Buff's warlike attitude, but it was noticed that she was watching Ginger from her two slits of eyes.

"Go put your bed away," repeated Master.

"Bow-wow, bow-wow," answered Ginger, dashing forward, then back with the speed of lightning, while Buff spat and Peggy tightened her paw for a stroke. They had the coveted bed and seemed willing to fight to keep it.

"I told you to put your bed away," threatened Master.

Ginger groveled at his feet, looking up as if to ask, "What can one poor dog do against two cats?"

"Ginger!" and Master stamped his foot.

Ginger stopped, straightened up, then took a fighting position. Peggy got to her feet in haste, and both cats had a paw raised expectantly.

"Ur-r-r," growled Peggy.

"Spit, spit," went Buff.

Ginger didn't bark, he was waiting. When he saw that Peggy's paw had relaxed a bit he made a rush, grabbed a corner of the mattress, and down it came, cats and all.

What a mix-up there was for a few minutes! Mistress jumped upon a chair to be out of the way. What a squirming, twisting, and waving of gray tails and yellow tails; what a spitting, growling, and "ki-yi-ing," for Peggy and Buff were taking their revenge on Ginger. Then the air cleared. Ginger dragged his property away to safety, and Buff and Peggy scuttled under the stove, where they nursed their injured feelings and glared out to see what would happen next.

"Good dog," praised Master, when the bed was in place.

"Good dog? You mean poor dog," protested Mistress, getting down. "Look at his nose." Ginger whined and laid his nose on her lap. He felt as he did last year when he had a fight with the porcupine. He had three long, deep scratches d wn his nose.

"Never mind, Ginger," said Master, patting him, "those saucy cats will never get on your bed again," and they never did.—Zion's Herald.

A DAY IN THE JUNGLE.

Streaks of dawn are appearing; it is five o,clock, time for us to get up and prepare for our day in the jungle.

We are far up above the clouds, which lie in fleecy beauty in the valleys, the uplands and hilltops appearing from them as islands in a pure, white sea. The eastern sky is glorious now in the full morning light, but the valleys are still filled with mist. The air is fresh and keen, making us ready for an early breakfast before setting out.

Now we are off on foot, leading our unwilling ponies down the steep, rocky path that descends from the bungalow. As we plunge into the jungle and look around, the pleasure of being alive is keen within us. Whenever a break in the trees allows, our eyes wander over the distant view, along the wall of hills, fringed with foliage, circling us round.

When the distant view is hidden, there is plenty of interest to occupy the attention close at hand. Here are one, two three tree ferns. There are quanties of the umbrella palm everywhere; the umbrella-shapepd leaves, each with edge indented, and the white, tassel--like flowers, are luxuriant. The ground is thick with growth—green grass and leaves, and brown stems and stalks—all sparkling with morning dew, while the delicate gauzy spiders' webs, only this morning spun afresh, spangle as if set with diamonds. A few flowers are in bloom, but only a few, as the season is early.

Creepers are everywhere, and of mammoth growth, having reared themselves from the valley below to a height far above my head. They are supported by twisted, rope-like stems, erect or bent and curved, and have finally attached themselves and are clinging to tall trees over the foliage of which they grow like a mantle adorned with sprays of the beautiful white flowers of the creeper.

I hear a sound above me and, looking up, see a brown monkey running along the branch. He jumps from tree to tree, then settles on a branch and looks superciliously down, while he deliberately drops the remains of his lunch on my horse's head. Near by follow quite a colony of his species. Among the crowd are one or two carrying their babies in their arms.

I mount my pony so that I can look about in every direction with undivided attention, as then I need no longer notice my footsteps. How charming to be, for a time at all events, independent of trains, trams or steamers; no motor car here with its attendant and annoying cloud of dust, and its disturbing ways.

Do I hear a train? No, it is only two grotesque hornbills puffing through the air as they fly together across the sky Then all is quiet and I stand for a moment to let the exquisite peace of nature sink into my soul. I listen. There is stillness, but the quiet has harmony in it; there is no harshness in the insect's buzz or the contented croak of the birds. Now a bulbul sings its low, sweet song, and then a wagtail runs along, with an agility all its own.

What is the matter with the bamboos? They are yellow and withered; the beautiful green of this giant, feathery grass has given place to flowers, and purple pear-shaped fruit. These bamboos flower once in nineteen or twenty years, then die. The houses of the villages for many miles around are chiefly constructed of bamboo, but it can be used for this purpose only when green. As I ride along, I hear the crack, crack of the falling and dead bamboo stems. For a year or so, there will be scarcity of building material, and food. The rats, finding ample feeding store in the bamboo seed, increase, consume the grain, and then famine follows. It is expected next year.

Another loop in the road rounded, and I come upon a shady glade into which the sun's rays apparently never pierce with too great heat. For a moment I imagine myself in a Devonshire lane.

A little farther on we reach the boats by which we are to go down the river, and our trip through the jungle is over. —Indian Witness.

CASTE IN REAL LIFE.

Miss Sara Pollock.

It was a hot, breathless day in the missionary bungalow at Periakulum station, in South India. The leaves of the tall trees in the compound were stirless and the air visibly palpitated with heat as it rose from the ground. The Pulney Mountains, only six miles away, rising in their majesty to sublime altitudes of coolness and beauty, seemed only to shut off any wandering breeze that might have brought momentary refreshment. Even the sound of the brook that had dashed down from the mountain tops and which flowing through the garden sometimes brought a suggestion of coolness from the serene heights above, was low.

The young wife, mother of two little children, was alone in the house, for her husband, upon whom had recently come the responsibilities of this large station, was itinerating up the great Kambam valley, visiting some of its numerous villages.

The sound of the brook might be low, but not so the sound of the tomtom, for the "cholera mother was angry," and hour after hour the bodies of her supposed victims were being carried past the bungalow from the town of Periakulum to the burning ground of the dead.

Forty miles from a physician, it is not strange that the mother thought of her children, but hers was a brave young heart, and she stayed her soul on God.

Sunset came at last. The great orb of fire dropped behind the Pulneys, and the weary mother came out to catch new courage from their gold and purple glories, for "the strength of the hills is His also." She saw approaching her verandah a poor stranger bowed in agony, for the dread disease was upon him, and, rejected by his own countrymen, where could a stranger turn in such a case save to the alien white lady?

Regardless of her own danger she prepared remedies and ministered to him; then she called her servant and said, "Take this poor man to the kitchen (which in that hot climate is always detached from the house), where he can be kept warm, and give him this medicine. We may be able to save his life."

Her servant bowed in acquiescense, and at the call of her children she returned to her room, and in due time retired. Had this young missionary been longer in India, had she known more of the iron rule of caste, she might have anticipated the result.

In the early morning, when she stepped on the verandah to get a breath of air, she was startled, horrified, to see there, still under the window, the stark figure of the poor stranger who had been left alone in his extremity to die. In haste she called her servant.

"Why did you not help this man into the warm kitchen and give him the medicine as I told you?"

"I could not, Ammah, he was not of our caste."

"But you have let him die! Do you care more for your caste than you do for a life?"

"I could not touch him, Ammah, he was not of our caste.»

"Well, it is too late now, but you must remove him from the verandah as quickly as possible."

"I cannot do it, Ammah! He is not of my caste."

The young mother was aghast. She had been willing to take risks to save a life, but, at a time when cholera raged, to leave the remains of one who had died from it under her window, in that torrid clime, was like courting death itself. She commanded, urged, in vain. She pointed out to her servant the danger to himself and his family as well as to herself and her children, only to be met with the answer, "If I should touch him I should break caste, I should become an outcast from my people. I should lose all my share of the family inheritance, I cannot do it.

Only by sending to the town and demanding help from the government official, was a scavenger—a man so low whe had no caste to lose—secured to do the last offices for this fellow-being. O Hinduism! thy heart is as the nether millstone. O Caste! thou art as cruel as the grave.—Mission Studies.

THE INFLUENCE OF A TRACT

A young Frenchman who had been wounded at the siege of Saint Quentin was languishing on a pallet in the hospital when a tract that lay on the coverlet caught his eye. He read it and was converted by it. You may see the monument of that man before the Church of the Consistory in Paris known in history as Admiral Coligny, the leader of the Reformation in France. But the tract had not yet finished its work. It was read by Coligny's nurse, a "sister of mercy," who penitently placed it in the hands of the Lady Abbess, and she, too, was converted by it. She fled from France to the Palatinate, where she met a young Hollander and became his wife. The influence which she had upon that man reached out into the Reformation on the entire continent of Europe, for he was William of Orange. "How far yon little candle threw its beams!" Who knows what the power of the tract may be?—D. J. Burrell.

THE GREAT DELIVERER

The captain of a vessel was once caught in the fury of a terrible storm in mid-winter on the great lakes. His beautiful ship was being slowly but surely crushed in the great fields of ice that closed about it. His heart sank within him as he saw the last chance of escape cut off. It was only the question of a few minutes when the pressure of the ice would crush his vessel like an egg shel. He dropped his wheel and went below into his cabin and fell on his knees. He begged and wrestled with God to interpose to save his ship—the ship that was the realization of the dream of his long, hard struggle in life. The lives of his crew were also the burden of his petition. Many of them were unprepared to be hurled into eternity with so little warning. He plead as Jacob plead, and like Jacob, he prevailed.

He rose from his knees and went back to the wheel. Suddenly a breeze sprung up immediately behind him. In a few minutes it had grown to the velocity of a gale. Its pressure suddenly parted the ice before the ship, and blowing fiercer and fiercer, the ice field was hurled back across the dark waters. A cheer went up from the men and a sailor rushed up to the captain and said: "Shall we give her more canvas, sir?" The captain replied, "Don't touch her! Another hand is on this wheel. Almighty God is guiding this ship. Do not put your hand on sail or sheet."—Selected.

—Billy Sunday: "The saloon will take off the shirt from the back of a shivering man. It will take the coffin from under the dead. It will take the milk from the breast of a poor mother who is the wife of a drinking man. It will take the crust of bread from the hand of the hungry child. It cares for nothing but itself—for its dirty profits. It will keep your boy out of college. It will make your daughter a prostitute. It will bury your wife in the potter's field. It will send you to hell."

FROM LOCAL REPORTERS

Burlington.

Last Sunday was observed as Home Department and Cradle Roll Day in our Sunday school. The attendance was 252, and the offering amounted to $6.31. The program which had been prepared in advance was well rendered.

Our special meeting began Sunday morning. Rev. J. R. Hutton arrived on Sunday afternoon and is preaching some searching and stirring sermons. The attendance upon the services is good, the church being well filled at the first service. The prospects for a revival seem very encouraging. C. B. W.

Thomasville.

Our special meeting began the second Sunday in this month and lasted nine days. Bro. D. R. Williams of High Point was our pastor's help and he certainly did some fine preaching. We were glad to have him with us. There were sixteen conversions. Twelve of these gave their names to join our church. All the services were well attended and much interest manifested; but as the writer looked over the well filled church one evening I couldn't help but think of the verse, "The harvest is white but the laborers are few." Oh, we need more laborers in this field.

Our fourth quarterly conference was held last Wednesday night with Pres. C. A. Cecil presiding. We were glad to have him and Mrs. Cecil with us.

Our delegate was instructed by a large majority to bring Rev. T. A. Williams back to us for another year. Bro. Williams preached two fine sermons to us Sunday. The two Misses McCulloch who are here teaching in the schools worshiped with us Sunday. Sunday school is getting on finely; there are 404 scholars on roll now.

Siler City.

Sunday was a glad day for our church here. It was the day for the dedication of our building. The day itself was a beautiful one, cool, clear and crisp, just the right kind of a day for a large congregation to come out, and the congregation was there. The church was filled to overflowing, all could not get in.

The exercises began at 11 o'clock. The pastor, Rev. J. M. Bowman, presented the Rev. P. M. ndArews, of Greensboro, who preached the sermon, and it was a great sermon, one of the best ever preached here, and the great congregation enjoyed it fully.

Bro. L. L. Wrenn presented the church for dedication. The exercise closed with the singing of the doxology and the benediction by Bro. Andrews.

The fourth and last quarterly conference was held here Saturday. Bro. Bowman presided. Every church represented, and reports from each church splendid. Two of them have paid all claims and the rest have nearly paid out on all assessments. The first quarterly conference for next year will be held at Piny Grove Church. G. E. M.

Ringwood, Halifax Ct.

Our pastor, Bro. Pritchard, filled his regular appointment here Sunday, giving us one of his best sermons. They are all good, but I think this was the best yet, or probably it was the one we needed most. Sorry there wasn't a large crowd out to hear him. The more we see of Bro. Pritchard, the better we like him and hope Conference may see fit to send him back to us next year. We are painting the inside of our church now, and it will add much to the appearance.

Spring Church.

Our Sunday school is getting on finely. The attendance for the past month has been good. Our school has decided to give a Sunday's collection of each month to the M. P. Orphanage. The 4th Sunday has been set apart for the collection; the first one was taken last Sunday which amounted to $6.30.

Bro. Ledbetter filled his regular appointment here last Sunday, delivering a good sermon, as he usually does. He has only one more appointment here for this year. We hope Conference will see fit to send him back for the coming year. He has been so dutiful and faithful to his work this year that we feel he is the right man in the right place.

Fourth and last quarterly conference was held here last Saturday. Some of the church officers were elected for the coming year: G. F. Robinson, class leader; J. W. Crew, assistant; G. W. Massey, Supt. and R. M. Robinson assistant. The same board of stewards and trustees were elected.

Messrs. E. C. Dimick and G. W. Massey were our nominess to Annual Conference. G. W. Massey is declared delegate. We hope for a pleasant session of Conference this year, a Conference that will be pleased to return our same pastor. Nannie Massey.

Moriah, Tabernacle Ct.

Bro. Johnson preached a very impressive sermon this afternoon. The key to it was that we should have such a desire to do right that we would fear to do wrong. Bro. Johnson shows that he has an unsurpassable interest in our spiritual condition, a fact which we appreciate so much.

The fourth and last quarterly conference will be held next Saturday, Nov.1, at Tabernacle church. There will be preaching at 11 o'clock and the business will be transacted after dinner. Let all members make Bro. Johnson feel good by their presence.

Lee's Chapel, Halifax Ct.

As our reporter has been sick for the last two months with fever, I will give a short report. Our pastor was rained out the 3d Sun. in Oct. So he sent me a card saying that he would preach for us last Sat. at 3 P. M. He and his good wife were there on time. We enjoyed his sermon very much. I was glad to see his good wife looking so well. I think they have about decided to stay with us another year if the Conference say so. We have the best Sunday school that we have had in several years. I do not think we will freeze out this winter. Bro. Porter is doing a fine work in the Sunday school and the children all like him.

I think Bro. Judgemall is mistaken about Bro. Slewfoot being dead. I think he will write again with more life than ever. R. A. Hardy.

Mt. Lebanon, Randleman Ct.

Our revival meeting began the fourth Sunday in September and continued nine days. Rev. R. L. Troxler was the visiting preacher. He preached earnestly and faithfully until the meeting closed. His preaching was highly enjoyed by all. We were glad to have him and hope he will be with us again. May God wonderfully bless him and his labor. We had a very good meeting—best for some time. There were over twenty conversions and several reclamations. Our church was both built up and revived. Bro. O'Briant preached a good sermon Sunday morning, but the congregation was small on account of the weather.

Good wishes to the "Herald" and its readers.

Sunday at 11 o'clock was a glorious time at our church. Bro. Suits preached to the children. His Scripture lesson was Ephesians 6th chapter and his subject was "A wise son maketh a glad fa-

DENTON HIGH SCHOOL

——OPENS SEPTEMBER 1, 1913——

DENTON is situated in the Piedmont hills of Davidson County twenty miles South from Thomasville on the Carolina and Yadkin River Rail Road. This Railroad connects us with the Southern at Thomasville and High Point on the north and with the Southbound at High Rock on the South. About 350 yards west from the depot on Salisbury Street, nestling among a beautiful grove of oaks, is the home of Denton High School.

OUR COURSE OF STUDY prepares for any College, also for our State University. We give each student personal atention and do everything necessary for their comfort and advancement. A thoroughly competent teacher has been employed for the Music Department, and those who take this course will receive special attention. A High School Business Course will be taught free of charge as to tuition. Special work in Pedagogy for those who intend to teach.

FREE TUITION to ministerial students and children of the ministers of the North Carolina Conference. Cost of all necessary expenses for a year ranges from $115 to $145. We board students in good private homes. Indigent young men can get rooms and board themselves at actual cost. If any one wishes to pay a part or even all expenses by work, write the Principal for particulars. The school uses water from deep drilled wells with pumps, which eliminates all danger from germs in the water. Pure air, pure water, plenty of work; if these do not give health to the student, he will never have it. Write the Principal at Denton, N. C., for any further information.

CHINESE MAGAZINES FOR WOMEN

Chinese women are eager to read, and many newspapers are published for them. There are several such in Shanghai made up mostly of translations of second-rate English fiction. Since April, 1912, the Christian Literature Society has issued a magazine, called "The Women's Messenger." This contains articles in Mandarin on hygiene, the care and bringing-up of children, good stories, and explanations of Christian truth. It is extremely popualr and reaching large numbers of women. The Young Women's Christian Association in Shanghai is responsible for several departments of it, viz., Association notes, school news, games and biography. This magazine goes monthly into many non-Chriistian homes and is eagerly read. Perhaps its influence has much to do with the fact that in many heathen homes, the idols are being entirely given up, and the religious ceremonies of the family being performed only before the ancestral tablets.—Zeitschrift fur Missions-kunde und Religious-Wissenschaft and *The Foreign Annual of the Y. Are you "Growing in Grace" these swiftly fleeting years? That does not mean are you growing in church society, nor even, necessarily, in church activity. And it may not mean in visions and revelations. But are your sympathies broader? Are you more sorry for earth's Christless ones than ever you were before? Are you doing more for them? Are you giving more money, in proportion to your income, than ever before? Are you living more for God and less for self? Are you more kind and patient? Do you pray more? And, beneath all, do you live more upon the Word of God? For we "grow in grace" as we grow "in the knowledge of Jesus Christ."—Selected.

Elon College

For Both Men and Women

Elon College, North Carolina

For a quarter century Elon College has rendered the best families of the South a paragon service in providing young men and young women with the best mental, moral and physical training under positive Christian influences, tho entirely free from sectarianism.

Karl Lehman, of Boston, testifies that "of all the Colleges I have visited as International Field Secretary of Christian Endeavor during six years, the spirit of Elon College appeals to me as most genuinely Christian." Elon College is situated in the delightful hill country, a section unsurpassed for beauty, with a climate far-famed for its healthfulness. There is no medical fee, for there is no necessity for it. Its campus, comprising twenty-five acres of native oak and hickory, shrubbery, winding walks and driveways, is one of the most beautiful in the South and, with its two unsurpassed gymnasia, provides abundant opportunity for recreation and relaxation.

The splendid equipment of Elon College was only made possible through liberal endowment. It maintains seven elegant new buildings, especially designed and appointed for college work. These are furnished with every known convenience; steam heat, electric lights, running water, baths and sewerage. The College plant is conservatively valued at $300,000.00.

Elon College is distinctly a high-grade institution, though its charges are moderate. Its graduates are admitted to the graduate departments of all the great universities without examination. Its literary and scientific courses are arranged in various departments which lead to the degrees of Master of Arts, Bachelor of Arts, Bachelor of Science, Bachelor of Philosophy, Bachelor of Pedagogy, and a three-years' course leading to the degree of Licentiate of Instruction, designed especially for teachers. DIED.

Qualls.

Bro. John Qualls was born in Orange County, N. C., May 17, 1841. Married to Martha Sykes Aug. 4, 1868, and died on Oct. 2, 1913, being seventy-two years, four months and twenty-five days old. During the war between the States Bro. Qualls was a member of Co. I, 17th N. C. regiment and faithfully served his State in the capacity of a private. He was the father of four children, three of whom and the widow survive him. Early in life he joined the Missionary Baptist Church, but when the Methodist Protestant Church was organized in Mebane by Bro. W. D. Fogleman, he united with the church here and was faithful to his church, always in his place till failing health forced him to remain at home. Whatever may have been the storm and tempest of the past, his last years were full of hope. During his last days he was a great sufferer and frequently when in great pain would audibly pray for grace and strength to endure the torture, saying as he prayed: "It is all right and I do not mean to complain." As he looked forward to his approaching dissolution he would pray for sustaining grace when the last hour should come. He frequently said to me: "If it were not for the goodness and grace of the blessed Lord, what would I do?" He has met the last enemy and through Jesus Christ he has conquered. The day following his death we laid him to rest in the Methodist Protestant cemetery at Efland, N. C. For some time he and his wife had lived with his son David in Mebane. During his last illness he had every attention that could be given. Brother David and his wife were tireless in their ministrations. May the Lord comfort those who survive and keep and lead each in the way that leads to a home beyond. W. E. Swain.

CONFERENCE BROTHERHOOD.

Proposed Amendments to Constitution.

The committee appointed to recommend amendments to the constitution of the Brotherhood recommend the following:

1. Admit non-beneficiary members.
2. Make the assessment fee of the non-beneficiary member one dollar as a minimum and ten dollars as a maximum.
3. Change the assessment of the beneficiary member from $3 to $5.
4. Change the initiation fee of the beneficiary member from fifty cents to one dollar.
5. Change the constitution so as to readmit to the Brotherhood all those ministerial members who are in bad standing on the payment of one dollar as an initiation fee.

—Missionary Review: "One hundred years ago only one college student in ten professed faith in Jesus Christ, even in this Christian country. Today about 50 per cent. of all college students are professed Christians. A hundred years ago college students thought less about Christian missions than they did about the climate of Mars or the rings of Saturn. Today the Student Volunteer Movement enlists hundreds of bright, well-trained, educated young men and women for the missionary field. Yale University, through its students and alumni, is raising $200,000 for the equipment of a mission in Changsha, China, and other great educational institutions are giving like heed to the missionary cause. The Christianization of the world by preaching and teaching and living the Gospel is now a world problem, and sane men everywhere are giving heed to it."

—Dr. J. B. Gambrell: "There are certain agreements among Christians which invite co-operation for efficiency. Let us take the temperance question, now such a live matter among us. Happily, there is a wide agreement among Christians on the temperance question. It would be silly for them not to co-operate. The fight is broader than churches. It does not go on church lines nor ordinances. I am perfectly wiling, as an individual, to co-operate with sinners, infidels, Catholics or any in a fight on saloons. But to come closer in, suppose a convention were called, free for all, to emphasize the supernatural in religion, against the materialism of the age. I could go to the meeting, and would in no way feel embarrassed to sit on the platform with Cardinal Gibbons and speak with him for what we both believe. But that would not align the Baptist churches with the Catholic hierarchy, nor would it be an endorsement of the soundness of the Catholic Church."

Brother, has your church or Sunday-school given aid to support the Children's Home or have you? If you have, you don't regret it, do you? If you have not aided in a worthy cause, like caring for helpless children, you will want to if you could see the children in our Home.

It is not possible for all the members of our church to visit the Home, so just instruct your pastor and delegate not to come home from the Annual Conference at High Point without going out to see the Children's Home and then act when they tell you what is being done and what is needed. If they are dissatisfied they will be the first. Those who have contributed congratulate the building committee for its work and rejoice that they have shared in the work and say, "I am going to do more."

I sincerely hope you will give Bro. Millikan's letter your prayerful consideration and on Thanksgiving or near that day contribute one day's wages or one day's income to the Home.

GETTING READY TO MOVE.

The owner of the tenement which I have occupied for many years has given notice that he will furnish but little or nothing more for repairs. I am advised to be ready to move.

At first this was not a very welcome notice. The surroundings here are in many respects very pleasant, and were it not for the evidence of decay, I should consider the old house good enough. But even a light wind causes it to tremble and totter, and all the braces are not sufficient to make it secure. So I am getting ready to move.

It is strange how quickly one's interest is transferred to the prospective home. I have been consulting maps of the new country and reading descriptions of its inhabitants. One who visited it has returned, and from him I learn that it is beautiful beyond description; language breaks down in attempting to tell of what he heard while there. He says than in order to make an investment there, he has suffered the loss of all things that he owned here, and even rejoices in what others would call making a sacrifice.

Another, whose love to me has been proven by the greatest possible test, is now there. He has sent me several clusters of the most delicious fruits. After tasting them, all food here seems insipid.

Two or three times I have been down by the border of the river that forms the boundary, and have wished myself among the company of those who were singing praises to the King on the other side.

Many of my friends have moved there. Before leaving they spoke of my coming later. I have seen the smile upon their faces as they passed out of my sight.

Often I am asked to make some new investments here, but my answer in every case is, "I am getting ready to move."

Jesus Christ possesses an unimpeachable and absolute right over us. He has the right of Creator: "It is he that hath made us, and not we ourselves." He has the right of Benefactor, not only in the realm of temporal, but of spiritual existence. He has the right of Redeemer.. This is the greatest claim of all. But our decision demands declaration: He will not have His servants live in secret and retirement. They are to proclaim and publish the fact that they are for Him.—F. B. Meyer.

—Under a big black headline, "Russia Bars Out Baptist Church," the following telegram is given from St. Petersburg: "The Russian ministry of the interior is credited today by the Novoe Vreyma with the intention of permitting the holy synod to proclaim the Baptists as a 'sect especially harmful to the state', and therefore not eligible for registration and not possessing the right of liberty of worship. The action of the government is attributed by the newspapers to recent refusals of Baptists to take the military oath. The Baptist World's Alliance, during its session in Philadelphia in 1911, raised $70,000 for the establishment of a Baptist seminary in St. Petersburg, and two Baptist ministers were appointed to proceed to the Russian capital to seek permission from the emperor for the erection of the buildings."

—The Congregationalist: "We find it rather ungracious in the Roman Catholic newspapers which are printing complaints that the words we sing as a national hymn and call 'America' are sectional and sectarian. One such paper, after saying that it is 'a sectional song, by a Yankee Protestant minister who wrote it for a Protestant Sunday school picnic', goes on to say: 'If any of our readers happen to be present on an occasion when this offense (the singing of America) shall be repeated, we advise them to hiss, and hiss vigorously.' This is the sort of utterance that keeps alive the popular suspicion of the good faith of the Roman Catholic authorities in their profession of Americanism. The editor of this silly and mischief-breeding advice should read Mary Antin's story, 'The Lie', in the August Atlantic, and see how the singing of Dr. Smith's verses affected the son of a Russian Jew."

—The committee appointed to propose amendments to the constitution of the Brotherhood submit their report this week and invite discussion of it.

"MOTHER."

Mrs. Sarah McCulloch fell asleep on Thursday night of last week at the advanced age of ninety years, nine months and five days. She died in Asheboro at the home of her only daughter, Mrs. R. R. Ross, who had tenderly cared for her during all the years of her second childhood.

She had been twice married; the first time to John Teague, the second to Joseph D. McCulloch and had been a widow the second time for more than forty-four years. Her living children are W. J. Teague, of Asheboro; R. F. Teague, of Climax; Rev. T. F. McCulloch, of the North Carolina Conference; Mrs. R. R. Ross, of Asheboro; J. F. McCulloch, editor of the Methodist Protestant Herald; A. E. McCulloch, of Pleasant Garden; and C. E. McCulloch, of Wilmington. Another son died in childhood. There are living about thirty-five grand-children and about the same number of great-grand-children. Joseph McCulloch had been married before, and brought to the new home two sons who grew up under the same roof with the others, thus bringing three sets of children into one family. One of these two sons is David McCulloch, now of Greensboro; the other died years ago, leaving one son, John, who lived, married, and died near Tabernacle church, leaving a family.

"Mother" was a daughter of Robert Julian who before his going to Illinois to live lived where the town of Julian afterwards sprang up. She was of French and Dutch extraction with we presume an admixture of English blood, and combined in her disposition in good degree the vivacity of the French and the equableness of temper of the Dutch. She was rarely angry, and never seemed to have the blues. She had much affliction in her family and passed through the troubles of the Civil War; in it all she maintained a buoyant hopeful spirit.

She became a Christian in her girlhood and first joined the Baptist Church. At the time of her death she had been for perhaps more than sixty years a member of the Methodist Protestant Church at Tabernacle. At this church we buried her last Saturday. Grandsons acted as pall bearers. It was a comfort to us to have her last two pastors, Revs. T. M. Johnson and T. J. Ogburn, conduct the funeral.

"Mother" was faithful in church attendance as long as she was able to go, and could hardly be kept from going after she became so feeble that it was not safe for her to go. It was not her disposition to be demonstrative of her religious feelings. In times of emotional excitement, while others about her were shouting the praises of God, tears would flow from her eyes and her face would become radiant with joy, but that was all.

It grieved her deeply when people did wrong and she prayed, especially for her children, that they might be saved from wrong-doing. She believed that God answers prayer. One time she told me of this occurrence: A man in her community was exerting a very bad influence over young men by the sale of whiskey, which he did contrary to law. Revenue officers tried to stop him and failed. Then she asked the Lord to stop him. Soon after his leg was broken by his horses and the poor fellow after lingering for weeks died from the injury. This recital awoke in me a feeling of awe of the power of a good woman's prayer.

"Mother" in her home life was kind to people poorer than she and to domestic servants, including slaves. To her people were people, irrespective of social condition.

"Mother" did not profess to be perfect, but I believe that she was conscious of no fault which she did not try to overcome. I believe she is now with those who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. What a joy it will be to her to be permitted to welcome her children and all her descendants as they come, one by one! May no one of them all fail to trust in and obey Him who is the only Way.

—Let us not think about jumping into alligators and whales. If a union is formed which sacrifices that for which we ought to stand, don't you see that it will be our duty to stand for the same things still, even though we have to stand alone? But I do not expect such a union to be formed, though I thus speak.

—A brother asks why the golden texts in our Sunday-school papers are not given as in the King James Version. We presume it is because the editor thought it better to give them from some other version. It may be explained to those who do not understand that the Bible was not originally written in English, but a part of it in Hebrew and a part in Greek. There have been several versions or translations made and some Bible readers prefer one and some another. No one believes that the translators were divinely inspired. It is well to compare different versions, as they supplement each other.

—Statistics show that there is an average of fourteen deaths every day caused by the dangerous custom of walking on railroad tracks or otherwise trespassing on such property. DON'T DO IT!

—The Moody Bible Institute of Chicago had 1947 students during the past year. They represented 27 different denominations, 37 States and 23 foreign countries. 142 were graduated, of whom a large proportion had foreign missionary work in view, although the Institute is proving to be a great help to Home Missionary Boards in supplying men for frontier fields in our own land. It also does a great work in Chicago, where the larger part of the students obtain their training in practical Christian work. Last year they conducted or rendered other service in 16,033 religious meetings in the city, taught 13,161 Bible and mission study clases, made 21,244 personal calls, conversed with 35,722 persons on the subject of salvation and reported 4,721 souls who had professed conversion to Jesus Christ.

—Rev. C. E. M. Raper was called to attend the funeral of Mrs. Atsy White at Hickory Grove Oct. 20th. She and her husband were school children of his 29 years ago.

—Next week we hope to give the answer of the President of the General Conference to some questions regarding the union movement.

SPECIAL EFFORT FOR THE CHILDREN'S HOME.

A few weeks ago the Finance Committee of the Children's Home published a statement showing amount collected on pledges for the Home which was $13,411.04, and a balance due on pledges of $4,632.37. The building and farm cost about $25,000, so it will be seen that if all pledges are paid we will still have a debt of over $5,000. We know the friends of this institution realize the importance of paying this indebtedness as early as possible, and we have therefore adopted a plan by which we hope to raise the money with which to cancel the indebtedness within sixty days.

We have secured a list of the stewards of our Church, not only in North Carolina, but of every church in the United States, and we are writing each one a personal letter requesting a contribution from each member of the Church on Thanksgiving of an amount equal to one day's income or one day's wages. To secure the names of the stewards we addressed a letter to each pastor requesting a list of their stewards. The letters the pastors write about the Children's Home are very gratifying, and we believe our people are going to respond liberally to this call.

Rev. J. McLean Brown, of Oxford, Md., writes: "I enclose my personal check for $5.00 and pray that it may be magnified a thousand fold."

Rev. J. A. Rhodes, pastor Methodist Protestant Church at Cowan, Indiana, writes: "The work you are engaged in is one of the most needed and important of our Church, and he that careth not for his own house is worse than an infidel. I will do what I can to stimulate the enterprise here. May God bless the good work already done, and those who are pushing it."

Rev. S. S. Stanton, President of the Indiana Conference, says: "Am pleased with the work you are doing and your plan for financing the Home should succeed. To help it along, find my check for $5.00."

Dr. Lyman Edwyn Davis, President of our General Conference, sends a strong endorsement of the proposition. He says:

"I heartily endorse the plan proposed by the trustees and managers of the Children's Home at High Point for the support of that worthy institution. They are to ask Methodist Protestants to contribute to the Home a sum equal to one day's income, whether wages, salary or profits; and who will not be willing to help so great a cause to this extent? How it will sweeten our Thanksgiving feast if we can come to the table bringing with us the happy remembrance of having assisted in giving shelter and comfort to homeless children. My benediction upon the Children's Home, and upon every heart enlisted in that good and noble enterprise.'"

We have quoted the above letters in order that our people in North Carolina may know that our Church as a whole is becoming greatly interested in the Children's Home.

J. M. Millikan,
Chairman Board of Directors.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

Dear Editor: The sales of shares in the "Horses and Hack" are going lively this morning.

The first contribution outside of High Point to reach me came from one of our business men whom I never knew to fail to respond to an appeal for help from his church or Lord. This brother said he had the check already written out to contribute in some way to the Home and so sent it immediately for this enterprise. Think of having your check written and ready just waiting for the doors to open that you may deposit in heaven's bank. We say "Well done," and what wins the "Well done" of your fellow-laborers will, we are sure, win the "Well done" of the Master.

A visitor to the Home left the price of two shares with Bro. Garrett on Sunday. On Tuesday I received such a glad letter from a brother who said he was so glad to send the money that he came near writing "eight shares" in the date line of his letter. This brother also notified Dr. Reitzel that he was sending the price of eight shares who spoke to me over the phone and said, "I'm afraid I won't get any of those shares, so I am going to write my check at once for five shares and will come by and leave the check."

A young lady wrote me inclosing the price of five shares, and said, "I have begun to tithe, which makes it easy for me to give when calls come." We drove out into the country yesterday on business and incidentally met with two persons who took one share each. I have never undertaken to collect for any cause where the people responded more gladly than to this.

Lest you didn't see the first article, our project is this: We are selling shares in a Sunday-school hack, a team of horses, a wagon, and harness, at one dollar per share.

Since last week 28 shares have been taken, leaving 559 and one-half shares yet to be taken. Sunday schools and individuals are asked to take these shares anywhere from one to five. Who'll be the next? In His name,

Mrs. A. G. Dixon.

THE CONSUMPTION OF LIQUORS.

By Rev. T. J. Ogburn.

There exists in the public mind, as indicated in the editorials and contributions of various newspapers, such perplexity over the statistics of the United States Internal Revenue report for 1913 showing an increase in the per capita consumption of intoxicants, although seventy-two per cent. of our country's territory, are under prohibition, that I feel moved to write about the matter.

The revenue statistics give the number of gallons removed from the government bonded warehouses—not the amount consumed—in any year. The production of liquors had for many years so far exceeded the demand that there had accumulated in these warehouses a vast surplus, so that millions of gallons had to be withdrawn whether the trade demanded it or not, the legal eight-year period for bonding having expired during the period covered in the revenue report for 1913. Wholesale liquor dealers are now holding much of this withdrawn surplus in their private warehouses awaiting the increased consumption prematurely reported. The amount withdrawn in 1913 and reported consumed for a few years had been surprisingly small.

The so-called increase in drinking is not worrying our anti-saloon friends, politically; nor is it bringing joy to the liquor men. Both parties know that prohibition does not increase drinking and that in the stock market there is an increasing shrinkage in the value of liquor securities. Dry statistics are sounding the death knell of the liquor business, and the liquor men dolefully acknowledge it. And their waning, dying business shows that prohibition does not increase drinking; as for instance: In 1906 the brewers and distillers of America spent $14,578,000 in new buildings and extension of their busines, and the churches $5,632,751 for new buildings. In 1912 the churches spent $14,870,506 on new plants, and the liquor men spent $2,937,783. This year Christian people are spending ten times as much for new buildings as the liquor men are spending for new liquor enterprises—a change in seven years from a ratio of 2 and 1-3 to 1 for the liquor business to a ratio of 10 to 1 for the churches.

Our saloon friends are not careful, sometimes, to designate the territory in which the assumed increase in drinking has taken place, leaving us to infer that this increase is universal. But the year book of the United States Brewers' association gives the average amount consumed per capita in licensed States as 25.23 gallons, and 1.35 gallons in prohibition States. We may seriously inquire how great the increase in liquor consumption would have been but for the check prohibition puts upon this awful business! And we may rejoice to contemplate the reduction when we shall have nation-wide prohibition, of the average per capita consumption in the United States to 1.35 gallons a year, or four teaspoonsful a day—including as this average does now in prohibition States, all the liquor used for mechanical, scientific and other purposes. In forty-five years our country's population has increased one hundred per cent., while the dry territory population has increased thirteen hundred per cent. It is not ours to weep. Let the increase go on!—Reprinted from Greensboro Daily News.

WHAT ONE TRACT DID FOR CHINA.

We often ask the question, "What can I do to aid in extending the kingdom of Christ?" Many of us are too young to be sent as missionaries to foreign fields, too young to do active ministerial work; to us, it seems that there is no way by which we can assist. Ways and means are often at hand, opportunities are presented, but frequently we are unaware of their existence.

A striking example of how we may improve every opportunity is found in the story of a girl who lived in the mountains of southwest Virginia. She was the servant of a family living in a house of only three rooms. She had only three months' schooling in her life. Her wages were four dollars a month. Out of this she gave every month two dollars to her family, one dollar to the support of her church, and one dollar to foreign missions. Her clothing was earned by taking in extra work and sitting up far into the night.

At the age of fourteen she gave her heart to God. Soon after her conversion, she found a tract entitled, "China's Call for the Gospel." In this she read of the great need of workers to carry the bread of life to hungry souls far over the sea. She became so interested in China that for ten years she prayed for God to send her as a missionary to that country.

About this time Doctor Len Broughton happened to stop at the home where the girl was working. Her room was given to him, and there he found her Bible. Nearly every verse was marked. Over the verse, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel," etc., was written, "Oh, if I could!" Becoming interested, Doctor Broughton inquired about the girl. In conversation she told him that she had reached the conclusion that she had been mistaken as to her calling in life; that she had prayed for ten years, "Lord, send me to China," but was now praying, "Lord, make me willing to be a missionary for thee in the kitchen." Doctor Broughton at once made arrangement for her education, and later she was sent as a missionary to China, where she is now doing good service for the Lord.

Did you ever stop to think what a great amount of good one little tract may do? If this girl had not read that tract, she might never have been concerned about China's great need. Through the influence of this little tract many souls are now being saved. Are you doing all you can to spread pure, wholesome literature in this country as well as in foreign lands? Many who are saved today, have received the gospel light through the reading of good literature. A book, a paper, or a tract may be the means of saving some one, who, in turn, may be used by the Lord in bringing many souls into the kingdom.—The Gospel Trumpet.

UNION OR DIVISION—WHICH?

I think I have read all that has been said in our church papers about the basis of union between the M. P. and U. B. churches, and with great hopes in the start, but if one is to guess from what they read and hear said, it seems to me that division is gaining faster than union. The question has been asked, will the local church vote on the basis of union, and if so when? I have not seen or heard any answer yet. I have seen and heard opinions, but they are wide apart. I have been a member of the Methodist Protestant Church for nearly fifty years, and have always understood that the power of government and handling the church property lay in the local church. The deed is made to the trustees of the local church. They can hold it against any other claims, but have no power to convey it without two-thirds of the members vote for the sale of the property.

Now I venture to say I believe there is a majority of the members of the Methodist Protestant Church that are partly or totally blind as to what the basis of union is. The majority of the members do not take the church papers, and if the basis of union has ever been named in a M. P. pulpit, I have not heard of it.

How can any delegate intelligently vote for the members that elected him, and he totally blind as to what they wanted?

Now with all due respect to all that have given an opinion on the question of union, I am still hoping that it can be settled satisfactorily to all, but with the light before me now, if I were a delegate to the Conference, I should excuse myself from voting on the subject of union, on the ground that I did not know whether the people that sent me wanted union or not. unless I was assured that it would come back to the local church for ratification.

Now, brethren, if we are looking to the great Founder of the Church for leadership in this move, is it not time to call a halt, and call upon our Great Leader to lay His hand upon a Moses or some one else to lead us out of the wilderness to the promised land of union, or where He would have us go? Sincerely, Peter Vuncannon.

FROM OUR PASTORS

PENSACOLA.

Our revival commenced the fourth Sunday in September. Bro. Lamar came and helped in the work. The people were delighted to have him here again as he used to serve them as pastor. Quite a number were converted and reclaimed. Thirteen have given their names for membership. Bro. M. P. Ray will be the delegate from this church to the Annual Conference.

THE POSTAL CARD

W. F. KENNETT, EDITOR

The year's work on Flat Rock circuit will close as follows: The 4th quarterly conference will be held in Gideon's Grove church on Saturday, November 1st. This being Saturday before the 1st Sunday in November. We wish as nearly as possible to close up the business part of the year's work at the quarterly conference, and we hope to have a full attendance of the official members present.

The last round on the circuit will be as follows: Bethel, 1st Sunday in November at 11 o'clock A. M.; Flat Rock, 2d Sunday at 11 o'clock; Palestine, 3d Sunday at 11 o'clock; Gideon's Grove, at 3 o'clock.

We shall be glad to see all the members out on the last round.

We were rained out at Palestine last Sunday and also the 3d Sunday in September and almost rained out at Gideon's Grove in the afternoon of these Sundays.

Don't forget the time and place of the quarterly conference and don't fail to be present.

ASHEVILLE.

This (Monday) morning a little company of us gathered on the church lot, and each in turn took the shovel and dug a little dirt from the foundation. So the work of building the Asheville church has at last begun. The hopes and the prayers, the visions and dreams, of this faithful people, and of their fathers before them, began to materialize to-day. We believe it is to be a day fraught with great consequences to all this section and to the entire conference, and in no small measure to the entire denomination. The membership here is happier than it has been in many a day—they are at last to have a home of their own.

The last quarterly conference was held last Thursday night. A resolution was passed inviting the next session of the Annual Conference to meet in Asheville M. P. Church. The delegate was instructed to ask for the return of the present pastor for another year. The pastor's report shows that $1.006.17 has been raised so far this year. All but $70 of this amount is the result of the personal efforts of the membership. The Ladies' Aid Society raised $351.31 of the total amount. They will increase that amount to more than $400 before the close of the conference year. Figures are not always interesting, but in this case they show that while the membership here is small, and has been laboring under difficulties that have killed many another church, it is very much alive at this time.

We have begun an active canvass of the city of Asheville and the surrounding territory, and have assurance that our appeals for help will meet with a hearty response. We shall also begin a campaign for funds from the friends throughout the bounds of the conference. The organization here needs your help. Most of our people own their own property, but they are not, for the most part at least, blessed with ready cash, and they need to be helped out by those who may be so fortunately situated.

GASTON CT.

The fourth quarterly conference will convene at the Union Grove church in Gastonia on Saturday night before the 1st Sun. in Nov. at 7 o'clock. All members of the conference who are specially interested in properly closing the business interests of the Gaston Ct. for this year and wish to take some forward steps for the ensuing year, are especially requested to be present. Brethren and sisters, let's make this quarterly conference the best in the history of our administration. D. M. Loy, P.as.

YADKIN COLLEGE CT.

Fourth Quarterly Conference.

On Sat., Oct. 11, President Cecil arrived from High Point and we were soon en route for Mt. Carmel, the place of the last conference of the year. Soon were gathered a large representation from each of the churches, numbering thirty-three in all, and a good turnout of people from the community. At a little past eleven Bro. Cecil gave us a shaking-up sermon which was much enjoyed.

The ladies had for us a most sumptuous dinner prepared and each, I think, ate to full satisfaction.

After a short intermission quarterly conference was called, Pres. Cecil in the chair, and every detail of business gone into and transacted in harmony. Every official member showed interest in his line of work.

Finance made a good showing, a little ahead of anything done in the four years I have been pastor. One church, Bethesda, reported out on pastor's claim and is assured of every cent of general interests. The other five churches made a good showing and we are hopeful that we will be at the Annual Conference with every cent of every assessment.

The conference raised pastor's salary $50, making $750 for the next year and voted unanimously for the present pastor. The work is in good shape and should any of you brethren be assigned here you may consider yourselves fortunate. This is a good people and cannot be excelled by any charge in the State.

Pres. Cecil stayed over with us Sunday and preached three times, at Bethesda, Friendship, and Yadkin College, preaching good, practical sermons at each place. I heard one brother who is not a member of our church say he would not take five dollars for his part of the sermon at Yadkin College.

Our president sometime ago finished his round of laborioius work throughout the District and now is doubling back and rendering valuable service to some of us. He does not look or seem to be worsted, although I heard one of our executives say years ago that it would kill any man to travel the District.

Our president has done a valuable year's work, looking closely after every interest of our beloved church.

May the Lord bless our coming together in our annual session and may the business be transacted with renewed interest. To my mind we make our conference sessions too long. I think more time should be given to committee work and every member of Conference be required to be present at each session of Conference. This way of trying to do business with a part out on committee work, a part out on the street and in front and rear of church drumming for Cts. or something else, while the few stay in trying to transact business in the absence of the majority is a shame to civilization, saying nothing about a Christian body of ministers and laymen. Let's get at something better. What say you, brethren?

Union. Where are we? I must admit I do not know. I have tried to read everything for and against. The brethren have argued the thing well and it sounds good just to read and not think for yourself. Some go so far as to say it is the voice of God calling His scattered children together. I have been afraid to say yes, even to move, I have listened. Frankly, I must admit I have failed to hear His voice or even to see the shadow of His hand. I have noticed false interpretations of our Savior's word. I have argued with myself as I have read and in my feeble judgment I believe the argument has been on false premises and therefore the conclusions have been false. I am distressed. I have never been worked up over any thing as I have been over this union question. I have known what I was, but I do not know what I shall be. We are in a wilderness and a Moses did not lead us in but it will take a Moses to lead us out. And I am afraid we will all die before we reach the Promised Land. I am afraid of the alligator of the wilderness; he is too small to hold a man of my physical circumference. I could not have room to kick. I would rather fall overboard and be swallowed by a whale of the sea. Then I suspect the whale would think he had a steam engine in his stomach.

I have just hinted at some things and I am afraid you will not get what I mean and you will perhaps call me a fool now but a prophet in the future. H. L. Powell.

REIDSVILLE.

The trustees and stewards of Reidsville church met last Wednesday night. J. F. Dixon, chairman; J. D. McCollum, Secy. All present but one steward. T. R. Totten from Bethany was present. They met to discuss the advisability of renting or buying a parsonage. It was the sense of those present to buy. The chairman appointed D. L. Carroll, Geo. D. Williams and J. H. Turner to see about buying a house and lot, and report to the 4th quarterly conference at Reidsville on Friday before the 1st Sunday in Nov. The other churches to help them decide. They have found a nice comparatively new six-room house in a splendid neighborhood for $1,500.

MY ANNUAL VISIT TO UNION GROVE.

In compliance with a request, to attend the special meeting at Union Grove, I set out on Friday before. My son Willie conveyed me to Peeble's ferry and here I was met by Cousin Thos. Ellis, and conveyed to his hospitable home, where we spent a short time with his interesting family; then he conveyed me out to Advance for train. Here I met the pastor,Bro. Self, and Bro. Martin, who had just closed an interesting meeting at Elbaville church. Bro. Self and I boarded the train for Mocksville, where I had the pleasure of spending the night with Bro. Self and his interesting family in the parsonage, situated in the most desirable part of the thriving town of Mocksville, the county seat of Davie county.

Saturday morning we left in Bro. Self's auto for Union Ridge, a distance I believe of about 26 miles. We were making good speed considering the roughness of the roads when some miles from Union Grove our car dropped suddenly into a mudhole, breaking one spring. But Bro. Self, having more ingenuity than most preachers, soon patched up the spring and went on, arriving at Bro. Templeton's near the church, where we spent the night very pleasantly. Sabbath morning, the people began to gather at church, and by eleven o'clock the beautiful grove was full of vehicles and people; and while the congregation was not quite as large as it would have been owing to the incomplete state of a bridge over a stream that must be crossed to reach the church, yet there were enough people there no doubt to have filled three such buildings as Union Grove church. This suggests the building of a large arbor and having a camp meeting in the near future: and as some of the brethren spoke of these improvements, it may be consummated yet. Sunday, Sept. 28, being my birthday, and at the request of the popular pastor, Bro. Self, I preached at 11 o'clock to a very attentive congregation. I preached once every day from Sunday up to Friday P. M. when the meeting closed, and as well as I remember there were nine conversions. There were several things that made against the success of the meeting: the threatening weather, the very busy season, and the unfinished bridge on one of the highways etc. But we had a good meeting anyway. But as usual, the good people of all denominations and friends placed me under renewed obligations to them, by giving me another birthday dinner on the church ground. I have no language to describe the dinner, or express my gratitude to them. Suffice it to say it was grand. The table was about 80 feet long, filled with the best things that or any other section of the country can afford, and prepared by the good sisters of that section in the most tempting manner. And last but not least, they made up a purse of $16 and gave me an overcoat. I appreciate these tokens of love the more because I was their pastor 47 years ago, and have helped in their special meetings every year, when in reach, and they voted unanimously this year requesting me to come again next year, if living and able.

The sand-clay road from Statesville out to near Union Grove church, and the bridge at Jennings' mill will soon be completed, and then this will be one of the most desirable sections in the State; and if we had a sufficient supply of ministers, it would be a wise plan to make a station of Union Grove church. If I were a young man and given that church, I believe they would support me handsomely, or any good man who would devote his entire time to the work. May God bless the good people around Union Grove temporally and spiritually and make them a power for good. Dear brethren, pray for me. Bro. Self is beloved by his people on Mocksville circuit.

Slewfoot.

It has fallen to my lot to write the obituary of Peter Slewfoot. This is a very difficult task because the exact time of his birth is not known, neither is the exact date of his death on record, and, furthermore, it is uncertain—very uncertain—as to whether Slewfoot did more of good than he did evil in his short and mysterious existence. It is believed that Slewfoot was born, or came into existence in N. C., sometime during the winter or early spring of the year 1913. His death is believed to have occurred during the latter part of July of the same year and the writer believes that it was the result of a bow shot at a venture by the editor of the M. P. Herald. The editor had suggested that Slewfoot appear at the Summer Conference and conduct a "round table" on poundings and the proper style of reporting poundings, whereupon Slewfoot refused. Then the editor said: "As Emerson said to the Millerites when they told him the world would soon come to an end, Emerson replied, 'Well, I guess we can get along without it,'" and then the editor said we could get along without Peter Slewfoot, it is believed that this was the shot that killed poor Slewfoot. At any rate he has not since been heard from.

Slewfoot while he did live was a mighty Peter and it is passing strange that so mighty a Peter should so soon "Peter out." While he lived Slewfoot—the mighty Peter—was much talked of and much "writ" about. Some thought Peter was a preacher—some did not know what he was—in fact, the editor of the Herald is probably the only one who did know who he was and it may be that the reason he killed him was because he did know him. Suffice it to say that the great Peter Slewfoot has passed and his like will hardly be known again.

Since it is hard to tell whether Slewfoot did more harm than he did good we know not whether to weep or rejoice over the passing of Slewfoot—the mighty Peter. So, dear friends, take your choice—weep or rejoice—according to your own feeling.

John Judgemall.

Oct. 17, 1913.

Bro. Judgemall is certainly mistaken as to the cause of Bro. Slewfoot's death. Since he is mistaken here, he may also be mistaken as to the fact of Bro. Slewfoot's death. We await confirmation of the report. Ed.

THE MAID OF DREAMS.

The simple, everyday tasks of little Jeanne d'Arc were like those of other peasant girls. In the morning she helped her mother with the housework and the spinning; later she would follow the plow with her father, and often she would take her flock of sheep far away to graze, and she would sit and watch them, weaving weird fancies; and as the years passed a strange gift came to her—the gift of seeing ahead. It did not come at once, but little by little her companions noticed that Jeanne would talk of to-morrow or the day after or a week thence as if it were that very day. The little maid scarcely took heed of this; but as she watched her flock a hope sprang up in her heart that France would sometime be free, that help would surely come. And then, when Jeanne was nine years old, came the dream of dreams that meant so much to France.

Not a hundred yards below the Forest of Oak stood a deserted hermitage in which there was a little chapel. Near by were rich pasture lands, and here Jeanne loved to bring her flock, because, while they grazed, she could go into this quiet place and think and pray. For Jeanne was a pious child, and a chapel was meant for prayer. It was so restful and still that often the tired little girl would close her eyes and sleep would steal upon her. And one day she dreamed that God spoke to her and commanded her to leave her flock and her work at home, her parents and brothers and sisters and all her little friends in Domremy, and go forth to help France and the king.

So vivid was the dream, so deep and reverberating the voice, that Jeanne awoke with a start and sat up, rubbing her bewildered eyes. It had grown quite dark in the chapel, and over the distant hills sounded the warning rumble of thunder. That was surely what she had heard in her dream. So, gathering her flock, she set out for home to get under shelter before the storm broke. But the vision stayed with her, and the child kept thinking sadly of her France, torn by civil war, fighting within herself, and weakening her own defenses, while the lion of England crouched ready to spring and take what he could.

Those in France who fought for the king were few in number and their leaders timid. The Burgundians were powerful allies of the English, and they were passing in triumph through the country, burning and plundering as they went.

Now the village of Domremy was devoted to the king; and as it lay along the line of march, it was put to the sword, and the poor peasants had to run for their lives. The family of Jacques d'Arc fled to Neufchateau, where they took shelter in the house of a friend, and when at length they ventured back to the village, poor little Jeanne, who was only ten years old, sat down and cried at the sight of her home. The roof had been torn off, and all the year's harvest that her father and brothers had gathered so patiently had been burned and trampled under foot by the horses of the soldiers; the cattle had all been killed; there were signs of desolation everywhere; and as Jeanne turned away from the pitiful sight, there came a stirring at her heartstrings and a rush of memories as she thought of her dream.

Yes, she would obey the voice of God and save France if she could. And all at once the child became an earnest, thoughtful girl. She had told no one of this dream; but when she was lying wide awake at dead of night in the little room she shared with Baby Catherine, it came to her again and again, this wild, passionate longing to save France. She would sit in her quiet corner, too, and listen eagerly to the tales of war and bloodshed brought by the chance travelers who stopped overnight at her father's house.

With the other children she still played games and laughed and sang around the fairy tree; but when alone with her flock she would sit absorbed, her knitting dangling forgotten in her hand, her dreamy eyes looking far across the devastated fields.—St. Nicholas.

"As thirsty travelers come and go
Where some fresh mossy fountain springs;
It cools their lips and sweetly sings,
And glides away with heedless flow;
Let me do good and never know
To whom my life a blessing brings."

OUR FOREIGN MISSIONARY WORK.

Easy, if All will Help.

Our aim to raise $50,000 this fiscal year which ends May 1, 1914, is no idle dream. The idea was born of absolute necessity, and of our church's obligation and ability to do that much for the extension of the Kingdom in the heathen world.

Now that we have reached the point where individuals are giving as much as $500 for this great work, and one has given $5,000 to the Annuity Fund which helps to guarantee the future of our foreign missionary operations, it ought to be an easy matter to raise this amount. Why, it would take only 28 cents per member to do it, and who says that our people cannot average that small sum?

Some of our churches manifest very little interest in foreign missions, and yet the church that does not engage in this work has no just right to the name Christian, for it denies the authority and disobeys the command of the Christ, and neglects the great heathen world that must get the gospel by God's people carrying it to them in the ways He has plainly indicated.

One way to realize our object is for pastors to raise their assessment for foreign missions at the earliest possible date, and send it to me without delay. Every month that pastors delay doing this adds to our financial difficulties, and it is not business-like, but wasteful, because interest must be paid while waiting for receipts which could, in most cases, be sent early in the conference year just as well as at the close when the extra demands often cause the general interests to be slighted.

The friends who are thinking of making a special contribution to our Board would render great assistance if they would kindly forward their gifts to aid us reach our objective by May 1, 1914.

The C. E. Societies that have not yet made their offering for the Denominational Union's Missionary, or the Maryland Conference Union's Missionary's support, would help us if they would speedily send their contributions. The offerings of the many will make one large amount. Now, fellow-workers, for a determined, united and persistent effort to raise $50,000 this fiscal year, by May 1, 1914.

FROM LOCAL REPORTERS

BURLINGTON.

Sunday being a rainy day, our Sunday-school attendance dropped to 64. The attendance is always small on rainy days, as most of our people regard the rain and the mud to the extent that they stay at home. We are planning and working for a big day next Sunday, which has been set apart as Home Department and Cradle Roll Day. Provision will be made for those of the Home Dept. who are physically unable to get to the church. The entire membership of both departments is expected to be in attendance.

The special meeting which has been under consideration for several weeks will begin next Sunday. The pastor has secured the services of Rev. J. R. Hutton of Greensboro as pulpit help. Prof. Lindley of the southern part of Alamance will probably be secured to conduct the singing. We are looking forward to a great meeting, and believe there will be many souls won for the Master.

Mrs. J. H. Boon, who has been in the Stokes Sanitarium at Salisbury for treatment, returned last Sunday, and we are glad to report that her condition is very much improved. We hope for her a speedy recovery.

Bro. James Workman who has served as vice-president of the Baraca Class in our Sunday school for the past four months, resigned Sunday morning, and left this week for Hillsboro, where he has accepted work. We regret to lose him, as he has been a most faithful and loyal Baraca and Sunday-school worker. He is succeeded in the Baraca Class by Bro. G. L. Amick.

We are glad to report that Bro. T. A. Amick, who was confined to his home several days last week on account of sickness, is able to be out again. C. B. W., Rep.

FAIRVIEW.

How fast time flies and what this means to us, is somewhat the writer's thought as these few lines are penned. As we realize how near the close of the year is and look over our past and ask ourselves, "Have I done my best in trying to do just what I think God would have me do?" This is a question each one should ask himself. There are many sins we commit daily both of omission and of commission, and were it not for such an all-forgiving Father, we would have to remain under this terrible load, but Christ has said, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy and my burden is light." Mat. 11:28-30. What further assurance need we have than this?

And, moreover, when we know too that "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life," when we look on such sacrifice from our Father, why should we not be willing to yield our lives, our all to Him?

Our 4th quarterly conference convenes on Saturday night before the first Sunday in November. All are urged upon to be present.

Our faithful pastor, Rev. E. Suits, had a very severe chill a few days ago, but was able to fill the pulpit at his regular appointment the third Sunday at three o'clock. We were glad he was able to be with us in spite of the inclement weather. He conducted a funeral service at the above-named hour, the deceased being a Mr. Edwards, of Concord; his wife passed on before a few months ago. He leaves two small children, neither large enough to realize the loss of father and mother. But God, using man as the instrument, cares for such as these. For He careth for the sparrows, and are we not more than they?

Mr. W. A. Carter's monument was unveiled at this place the 1st Sun. in Oct.

Our sister church (the Presbyterian church at Bala Mill) will have her installation services the 4th Sun. in Oct. These services are to inaugurate the pastorate of Rev. Mr. Wauchope of Oklahoma. May God lead pastor and people.

Mr. Zeb Cochran of Hartsell Mill who was seriously injured in an accident in the mill a few weeks ago is still very sick. How wondrous God's dealings are with us!

May God's richest blessings rest on pastor and people is the writer's prayer.

Reporter.

REHOBOTH, GRANVILLE CT.

Our pastor says that the reporters should write more often, so I am writing to say that work at Rehoboth is running smoothly. One cause for our success is system—we open the services on time, regardless of the number present. Everybody knows this, so there are enough present to open S. S. at the appointed hour. The question box review which we began about two months ago is interesting and helpful. When we had the lessons about the ten commandments, the many thoughts which were brought out in these discussions gave us clearer ideas of God's law. We learned some good points upon Sabbath-breaking and Sabbath-keeping. Some of our farmers cured tobacco on Sunday and the question arose, "Is it right to cure tobacco on Sunday?" It didn't take long to answer this. We will do ourselves justice by saying that the most of these Sabbath breakers were not our members. Visitors are impressed with the large number of grown boys and girls who take active part in our church and Sunday school. They give liberally, too. We have some who give the tenth of their earnings. Our interest in the Orphanage has not ceased. We urge all who can to take part in the shares about which Mrs. Dixon wrote week before last.

Last first Sunday Mr. Bethea took for his subject the 23d Psalm. He asked some one to define the preposition; then he showed us some things we hadn't thought about before—the meaning of the many prepositions in that psalm. If it did not seem so much like a habit among the reporters, I would say "that was a fine sermon." Mr. Bethea is about to close his third year as our pastor. We never saw a preacher more universally loved. Not a single thing have we heard spoken against him since he has been with us. Even the other denominations "borrow" him. We must have him again next year and many more consecutive years. Granville Ct has been so prosperous under his pastorate that it would be interesting for him to give the Herald readers an itemized account of the work done.

My letter is too long, but since reading Mr. McCulloch's editorial of last week, I must say that he is right in his attitude toward printing select secular matter. It is necessary to know some of these things in order to do the best religious work. Doubtless the Herald goes into homes where it is the only paper. We congratulate our editor upon the choice literature which he gives us. Hattie Harris.

LINCOLNTON.

Our Sunday school is getting along finely. Our attendance for the past month has been over 100. Our collection also I think has been good, being over $2.25 on an average. Officers and teachers were elected on the 1st Sunday for the coming year. D. B. Johnson, Supt., Monroe Wright Asst. Supt., Robt. G. Wood Sec.-Treas., Miss Lillie Buff Asst. Sec., Miss Lucy Gales, Mrs. Maggie Hoke, Mrs. D. B. Johnson, Miss Jennie Jenkins, Monroe Wright, Miss Dovie Gilbert, and Mrs. James Jimerson, teachers. We are looking forward for a good year in our Lincolnton S. S.

Our C. E. Society is also doing good work. We have three societies: Senior, Junior and Intermediate.

We have only a few more weeks of the Conference year, and another year has come and gone, and gone forever. What we have done is forever done. We have and will have raised this year on the Lincolnton M. P. Church debt about $268.00. We have our pastor's salary almost paid. May we all be in earnest prayer from now till Conference is over that God may lead in all things pertaining to the church work that all things may be so arranged as to bring about the best year's work next year that ever has been in the history of the Methodist Protestant Church.

As to the church union so much talked about, I am opposed to it, for more than one reason. I will refrain from giving my reasons here. Success to the Herald.

D. B. J.

GILES CHAPEL.

Rally day exercises will be held by our S. S. on Sunday, Oct. 26th at 10:30 o'clock. Bro. A. J. Luck will meet his S. S. class of 37 years ago. Bro. Luck is very anxious to meet them once more at the old home church. Come! and enjoy the day together. In the evening we will be entertained by the following speakers: Prof. Bradshaw, Rev. J. E. Thompson, and Bro. L. Ferree Ross, president of our S. S. Association. A cordial invitation is extended to all.

Yours in the work, J. C. Allred, Supt.

FAIRMOUNT, FRANKLINSVILLE.

A church has been organized at this point with 23 members. Rev. T. J. Ogburn preached the opening sermon the 1st Sun. in Sept. A Sunday school was organized with 48 present. On Oct. 12th the number had grown to 66. W. C. Jones is the superintendent, J. H. Burrow, assistant; D. N. Burrow, Secy.; Ada Kinney, organist, Miss Martha Neighbors, assistant.

A protracted meeting was held beginning the 1st Sun. in Oct. which proved to be a glorious one. Rev. Mr. White, of the Christian Church, preached on Sunday. Bro. J. A. Laughlin, a local preacher of Cedar Falls, came and rendered earnest service after Sunday. There were eleven converts and 7 joined the church. More members are expected in the near future. We attribute the success of the meeting to the presence and power of the Holy Spirit.

W. C. Jones.

CORINTH, LITTLETON CT.

Bro. Edwards told you that we had a good meeting and that Bro. Gerringer did good preaching also. You who have heard him know that he usually does, because he prepares his sermons well. We had nine additions to the church. In the number were Mr. William Smith, his wife and a daughter who live near Littleton.

Last 1st Sunday Rev. D. A. Fishel preached for us. Some strangers and many visitors worshiped with our people, and were a little bit surprised not to find Bro. Edwards present, but pleased to hear Bro. Fishel.

Messrs. A. E. Carter and Ezra Pair were our nominees to Annual Conference. Ezra is declared delegate.. We hope for a pleasant session of Conference this year, a Conference that will be "well pleasing in His sight."

Mr. J. Willis Fletcher, one of our members, died at his home in Henderson last Thursday. His body was brought to Littleton Friday and taken to Corinth for interment. Here he was placed beside his wife who preceded him several years. A daughter and many relatives are left to mourn. Mr. Fletcher was a good man, a Christian, one that walked with God.

Mr. Forest Insco and Miss Pearl Nicholson, both of this community, were married in Warrenton last Wednesday.

Miss Myrtice Walker is attending school in Richmond this fall. We miss her much in Sunday school.

The Baptists have erected a lovely little church in front of Mr. Green Bobbitt's, near us. Their revival meeting begins this week. Rev. Mr. Coppage is Pastor Bobbitt's help. Fannie Barnes, Rept.

JAN'S DOLL—THE STORY OF AN ALASKAN CHILD.

Jan was a small Eskimo, who lived on the northern coast of the great winter land of Alaska. In the south and southwest are mountains covered with mighty forests of hemlock, spruce and larch, and they are full of wild creatures, elks and bears, foxes, wolves, martens, etc., in perpetual stir, hunting and being hunted. Here the river Yukon, full of shining fish, plunges down into the sea, its volume so immense that ten miles out from its mouth its waters are still fresh. Most of the inhabitants, the Aleuts, Indians, and whites, dwell here. It is very silent except for the strange cracking and moaning of the ice and the rush and roar of the snow-storms that sweep down with clouds of stinging ice-spray and whirling snow-flakes, and blot out sea and land in a white blur.

But our Eskimo baby liked it—that did he! both the long, long night and the long, long day that made the Arctic year. In the pale blue Arctic night the moon and stars shone brilliantly, and there was a snow-glimmer also that guided the Eskimo on his way. The snow-peaks and plains, wherever a shadow touched them, were a delicate blue, and the moonlight on the frost set sparkling a host of silvery frost-flowers. Often the air crackled and tingled, and Jan beheld the dance of the Northern Lights, violet, rose-colored, and white streamers, leaping high into the heavens, and sending soft, trembling auroral lights over the snow. He was so warm in his seal-skin, fashioned very like a fur bag, that he did not mind the cold.

The little house he lived in was made of snow, and shaped like an old-fashioned bee-hive, with a very low entrance. This did not at all inconvenience the short Eskimo men and women. It was surprisingly warm in the snow huts, where the seal-fat burned in the lamp all the time. The air, it is true, was very smoky; and things generally, especially the children, were very grimy and oily. But Jan did not mind.

Jan, even in his short life, had known one adventure. The Eskimo men, of course, never dreamed of stopping indoors because it was night, for that would have been losing time, indeed! Their sleds, pulled by dogs, went rapidly over the slippery ice and snow. For the black water, they had canoes. Their business was fishing; and colthes, food, light, fuel, weapons and ornaments came from their catch of seals, whales, sea otters and the walruses, which were valuable chiefly for their white tusks. A rumor reached the village that some traders were at the next settlement, and Jan's father and some other Eskimo villagers loaded their sleds with skins and tusks, and started on a trading expedition. Jan's mother was dead, and his father, unlike the other Eskimo fathers, would not leave him at home with the women and children, if he could take him. This seemed a very safe journey, so Jan, in his fur bag, was packed in the sled between his father's feet, and enjoyed the crack of the long whip and the rush of the sled through the keen, frosty air and over the frozen ground.

As they returned, however, one of the dog-teams ran away, and Jan's sled was overturned, and he and his father pitched out. When they picked up his father he was still stunned by the fall, and the others did not think of Jan at all, for they were not used to babies as traveling companions for men. The women usually carried them over their shoulders, like a pack.

So Jan was left alone, a poor little mite, quite helpless as to arms and legs, so tightly was he bundled up, and lay on his back and heard the great north wind and the waves singing and shouting to one another. He thought of the low snow-house and the smoky light—it was all snug and warm inside, he knew, and the women and men were busy in different parts of the room. Some of the men were carving ivory or bone, and telling wild and curious stories, and if the women were not listening, they, too, sang or told stories.

Jan thought of himself, toddling about from one group to another, as the story pleased him best, and he wished with all his heart that he was there. He also remembered very distinctly a story his father had told of being at work one day on the beach by himself, as he thought; but he heard a growl, and there was a great white Polar bear sitting opposite him. A homesick Polar bear in the Zoo is not agreeable, but our Eskimo liked him still less in such a suspiciously good humor, his sharp white teeth showing as he grinned. In fact, he liked his company so little that he left his work and fled. When poor little Jan remembered the sharp teeth, he could not stand it any longer, but opened his mouth wide with a wail of distress.

Some one else was traveling along the coast at this time, though Jan did not know it—a missionary, on his way to the next village. All at once he heard a different sound—a child's cry—and, wondering very much, he looked about him and at last saw a little dark bundle on the ground, from which the cry was still coming.

"Bless me, it's an Eskimo baby! The cry is all right, at any rate."

His voice was very kind, and Jan gave a small grunt of approval as he felt himself picked up.

The missionary was surprised to find Jan old enough to talk; but he had not gotten much information when there was a violent wriggle, and a funny little cry of delight, for in the snow-glimmer was dimly visible what looked like a procession of walking bundles—the father, who had quite recovered from the shock, and his companions on the search for Jan.

This was the way the little Eskimo got acquainted with the tall missionary, and he soon got to love him very much indeed.

When the Alaskan summer came Jan's people left the snow huts and lived in skin tents (when they were not fishing), and the sun shone on the icy crystals and made them glitter like the rainbow, or flush with rose color of sea shells. down from the icy pinnacles, and the streams ran, leaping and laughing, into the sea.

And Jan made a discovery. He found a quiet, sandy cove that the seals liked. The men were fishing in quite another direction, and so the seals had a good time. When Jan, one lucky day, left to his own resources, climbed up the rough rocks and peeped down, he saw two or three old bearded walruses, or sea-horses, on the furthest point, looking very solemn and very silly. He did not care for these, but for the seals, the fathers diving about in the water, the mothers and the baby seals lying lazily content in the hot sunshine. The sun was low and red, and the mountains were all aflame, and the snow no longer looked cold, but like soft, warm fleeces of crimson wool and the seals looked very black and shiny in the red light.

Jan saw the little seal he particlarly wanted to play with. It had such dear little flappers, and such round, innocent eyes. He crept nearer and nearer, down the rocks, but the old mother seal, who had been dozing, felt his shadow, and turned her head and saw him. She knew that kind of a creature, only bigger, and knew no good of it, she would have said; so she made a sudden splash into the water, and after her went the little seal, and, splash, after splash along the shore, all the seals vanished from sight.

civil intentions, and had never gone fish-

It was hard on Jan, who had the most ing in his life. He felt rather small and lonesome, for it is not nice to be snubbed, even by a baby seal.

After awhile, however, he got up and trotted away. He thought it was about time for his father to return, and Jan remembered a certain piece of ivory, which he was carving into a doll for him. It was the most hideous thing, with goggle eyes and an absurd nose and mouth, but Jan watched every stroke with wonder and delight.

Yes; his father was at work upon it and little Jan squatted close beside him, and forgot his disappointment.

"Do you like it, Jan?" asked his father.

Jan gave a little grunt of pleasure.

Presently he said, "I want to give it to the tall man."

The missionary was six feet tall, and so towered far above the little Eskimo men ,who were rarely above five feet.

Th father gave a big grunt in his turn, he was so surprised.

"But you like it?"

"Yes"; said Jan, with two little guttural sounds of approval, "and I like him."

The father went on carving in silence, and the doll grew more and more grotesqe, and more beautiful in Jan's eyes.

Soon the news came that the missionary was going back home for a while to see his wife and child. Jan grew very eager for the work of art to be finished, and as soon as it was done he and his father started for the next station. It was the kind of day you never see anywhere except in the Arctic countries; a mist and the sun shining through it, and casting strange looking, soft, white halos on the ground, and here and there lay delicate phosphorescent blue shadows. The missionary was in his sled, ready to start, but waited when he saw them, and smiled at Jan while his father explained their errand and placed the precious image in his hand.

His first glance was a puzzled one, and Jan's heart sank with sudden misgiving. Of what use could even the most exquisite plaything be to his friend, going away to a land of men all as big as himself—for so he had told Jan—and therefore, in all probability, dangerous?

Jan looked at the misionary very wistfully. He had naturally a fair skin and auburn hair, but he was so greased with blubber and blackened with smoke that he apppeared very dark. There was a love however, in his round eyes that recalled to the missionary's mind another baby face with a big doll close beside it. He told Jan how glad he was to have this gift.

"Do you like it as well as seal-fat?" queried Jan, still doubting.

"Better than seal-fat; better than sea-horses' teeth."

So our little Eskimo was entirely satisfied, for these were his highest standards of value.

In truth, the thought of this grotesque and ugly image often brought a sort of glow to the missionary's heart on his long journey, for he knew it was Jan's treasure; and when he told the story to his wife she took Jan's doll very gently in her hands and kissed it.—The Christian Millions.

NOONTIDE PRAYER

Have you and I to-day
Stood silent as with Christ, apart from joy or fray
Of life, to see by faith His face,
And grow, by brief companionship, more true,
More nerved to lead, to dare, to do
For Him at any cost? Have we to-day
Found time in thought our hand to lay
In His, and thus compare
His will with ours and wear
The impress of His wish? Be sure
Such contact will endure
Throughout the day; will help us walk erect
Through storm and flood; detect,
Within the hidden life, sin's dross, its stain;
Revive a thought of love for Him again;
Steady the steps which waver; help to see
The footpath meant for you and me.

SUNIA, A HINDU CONVERT.

Some years ago in one of the poor Hindu homes of Lahore there lived a little girl named Sunia. Her mother died when she was a small child, and her father married again. The step-mother did not ill-treat Sunia, though she was not as kind to her as her own mother had been.

Sunia's father was the bearer, or table-servant of an English gentleman, and, according to Indian custom, lived in the servants' quarters in his master's compound. In this same compound lived the gentleman's coachman. This man also was a Hindu and was unmarried. So the father made arrangements to give him Sunia to be his wife. Though she was young and untrained for the responsibilities of wifehood, yet it was considered best for her to marry. Usually when an Indian father gets his daughters married, he believes he has done his duty by them. And, indeed, this is no small undertaking, for custom demands that on such an occasion a great display be made. Though a man be poor and not able to have a costly wedding, yet he will borrow money, make the usual sumptuous feast, buy fine clothes and jewels, and hire musicians, thus contracting such heavy debts that he may be unable to liquidate them during his whole subsequent lifetime. Much of a rich Hindu's wealth is "eaten up" through the marriage of his daughters. Recently a rich Hindu in Lahore spent about one hundred thousand dollars on his daughter's wedding.

After Sunia's marriage she went to her new home. Her round of duties now consisted principally in cooking her husband's food and in keeping the little mud house in order. She had not learned to read and write, as this is not considered essential for an Indian girl. She knew how to sew a little, and as she was not one who spent many idle hours, she improved her time by making their few articles of clothing and keeping them in repair.

But a sad experience awaited poor Sunia. Soon after her marriage she became badly afflicted with spinal trouble and also something like rheumatism. She kept getting worse, until she could only stand or walk a little by the help of a cane. Through the kindness of the English gentleman (her husband's master) she was sent to an English hospital in Lahore. Here she remained for three months, but received little benefit. She left the hospital and returned to her father's house, who had moved to another part of the city during her absence. Sunia's husband did not want her to return to him, as he did not care to have an invalid for a wife. The father was willing to have his daughter stay with him, but requested the husband to bear her expenses. This, however, he refused to do.

After Sunia's return to her father's house she continued to grow worse until she was unable to stand even in a stooping posture. Her whole body began to shake and tremble, and she suffered much pain. Some Christian women living near saw her great distress and wanted to arrange to send her to the hospital. One of the women was working in the zenana hospital, and she told Sunia that she would be kindly cared for there. There was little hope of the sufferer's getting any better where she was, so she decided to go with the woman, as this hospital was for the treatment of women only. The doctors gave her electric treatment, and soon the trembling in her limbs ceased, but her body was still in great pain. For five months she was given free treatment, as in this hospital the poor are treated gratis. She grew somewhat better and was able to stand again and walk a little by the aid of her stick, though she had to go in a stooping posture on account of her spinal trouble.

One day the doctor came to Sunia and asked her if she would not like to return to her home. The thought of home brought no happy feelings to Sunia's heart. Her husband did not want her back, and she was a burden to her father. Moreover, she was becoming dissatisfied with Hinduism. During her illness her heart began to long for something better. While meditating she thought, "I will become a Mohammedan"; but, deciding that that would be little better than Hinduism, she thought, "It will be best to become a Christian." She asked the doctor if she might not remain in the hospital, saying, "When I get well, I will learn to be a nurse." This lady doctor, happening to know Sister Laura Jarvis, wrote to her asking if she would take Sunia into the girls' orphanage. In reply Sister Jarvis came to the hospital and took the afflicted girl home with her.

Soon after Sunia's arrival in the orphanage, Brother and Sister Jarvis had a camp-meeting. This was a good opportunity for her to hear the precious gospel story. Every day she was carried on her bed to the tent where the meetings were held, and she earnestly listened to the preaching. How well I remember the face of this little sufferer. She was indeed a pathetic sight, her body afflicted, her mind unenlightened, and her soul unilluminated. But the word of life had its effect upon this darkened heart, her soul became awakened to its of a Savior. Hope sprang up in her Jesus would also heal her body. was prayed for, and the Lord helped so much that soon afterwards she able to walk without a cane.

About Handwriting.

Illegible handwriting may prove aid to prosperity. The late Lord Gosch said of his father: "He has told m half in joke and half in earnest, th when he came to London he was oblig to found a firm because he wrote such bad hand that no one would take hi for a clerk." Of Lord Goschen himse his biographer remarks: "In his latt years he might have spelt as he chos for no one could have affirmed with ce tainty how many 'l's' he might ha put in 'although.' At length his seri became undecipherable, even by Gosch himself. He could not when speakin in Parliament make out what he had put on paper, and he thus came in later years to abandon almost entirely his old practice of making notes."

Joaquin Miller, "the poet of the Sierras," who died a few months ago, has been put forward as the very worst writer that ever lived. The secretary of a literary society once invited him to attend a banquet and received an answer, of which no one could decipher a word. He wrote again to the poet, stating the difficulty, and suggesting that, in replying, he should make a cross at the foot of his letter if he were coming, and a circle if he could not be present. Miller complied with the request, but nobody could decide whether the mark he made was intended for a circle or a cross.—Chicago Daily News.

What One Potato Can Do.

A great amount of good is sometimes brought about through very small means. Some young people think that they can not do much for the missionary cause. But did you ever consider how much could be done by starting with a potato, a few grains of wheat or corn, a small plot of ground, a pair of fowls, or something else of the kind? Though these things look rather small to begin with, they will soon multiply and almost astonish you with results.

To show what can be done by starting with small things, let us take the experience of one young boy interested in missionary work. He asked his grandfather for one potato, enough ground to plant it in, and all that it produced for four years. His grandfather granted his request. The first year that one potato produced nine; the next year these became a peck; the third year brought a harvest of seven and one-half bushels; and the fourth year seventy bushels. These were sold and the proceeds given to missionary work.

If twenty thousand young people would each raise seventy bushels of potatoes every four years, and would sell them at the extremely low price of 25 cents a bushel, the total would be $350,000.

Think of what that would accomplish for the missionary cause! It would no doubt mean some extra work, but have you not often told the Lord that you are willing to do anything for the advancement of His cause?—Gospel Trumpet.

MISSIONARY QUALIFICATIONS.

By Mrs. B. C. Patterson.
S. P. Mission, Suchien

I feel it might prove helpful to some of the younger workers to know some of the qualifications that after sixteen years I found so necessary for a missionary to possess.

First would I mention a realization in one's own heart that methods of work contrary to our own ideas may be proper methods. Missionaries as a class, and those preparing for the work, on the whole have strong wills and ideas of their own, and to cultivate the feeling that the Spirit works in many ways, and ways different from our own, will bring peace to ourselves and help us in dealing with others. This has been a great benefit to me, not only in dealing with the missionaries but especially with the native helpers. Their ideas of work are often very different from our own.

2. Love.—John 4:20. This is to me one of the most difficult passages in the Bible. "He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" The difficult part is in the comparison between God, who is so lovely, and the brother, whom to us is so unlovely. It seems easy to love God, and yet if we love not the brother, there is something wrong with our lives toward God. It is often easier to love the natives, for whom we make so many allowances than our Christian missionary, of whom we feel we have a right to expect proper behavior. The last enemy to be destroyed in many of our hearts, I fear, is not-loving. We must have an hourly struggle against this monster.

3. Given to Hospitality.—1 Tim. 3:2. This is a requisite for good mission work. By this I mean the broad sense of receiving all in what we know as true hospitality. The filthy, the diseased, the unlovely we are to receive graciously and treat them as friends. This is one of the hardest parts of mission life and where many of us fail. John Newton said he took a knock on his door as a call from the Lord, and in no other way can we receive graciously some of our visitors.

4. Apt to teach.—1 Tim. 3:2. Teaching is the method of mission work. Each inquirer must be taught line upon line. Preaching the Word is more for converted ones. The unenlightened must be taught, and any training that will make us the more capable of teaching the word to others is what we need.

5. Not soon angry.—Titus 1:7. In a conference of missionaries recently Mr. Webster, of the Keswick Convention, said: "You look after your temper and God will look after the work." Many a missionary who has the spirit to give his body to be burned for the natives, yet greatly cripples his usefulness for Christ by getting angry with some servant or coolie. Perhaps more missionaries have to return home because of this one reason than we imagine. We cannot be too guarded on this one point. There is no Scripture which says that a nervous person, or one with indigestion, has free license of the tongue.

6. Yield to God.—Rom. 6:13, 16, 22. There is a victory; and we may possess this and every necessary qualification by yielding ourselves to God. Mr. Webster also gave three steps to being filled with the Spirit: 1st, Confession. 2nd, Yielding ourselves entirely to God. (It may be a very little thing that keeps one from being filled with the Spirit.) 3rd, Receive, Accept, Take. Jesus said: Receive ye the Holy Ghost. By faith we receive the filling of the Spirit just as we receive justification. Moody said the seed sowing required a skillful hand; any one could reap. So may we all be skilled laborers for God by being filled with His Spirit.Woman's Work in the Far East.

NEW DANGER FROM AUTOS.

Automobiles have brought into existence another health problem of considerable proportions, according to Sir James Crichton-Browne, the president of the British Sanitary Inspectors' Association, as stated by him in his annual address before the association last week. The dust raised by automobiles is a menace to the public health, he asserted, as it is productive of disease. Whatever the material of which roads are made, he said it contains almost invariably pathogenic germs derived from organic sources. It is already evident that road dust is responsible for cases of conjunctivitis, oral sepsis, sore throat and tonsilitis, bronchitis and pneumonia. The chief danger attending road dust, however, is tetanus or lockjaw—a rare disease, no doubt, but one the death-rate from which shows a decided increase. He stated further that all motorists and dwellers on the highway should be warned that they should keep covered and free from road dust all cuts, wounds or abrasions on the hands or face.—Zion's Herald.

MAKING CALLS.

Mrs. Missionary was dressed in her most "honorable garb," and with her retinue was starting for a round of visits in the homes of girls of the Katherine Fleeson Memorial School. Boa Kam was the retinue, and she too had "entered into her most honorable garb" and had a wreath of white flowers on her black, glossy head. She carried herself with the air of a queen and all the dignity befitting her eight years. Here and there along the street they met school-girls, to whom Mrs. Missionary said, "In the next week on Thursday we will have school agaiin. Be sure you come and invite your neighbors." "O yes, I am coming, my cousins are coming, we are all coming!"

Mrs. Missionary and Boa Kim hurried on through the busy market, turning in when they came to a row of pretty little cottages. At once they began a very animated conversation. This was a hint to the hostess in case any small article of toilet needed to be donned. Their thoughtfulness was well rewarded, for when they reached the top of the ladder all the family were prepared.

This was the home of one of the oldest Christians in Lakadn province. He alone of a large family is a Christian and the only one in his neighborhood as well. Last term, through his influence, several girls came to the school, and thus opened this place to Christian influence. After a short visit with Uncle Boon Maa and Pa Keo, his heathen wife, Mrs. Missionary said, "I now beg to take leave of you." "I bid you go," said the host, "and I will go along with you," he added, for he wanted Mrs. Missionary to go to the houses where his heathen neighbors would be most open to the Gospel.

This visit was in the home of a girl whose parents have a prosperous store. The girl was overjoyed when she saw Mrs. Missionary, ran to meet her and shook her hand up and down like a pump-handle The mother was pleased too but more moderate in her joy, as befitted her quiet, studied dignity. She brought the only chair in the house and placing it in the most honorable position invited Mrs. Missionary to sit down. Then out came all the family silver, betel boxes and drinking cups. There was altogether quite a display of family heirlooms. Mrs. Missionary begged the pardon of her hostess, saying, "We women from the outside country never chew betel, neither do we smoke, so if you will kindly pardon me I will not take any today." After Mrs. Missionary and her hostess had exchanged a few confidences about their ages, parents, etc., and all the children of the family had been noticed and praised for their beauty and plumpness, the real object of the visit could be presented, which was a talk on the value of education. The hostess agreed with Mrs. Missionary in all she said, but this did not necessarily mean that she really did agree, but only that Lao etiquette required her to do so. Having pressed home in her most forceful style the benefits of education, Mrs. Missionary arose, saying, "I beg to take leave of you." "I bid you go," said the hostess.

Mrs. Missionary went, accompanied by all the children of the neighborhood. She went slowly, sending a delegation on in front announcing her coming. The next call was in an immense teak house. Mrs. Missionary was ushered into the reception-room and given the same chair she had had in the last call. It had been carried on ahead for that purpose. The hostess, a woman of seventy-three, came to greet Mrs. Missionary from the inner room, whither she had fled to "enter into her most honorable clothes". The servants flew here and there, bringing out all the family silver to do honor to the occasion, and the guest had hard work to keep from exclaiming as these most exquisite pieces of workmanship were being displayed. Lao etiquette bade her look perfectly indifferent. This being the first time Mrs. Missionary had been in this home, the hostess was quite distressed because she could not chew betel or smoke, so she said, "Do have a drink of water." When she was told that only boiled water was used by the missionaries she said, "So you never drink anything but cooked water and we Lao never have any cooked water." One of the brightest girls in the school had come from this home. "I want all my grandchildren to have an education," said the old grandmother. "In the coming days only those with an education can hope to succeed in the Laos land. Times have changed and wisdom and learning are entering from the south."

"Please come to my house now," said the little girl when the visit in the great teak hoouse was finished. Proudly, with many a backward smile, the little maid led the way to a beautiful little modern cottage. Here the father and mother rose to greet Mrs. Missionary most cordially and invite her to sit on one of the two chairs in the house. The man of the house sat in the other. It was a lovely little home, scrupulously clean; the floor of the reception-room was polished until it shone like a mirror. Both the parents were most enthusiastic over their daughter's education and the industrial training she was receiving in the school, saying, "She was Mrs. Missionary's little Christian, and she could teach her what she needed to know." This gave the guest a splendid opportunity to tell the parents something of Christianity as well.

The next visit was in a home where Dr. Crooks had been called late one night to attend a girl unconscious with fever. Life was almost gone, but with heroic effort it was saved. Nothing opens homes to missionaries like the medical work. Mrs. Missionary was given a warm welcome, especially from the girl whose life had been saved. "Please don't sit on that rug," she said, as Mrs. Missionary was about to settle on a straw rug, "wait a second." A gentle bump from the inner room announced the arrival of the borrowed rug via the window, and proudly it was brought forth.

Thus ended the visits in that community, and altogether Mrs. Missionary and Boa Kam had a most delightful morning. The cause of education was enhanced, the Gospel preached and the family silver aired. They went back through the busy market, where the school-girls called to them from all sides. Mrs. Missionary rejoiced as the girls came out to greet her. She remembered not many months back when not one of these girls was touched by the Gospel. Now the school has opened all these homes to Christian influence. One hundred and forty girls were enrolled in the Katherine Fleeson Memorial School last year, making it rank among the largest girls' schools in all Siam.—FLORENCE B. CROOKS, in Woman's Work.

THE STONE BABY.

Little Japanese Uner was dead. His Buddhist mama was so grieved. He was all the child she had and now he was gone and it was so lonesome. But that wasn't the worst of it. His mama believed his spirit had to go into a dog, or cat, or cow, or chicken, or something, and go right on living. Who knew whether folks would be good to the animal that had Uner inside! He could no longer talk and they would not know. Poor little boy! and the tears fell fast.

"I will go and see about it right off," she said. So she sped away to a stone-cutter.

"Get me a little grey slab of stone," she said, "and chisel out on one side of it a baby's head as like my baby's as you can make it. Do it clearly and do it quickly. I must get it to the temple at once, that Kwan Yin may take pity on my little son and keep him from harm."

This mama was rich. When her stone image was done, a servant carried it for her to the temple and set it down in front of the big Japanese god. A poor neighbor of hers stole up wistfully. Her baby

DENTON is situated in the Piedmont hills of Davidson County twenty miles South from Thomasville on the Carolina and Yadkin River Rail Road. This Railroad connects us with the Southern at Thomasville and High Point on the north and with the Southbound at High Rock on the South. About 350 yards west from the depot on Salisbury Street, nestling among a beautiful grove of oaks, is the home of Denton High School.

OUR COURSE OF STUDY prepares for any College, also for our State University. We give each student personal atention and do everything necessary for their comfort and advancement. A thoroughly competent teacher has been employed for the Music Department, and those who take this course will receive special attention. A High School Business Course will be taught free of charge as to tuition. Special work in Pedagogy for those who intend to teach.

FREE TUITION to ministerial students and children of the ministers of the North Carolina Conference. Cost of all necessary expenses for a year ranges from $115 to $145. We board students in good private homes. Indigent young men can get rooms and board themselves at actual cost. If any one wishes to pay a part or even all expenses by work, write the Principal for particulars. The school uses water from deep drilled wells with pumps, which eliminates all danger from germs in the water. Pure air, pure water, plenty of work; if these do not give health to the student, he will never have it. Write the Principal at Denton, N. C., for any further information.

also was dead. She had no money to make an image, so she longingly laid down by the other's slab a plain little stone from the brook.

So many, many mamas must have cried tears, for there was a regular forest of little grey silent babies standing in front of the big god, yes, and heaps of little stones from the brook, too. The mothers had prayers written out for them on strips of strong paper. These were fastened on to the front door with thousands of others. Maybe the mother thought wistfully, "I wish I knew whether the great Kwan Yin, who must look after my child, was a man or a woman. How queer it would have been if Uner had not known, when he saw one of us coming, whether it was his father or mother. Anyway, O great Kwan Yin, carry my little son safely through all his troubles to a good time and a great peace somewhere beyond." She had finished.

The big, still idol kept on being big and still. The little grey stone babies were as silent as ever. The last baby come to this strange nursery, the little stone Uner, copied the manners of the rest and said never a word, and his mother went away crying still for the little arms that would not go round her neck any more.—Mission Studies.

—The Living Church: "'Socialism' is an alluring word; but the word must not blind us to facts as to what is preached and practiced in its name. The current political socialism of the day offers, largely, a gospel of hatred and of class war, by means of which to reach ends that seem good. The church may largely approve those ends, but it must substitute a gospel of love as the means of attaining them."

—China continues to show an extraordinary interest in the Scriptures. Writing from Shanghai, Dr. G. H. Bondfield reports that the issues from the Bible House there for the month of April alone exceeded 317,000 volumes. During the first four months of this year 158,000 more books were issued than during the corresponding four months of 1912. The increased demand is not merely for Gospels, but for Bibles and Testaments; nearly 5,000 more Bibles and 6,600 more Testaments have been called for.

BAPTIST DOCTRINE.

W. C. TYREE, D. D.

Last month we considered what Baptists believe and teach about the Bible, the first in the list of our distinctive doctrine. This month our subject will be the second in the list of our distinctive doctrines, viz.: What Baptists believe and teach about the church. Our views on this subject differ from the views held by other denominations, and the difference involves so much and is so important every Baptist, young and old, should understand it thoroughly.

II.

"A church is an organized body of baptized believers in Christ. Every church is a separate and independent body accountable only to Christ and governed only by the Word of God. Every member of the church has equal rights and privileges. There are two and only two offices in the church with scriptural warrant and authority, the office of pastor and the office of deacon. There are two and only two ordinances for the church to observe, viz.: Baptism and the Lord's Supper."

We believe it is the privilege and duty of all true disciples of Christ, all who have believed on Him and surrendered to Him and trust in Him as a personal Savior, to join the church and that only such should be members. Believers in Christ are converted or regenerated, so we believe that a church should be made up only of converted or regenerated.

Baptists have always contended for a regenerated church membership, which of course, means a clear and distinct separation between the church and the world. This doctrine has been and to some extent is still peculiar to the Baptists and it is to us a fundamental doctrine. By teaching and contending for this we have probably rendered our greatest service to the cause of vital religion and to the world. Other denominations have taught and do teach that the church is the right place for people who intend and are trying to live right. Others teach that to be in the church will help people to become Christians and then the church will help them to become better Christians. But we teach that the church is not the right place for people until they have become converted or regenerated.

We believe that the first command which Christ gives to those who believe on Him is to be baptized, and we think that every one who accepts Christ as Lord and Savior should obey this command as soon as possible. By doing this we make a public declaration that we have become a follower of Christ and we believe that no one who has not obeyed this command and made this public declaration ought to be a member of the church. So we believe that the church should contain only regenerated people who have been baptized. We believe that every church is a separate and independent body. It is not as other denominations hold a part of a general system. A church is not dependent on any other body of men for its regulation or government. It is not responsible to any council, conference or synod for its actions, its decisions or its doctrines. Each separate church should regulate and govern itself according to its own interpretation of the will of Christ as it is revealed in the New Testament. As each church is thus separate and independent we do not speak of the Baptist church as a whole, but of Baptist churches. The members of the church are all on the same level. There should be no separate orders or classes, but each one of its members, however humble or obscure, has the same rights, privileges and authority as the others. In government therefore a church is a pure democracy. The vote of one member counts for as much as the vote of another, and in all church decisions and actions the minority is governed by the majority. According to the New Testament, as we understand it, there are two, and only two officers in a church whose authority the members are required to recognize and respect, the pastor and deacon. We do not have presiding elders, bishops, priests or popes because we do not find authority for such officers in the New Testament. The words bishop and elder do appear there, but the connection in which they occur shows plainly that they mean the same thing that pastor means. So all three refer to the one and the same office. To the church we believe two ordinances have been committed to be perpetually observed, viz.: Baptism and the Lord's Supper. So both of these are church ordinances to be administered only by the church. No one should administer the ordinance of baptism as an individual and upon his own responsibility, but only by authority of some church should he baptize a candidate who has been approved by the church. The Lord's Supper also should be celebrated only by the church, and confined to those who are members of the church. We do not believe the New Testament teaches that any individual should, as a priest, administer the bread and wine used in the Supper, to any body as a sacrament, as is sometimes done in other denominations.

That is what we believe and teach about the visible and local church so often referred to in the New Testament. In a few instances the word church is used in the New Testament in another sense. In Matthew 16: 18, Christ says to Peter: "Upon this rock I will build my church." In Hebrews 12: 23 the writer speaks of "the general assembly and church of the first born who are enrolled in heaven." In these and a few other passages the reference is not to the visible local church, but to all who have been redeemed by Christ both on earth and in heaven. In this latter sense the word church occurs in the New Testament only a few times but it is often used in the former sense to designate the local body of baptized believers in Christ.—Baptist Messenger.

THE JUDGMENT OF CHRIST.

He sat down over against the treasury and watched the worshipers as they brought their contributions to the support of the Temple and the care of the poor. It will not be difficult to imagine some of the crowd who passed before the Savior's eyes. Human nature was the same then as now. Fashions of thought are ever changing, essential life remains the same. The fickle seasons alter the colors of the landscape; its general contours abide. Take the crowd that goes to church to-day, and with slightly differing modes you have the crowd that went up to the Temple in the days of our Lord. Let us look upon two of the types.

Here comes Dives, somewhat haughty and supercilious, "clothed in purple and fine linen," and most evidently "faring sumptuously every day." If we are walking in the crowd and are anywhere near him, we may overhear snatches of most familiar speech. "Trade bad!" "Taxes heavy!" "Innumerable calls!" "Terrible losses!" "Don't know what the country is coming to!" "Have to retrench and reduce all round!" But if we could hear a deeper speech, even the speech of the heart, we might hear a different story. At any rate, superstition is not quite dead, and Dives regards the treasury as in some way a custodian of his own wealth; a little charity is a good investment, it may conciliate good fortune, and hedge him about with hallowed serenity. So he drops his loud-sounding gift into the coffers; and the eyes of Judgment are looking on.

But here comes a widow, known by her garb of sorrow; a "poor widow," as is evidenced by her faded dress and wasted face. Her eyes are fixed upon the ground, or when she lifts them they have that far-away look which sorrow so often brings. Perhaps as she goes she is repeating to herself some of the psalms of the sanctuary. Perhaps we might overhear her saying this: "It was too painful for me, until I went into the sanctuary!" And she carries something in her hand, "even all her living," and she quietly, almost stealthily, but gratefully, drops it into the treasury; and the eyes of Judgment are looking "And He called unto him his disciples, and said unto them, Verily I say unto you, This poor widow cast in more than all they that are casting into the treasury: for they all did cast in of their superfluity, but she of her want did cast in all that she had, even all her living." And there the woman stands, with her two mites in her hand, and the generations come and go, but her figure and her sacrifice will never fade away. She gave "two mites which make a farthing," and she achieved unconscious immortality.—Rev. J. H. Jowett.

MARRIED.

JOHNSON-THOMAS.

On Oct. 15, at 10 o'clock, at the beautiful country home of Mr. and Mrs. Byrd W. Johnson, of Stokesdale, N. C., was celebrated a wedding of rare beauty and of much interest to friends and relatives.

The marriage vows were taken by their fair young daughter Effie Parmelia and M. Walter Thomas. Seated at the organ was Miss Clara Byrd of Summerfield, surrounded with ferns and chrysanthemums, when sweetly chimed forth the first faint notes of Mendelssohn's wedding march during which from out the adjoining room slowly proceeded the bridal party in order thus:

Miss Nina Johnson, sister of the bride, as maid of honor was attended by Alfred B. Bray of Stokesdale as best man; next came Jessie Byrd of Summerfield with Ira N. Johnson of Greensboro, a brother of the bride; lastly came the bride and groom.

Just at this point the waiting company were attracted by a vision of loveliness, the bride hanging on the arm of her betrothed, handsomely attired in a traveling suit of navy blue cloth, hat and gloves to match.

The vows were spoken by Rev. W. F. Kennett. Only a few near relatives and friends were present. Immediately after the ceremony Mr. and Mrs. Thomas left for Washington, New York and other northern cities. Mr. Thomas is a promising young Christian man, whose life and character are reputed to be such as his bride and new-found relatives can be proud of. He is a native of Rockingham County and well known in the county and has been secretary for J. T. Price for several years.

Miss Johnson is a lineal descendant of Sampson Lanier, being a great-great-granddaughter of his and comes of a very aristocratic family.

She is a beautiful young lady, a fine Christian girl, and is one of Flat Rock's most faithful members, being organist and secretary for Sunday school.

We wish for them a long and happy life.

One Who was Present.

BEING in doubt, I say,
Lord, make it plain!
Which is the true, safe way?
Which would be in vain?
I am not wise to know,
Not sure of foot to go,
My blind eyes can not see
What is so clear to Thee;
Lord, make it clear to me.
Being perplexed, I say,
Lord, make it right!
Night is as day to Thee,
Darkness as light.
I am afraid to touch
Things that involve too much;
My trembling hand may shake,
My skill-less hand may break—
Thine can make no mistake.

Elon College

For Both Men and Women

Elon College, North Carolina

For a quarter century Elon College has rendered the best families of the South a paragon service in providing young men and young women with the best mental, moral and physical training under positive Christian influences, tho entirely free from sectarianism.

Karl Lehman, of Boston, testifies that "of all the Colleges I have visited as International Field Secretary of Christian Endeavor during six years, the spirit of Elon College appeals to me as most genuinelu Christian." Elon College is situated in the delightful hill country, a section unsurpassed for beauty, with a climate far-famed for its healthfulness. There is no medical fee, for there is no necessity for it. Its campus, comprising twenty-five acres of native oak and hickory, shrubbery, winding walks and driveways, is one of the most beautiful in the South and, with its two unsurpassed gymnasia, provides abundant opportunity for recreation and relaxation.

The splendid equipment of Elon College was only made possible through liberal endowment. It maintains seven elegant new buildings, especially designed and appointed for college work. These are furnished with every known convenience; steam heat, electric lights, running water, baths and sewerage. The College plant is conservatively valued at $300,000.00.

Elon College is distinctly a high-grade institution, though its charges are moderate. Its graduates are admitted to the graduate departments of all the great universities without examination. Its literary and scientific courses are arranged in various departments which lead to the degrees of Master of Arts, Bachelor of Arts, Bachelor of Science, Bachelor of Philosophy, Bachelor of Pedagogy, and a three-years' course leading to the degree of Licentiate of Instruction, designed especially for teachers. This institution affords special opportunities for training in Piano, Voice, Expression, Fine Arts, Normal Training, Physical Culture and Commercial Practice.

The Faculty consists of twenty-one specialists; men and women selected not only for their superior teaching ability, but also for their exemplary character and manners.

The student body numbers nearly four hundred and comes from thirteen states.

DR. JOHN VINCENT'S SUMMARY OF THE METHODIST CREED.

1. I believe that all men are sinners.

2. I believe that God the Father loves all men and hates all sin.

3. I believe that Jesus Christ died for all men, to make possible their salvation from sin, and to make sure the salvation of all who believe in Him.

4. I believe that the Holy Spirit is given to all men to enlighten and to incline them to repent of their sins and to believe in the Lordr Jesus Christ.

5. I believe that all who repent of their sins and believe in the Lord Jesus Christ receive the forgiveness of sins. This is justification.

6. I believe that all who receive the forgiveness of sins are at the same time made new creatures in Christ Jesus. This is regeneration.

7. I believe that all who are made new creatures in Christ Jesus are accepted as children of God. This is adoption.

8. I believe that all who are accepted as children of God may receive the inward assurance of the Holy Spirit to that fact. This is the witness of the Spirit.

9. I believe that all who truly desire it and seek it may love God with all the heart, soul, mind and strength, and their neighbors as themselves. This is entire sanctification.

10. I believe that all who persevere to the end, and only these, shall be saved in heaven forever.

—A brother writes protesting against the publication in the Herald of such matter as the governor's good roads proclamation and popular talks on law. We have respect for this brother's opinion—as much respect perhaps as we could have for any opinion that we think false. We do not know this brother personally, only by his letters of which this is not the first of the kind, if we are not mistaken; but we respect him a great deal more than we do this particular opinion of his. We believe he could do what we could not do: that he could trudge through the mud to church on Sunday morning, sit down in a cold and dirty room, with window panes out and the floor unswept, and be perfectly comfortable and happy dreaming and singing of heaven. We believe in heaven too, but we cannot wholly disregard present surroundings, and we believe in a Christianity that moves people to try to improve conditions in this world. We believe that Christianity is at the bottom of the good roads movement among Christian and enlightened people. When our governor asked us to publish his proclamation, we thought we would be doing a good and proper serivce to comply with his request. We were glad to hear one of our readers say recently that the people of his community are going to turn out at the time named by the governor and work the roads. As to the talks on law, these deal with matters of personal rights and obligations such as every right-feeling man ought to want to know about in order that he may deal fairly with his fellowmen. We pay the writer of these talks for them, and supposed we were doing our people a real service by presenting them. If, however, there are many like our good brother referred to above, we will save ourselves the expense. We don't expect to hear of many who object to this use of a portion of our space.

AN UPREACHING COMMUNITY.

We do not find "upreaching" in our dictionary, but we need the word and so coin it to describe a community we were in last Sunday. We had heard of an M. P. church that originated in this peculiar way: A number of farmers, not church members and not Christians, living in Chatham Co., felt the need of church privileges and Christian influences for their families. They talked about the matter and one day met on a hill in the woods, made a clearing, built a brush arbor, prepared seats and erected a platform and rude pulpit and then sent an invitation to Rev. Wm. Amick to come and hold a protracted meeting. He came and preached with his usual earnestness and had a great meeting, those farmers who built the arbor being among the converts. A church was organizzed and a house of worship built and named Hope. This church is now on Chatham circuit under the pastoral care of Rev. J. H. Bowman. By his invitation we preached for him in Hope church last Sunday. After the services, Mr. Isaac Dunlap, a Baptist brother present, spoke of the interesting history of Hope church, recounting the circumstances which enabled us to identify it as the church of whose peculiar origin we had heard. We felt that we were on sacred ground. Nearby the church is the cemetery where probably sleep some of the first members, for that occurred nearly forty years ago. Hope church has taken on new liife in recent years. The congregations are now good and there is a live Sunday school under the superintendence of Mr. W. J. Underwood, a Presbyterian brother of so broad and liberal spirit that he works with our people as if they were his own. A town has sprung up around Hope church bearing the euphonious name of Bonlee. It is a station on the Southern and one of the termini of the Bonlee and Western Railroad, a new road built and owned largely by Mr. John Dunlap. The Dunlap brothers are enterprising business men, running mills at different places, besides this railroad, and they have done and are doing much for material development in this community. The town of Bonlee has quite a number of neat new residences and stores are coming in. There is also a Baptist church with a devoted membership which gives promise of a bright future.

But not satisfied with this achievement, the community is now reaching up after higher educational advantages. A corporation has been formed and preparation made to build a splendid high school building. Mr. John Dunlap who gives the site and $10,000 toward the building and equipment also pledges $1,000 a year for running expenses for five years. It is the purpose to establish a school of high grade and make its advantages available to people of small means. The contract for the building has been let and the school is to open next September.

During our say in Bonlee we were pleasantly entertained in the homes of Bro. Wm. J. Underwood and Bro. W. J. Talley. The latter is the general manager of the Bonlee and Western Railroad and is making it pay dividends.

SOME QUESTIONS.

While things are being said, I too will have my little say.

I find in the Constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church,

ARTICLE XVII.

Provision for Altering the Constitution.

1. Alterations of this Constitution may be effected by means of overtures, submitted by the General Conference, and confirmed by two-thirds of the Annual Conferences.

Is there any other way by which the Constitution of our Church may be lawfully altered?

Why talk of clothing delegates with conventional powers?

What are conventional powers? and where do we find in the Constitution of our Church anything about conventionaal powers?

The Constitution says that "Alterations of this Constitution may be effected by means of overtures, submitted by the General Conference." How about a committee of the General Conference submitting overtures to the Annual Conferences? Could the General Conference, under the Constitution, delegate to a committee the authority to submit overtures? If a committee has this authority, why go to the trouble and expense of calling a session of the General Conference?

The name Methodist Protestant Church is a part of the constitution of that church, Article I. Can that name be changed without an overture, submitted by the General Conference, and confirmed by two-thirds of the Annual Conferences?

If the name is changed according to the law of the Church, does that carry the property of the Methodist Protestant Church to the church of the new name?

I suppose that nearly all of our church property is deeded to trustees for the use and benefit of the Methodist Protestant Church. If the name of the church is lawfully changed, is not the church of the new name the owner of all the rights and privileges of the Methodist Protestant Church?

Perhaps some of our lawyer members can answer these questions.

In the consummation of the proposed union, if all is done according to the plain letter of the Constitution, will not a way be opened for almost endless litigation? and will not litigation follow? And if this thing is done hastily, will there be any fewer denominations? And will not hard feelings and heart burnings follow? And will these things be for the glory of God?

I am not opposed to the proposed union, nor am I a stickler for a name. I do not even get insulted—strange as it may seem to some—when some one calls me a Protestant Methodist instead of a Methodist Protestant. But I do not much like to be called a Protestant—specially when it is pronounced Prodezun—and that is what we will be called, if we take the proposed new name. Any one that wants to may fool himself into believing that he will be called United Protestant. And if he is, what will it mean?

We would have to be continually explaining what we were and what we stood for.

No, I am not a stickler for a name, and a rose by some other name would even smell the same to me. But I would like for the name to have a pleasing sound—"harmonious to my ear."

I am in favor of the union—but if it is going to cause a split in our own ranks, I stay with the friends that I have loved and with whom I have labored these years. For what is the good of a union that will be a division? Some individuals may profit by such a union.

So far as I am concerned, the name does not stand in my way.

I am for union when it is such a union as the whole Methodist Protestant Church will willingly and freely enter; till then not for

Yours truly,

C. L. Whitaker.

THE UNION QUESTION.

Having read all that has appeared in the Methodist Protestant and M. P. Herald in reference to the proposed union between the M. P. Church and the U. B. Church, I must confess that I have seen no evidence adduced that has convinced me of the wisdom of the proposed union. There has been some beautiful sentiment expressed, but solid proof of the good that is likely to come to the M. P. Church as a result of such union, I have failed to see. There has been a dealing in glittering generalities, but real, practical, tangible, concrete facts, have been wanting. It has all been too mazy, misty, shadowy. When persons "get it into their heads to get married," they can always see good and convincing reasons, whether anybody else does or not; so it seems that an element in the M. P. Church has determined to get married, nolens volens; and they seem to think that the present "offer" is the best "chance" that has come their way. But marry, they must. They seem to write upon the assumption that the thing is sure to "come off," and that it is folly, or sin, to oppose it. But what sound, substantial reasons have been given for this proposed union? Just because somebody thinks it is the thing to do? Is that all? This seems to be about all the reason that we have seen. But union is beautiful! Indeed it is, where there is real unity; but mere organic union without the spirit of unity, is but an empty name. We would not be understood to oppose that unity, or oneness, for which Christ prayed, as recorded in the 17th chapter of John, and of which Paul speaks in Eph. 4: 13; but this is something more than the organic union of Christian bodies. Something infinitely deeper, closer, intenser, and more divine, than something done by a little conferring, a little legislating of the few for the many, the most of whom have never been consulted. Yes, we are intensely in favor of that unity for which Christ prayed, and about which Paul wrote; but this can never be realized in the manner that is being proposed. It is a matter of the spirit and inner life.

Will some one please tell us what real good will come to the M. P. Church by this proposed union, if consummated? Will it make us better Christians? Give us more power with God and with men? Give us easier victory over the world, the flesh and the devil? If so, we ought to consummate it by all means; if not, where is the advantage? We fail to see it.

Is it material good? We fail to see this. For the churches united will not have a single member, nor dollar more, than the two have apart. With just the same amount of work to do that they have separated. So where is the gain? Now if the U. B. Church would cease its present work and help us do our work, that would help us immensely; or if we were to cease our work and help the U. B. do theirs, this would be quite a help to them. But for each to continue doing his own allotted work as is now being done, where is the gain? A man has $100 in one purse and $500 in another; he takes the $500 out of the one purse and puts it in with the $100; but has he any more money by this juggling? Of course not. We can bunch, or pool, our dollars, but we cannot pool our mission stations, churches, nor colleges; and it will be difficult to pool our official organs. We M. P.'s have failed to consolidate our two general organs after 36 years of contemporary existence. So where is the real material gain? Not a man nor dollar gained; not a bit less work to be done.

There might be the cutting off of a few general secretaries; but of this we have no assurance. This is the only ghost of gain that we can see on this ecclesiastical horizon—a mere phantom.

But what of the loss to the M. P. Church, should this thing consummate? This seems to have had a small place in the thought of the most who have written. Some enterprises are being hindered already by this union agitation. How many or extensive, we know not. But we believe that there is more of it than we have anticipated. I feel that we had better not hurry. Go slowly. Be careful. Take time to think. as we attempt to steer our craft up this tortuous stream. Let us have something more than beautiful sentiment and glittering generalities. Facts, brethren, facts. We want the substantial, tangible, concrete reasons. Something more than that it is beautiful, and that it will make us "bigger." The size of a thing does not of itself determine its value. We believe that the veil ought to be taken away, so that all the people can see, and then give each one a chance to register his convictions. What we have said, I suppose, will not create a ripple on the ecclesiastical waters; but we wanted to say it, and will say, in conclusion, Let well enough alone, unless we are sure we can do better. J. F. Dosier.

CHURCH UNION.

I have watched, with deep and increasing interest, the discussions on the proposed union of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ and the Methodist Protestant Church and, so far, I have seen nothing that convinces me that this union is not desirable and practicable.

Some who favor the union oppose the basis of union as agreed upon by the Commissioners of the two churches. Others, and I am inclined to think that they are greatly in the minority, oppose the union on general principles. They do not want to unite with any church. I have all due respect for the opinion of those who do not think as I do upon this matter and I accord to them the same privilege that I ask for myself, and that is, to act according to their own judgment. However, for me this last reason is not a valid one. As I see it, those who take this position must furnish the wisdom that justifies the existence in the United States of one hundred and eighty five different Protestant denominations. I do not believe that it can be done. Common sense, business economy, and Christian brotherhood are all against it. I do not believe that Jesus intended that His church should ever be broken up into so many different and rival bodies. It was not so at the beginning and should not be so now. Such conditions as we now have give rise to small and struggling churches, necessitate an underpaid ministry, and make business economy in the use of both men and money impossible. Many communities all over the country are trying to support two, three, and four churches, and in many cases even more than that, when one, and at most two, are amply sufficient to do all the work of the community. Who can argue that such conditions best promote the Kingdom of our Master and that this is even a rational, not to say economical and Christian way, of doing the work? The tendency of this union and all other like unions is to eliminate such conditions and to magnify the real spirit and purpose of the church.

As to the basis of union agreed upon by the Commissioners of the two churches, I have to say that it is not to my liking in every particular. If I had made it myself, it would not have been beyond criticism. But my hope is that the wisdom and Christian fairness in both churches may find a way to so amend the basis of union as to disarm criticism and unite the vast majority in both churches on this great question. If this cannot be done, then it seems to me that the time for this union is not yet.

It muse be remembered, of course, that no union can be consummated without concessions by both churches, and as I understand the situation, both churches have made concessions. It must also be remembered that enough concessions cannot be made to satisfy, in every particular, the individual preferences of the four hundred and fifty thousand members in the two churches. But what can be done, I sincerely hope, is to find a basis of union upon which the vast majority in both churches can be agreed. If the union of these two churches is "desirable and practical," as our last General Conference unanimously declared and as our brethren of the U. B. Church have also emphatically declared, then it does seem to me that it will be an ecclesiastical crime for either church to defeat it. If it is desirable, it ought to be, and I for one believe that it can be, without the surrender of any principle either in doctrine or polity that is vital to either church. Why then keep them longer apart? I cannot see the wisdom of it. I believe that God wills this union and that it will be consummated if these two churches follow the divine leading. S. W. Taylor.

ASSESSMENT ON VANCE CIRCUIT FOR GENERAL INTERESTS.

In last week's issue of the Herald Brother Whitaker calls attention to the difference in the assessments of Vance and Roanoke Cts. The comparison shows Vance up very unfavorably. Bro. Whitaker got his information from the Minutes, and is therefore to be excused. I do not know whether the assessment committee is to be blamed, or the publishing committee. But the fact is Vance Circuit is assessed for general interests, including president's salary, $224.00. I think, however, there is at least a grain of justice in Bro. Whitaker's criticism. I guess about the only thing taken into consideration in laying these assessments is the willingness of the people. I suppose this is about what Bro. Whitaker and myself would do if we constituted the committee. If we were trying to haul a heavy load up hill, and had just two horses, one a good puller, and the other no puller at all, we would expect the puller to draw the load. I know this is a good way to balk the good horse. I sometimes wonder how much longer the old faithful horse is going to tug at the load. How to get things evened up, and each one to do his part is a problem which I wish some expert mathematician would solve for the North Carolina Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church. Bro. J. F. McCulloch seems to be good in mathematics: possibly he can give us a solution of the problem. J. A. Burgess.

[There is a famous problem called The Problem of Three Bodies which has perplexed mathematicians for centuries. The papers recently reported that this has been solved by a mathematician in the North of Europe—a Swede, I believe. As I have gotten somewhat out of the mathematical habit, I would suggest that this problem be referred to him.—J. F. M.]

"From all the dark places
Of earth's heathen races,
O see how the thick shadows fly!
The voice of salvation
Awakes every nation,
'Come over and help us,' they cry.
The kingdom is coming,
Oh, tell ye the story,
God's banner exalted shall be!
The earth shall be full of His Knowledge and glory,
As waters that cover the sea!"

"SISTER MATTIE GIVING."

One of Mrs. Peabody's Jubilee stories lingering in the memory has been brought to surface by the present discussion of tithing and systematic giving. It is of a man who wandered into a church one day and found another man sitting alone near the back, listening to the serious discussion of a band of women at the front. Unable to get an understanding of the subject, but certain from the solemnity of the women that it was a matter of weighty importance (surely not of cheer and happiness), the newcomer approached the other man and murmured: "I beg your pardon. Can you tell me what the ladies are discussing?" "I am sorry, but I cannot," replied the first. "I have been here only a few minutes and haven't heard much; but as nearly as I can gather, they are holding a funeral service for Sister Mattie Giving." And yet "the Lord loveth a hilarious giver."—Selected.

PIEDMONT CT.

I am going to give Peter Slewfoot another chance. On last Saturday afternoon I came back from Winston, and when I got near my boarding place I saw a large crowd assembled at the house, and I could not imagine what was the matter. I drove on to the house and then everybody began to smile, and I soon saw what was up. The good people of the Canaan neighborhood and some from Mt. Pleasant had gathered to give the pastor a pounding. They soon had a long table spread with everything good to eat on it, and then they brought out an eighteen-dollar suit of cothes and a four-dollar pair of shoes and presented them to the pastor. We then ate to our satisfaction, and then a short talk by the pastor, and we sang a good old song, had prayer and then all journeyed homeward. It was indeed a glad occasion, and may God bless these dear people for their tokens of esteem and love, and may God enable us to be a greater blessing to them than ever before. A. D. Shelton.

MOCKSVILLE CT.

I have held seven special meetings on the work; I have two others to hold. We have had good meetings: 54 conversions and a number of reclamations; 21 have joined our church and others will join on my next round. Rev. S. M. Needham helped me in one meeting and did good earnest work, and it did the church good. Rev. T. E. Davis aided in one meeting and preached well; all enjoyed it. Rev. W. P. Martin was with me at Bethel two days and did some fine preaching. He was with me also at Elbaville. Rev. W. C. Lassiter came and joined us on Monday and remained until Wednesday night. He did good faithful work. Bro. Martin and I stayed till Friday; closed with good success. Rev. Geo. E. Hunt was my help at Union Grove, and he did some able preaching, as he always does. And I am sure that all the people greatly appreciate the faithful and efficient services, and will join me in thanking these brethren for the good work they have done among us.

We were hindered much by rain. I think every meeting would have been much better if we had not been rained out so much of the time. I am encouraged to find that the people are taking a greater interest along all lines of church work. I am hoping to bring up every claim in full this year.

The third quarterly conference declared Bro. Lonnie Hopkins elected delegate to the Annual Conference. Bro. Charlie Carter was elected alternate. J. W. Self.

To the Official Members.

Brethren, get busy and have good reports. You know it will be only about four weeks to the Annual Conference. Our fourth quarterly conference will meet at the parsonage at 11 o'clock on Saturday before the second Sunday in November. We hope to have Bro. Cecil with us on that day if he can come. J. W. Self.

ANDERSON AND YARBORO CTS

We have about finished our revival work for the year. The last meeting was at Cross Keys. Great interest manifested, but was rained out.

We have had a very prosperous year. Good revivals in the churches; forty-eight additions, with a few more to be received yet. Yarborough, 16; Liberty Hill, 15; Fairview, 10, and Harmony, 5.

Our congregation has continued to grow all the year. Sunday schools show good increase especially: Anderson charge has about doubled their attendance.

I am gratified with the interest manifested. While I have such a large work I can't give much time to any church, the people have been loyal and I have enjoyed the co-operation of the people. Peace seems to reign in all the congregations. Anderson charge has reached the point where they want (an omission in the copy comes here which we cannot supply. Editor) mountain called Pinnacle. I wonder if Bro. Hunter lives on that mountain. I assisted J. E. McSwain in meeting; found him doing well. W. A. Lamar.

OUR M. P. SCHOOL AT DENTON, N. C.,

Conducted by Rev. G. L. Reynolds and Miss Martin, is now on a sure foundation and the school seems to have a bright future, and I believe our people will stand by the school and make it go forward.

Will all those who are interested in the educational work of the M. P. Church and the upbuilding of God's Kingdom through our beloved church please send me some amount of money at once to pay the debt on the building and buy a little more land for the use of the school. Brethren and sisters and friends of the M. P. Church, please respond at once with some amount to this worthy cause and encourage a tired teacher. Send all money to me at Concord, N. C. Yours in His service,

D. A. Braswell.

HALIFAX CIRCUIT.

The fourth quarterly conference will convene at Bethesda church on Friday before the second Sunday in Nov., this being the 7th day of Nov. Rev. C. L. Whitaker will preach at 11 o'clock; there will be dinner on the grounds and the quarterly conference will be held in the afternoon. A full attendance is desired.

There will be a meeting of the membership of Eden church on Friday before the 1st Sunday in Nov. at 2 o'clock. Every member of the church is asked to be at the church that afternoon, as there will be business of importance to transact.

J. E. Pritchard, Pastor.

OLD FOLKS' DAY AT GRACE CHURCH.

The morning service at Grace Church next Sunday will be for the older members and friends of the congregation. All parents and elderly people are cordially invited to attend —Attendance at Grace S. S. last Sunday was 226. The enrollment went up to 264.

—Rev. M. McG. Shields, moderator of the N. C. Synod of the Presbyterian Church, preached a helpful sermon at Grace Church last Sunday.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Those coming to the Annual Conference in High Point, Oct. 19-24, hoping to be entertained, will please let me know within the next ten days. Pastors need not do this except for the sake of their delegates. But I shall look to pastors to report for their delegates. Some have already reported. Our meeting begins Sunday, Oct. 19, and as soon as that is over we must get to work in earnest to get things in readiness for Conference. Any suggestions for arrangement of program are now in order.

High Point, N. C., Oct. 14, 1913.

—Bro. John M. Coble of Liberty went to Sanford last Saturday to visit his son who is a highway engineer.

—A Russian explorer has discovered a new island in the Arctic ocean. It is described as mountainous and uninhabited. We do not expect to hear of any great migration of settlers to it.

—The exhibits of the Sharps at the fair here are attracting much attention. They are among Guilford's best farmers.

—Miss Talley, of Bonlee, has gone to Burlington to take a position in a milliner's establishment.

—Another great sea disaster is reported. The Steamer Volturno caught fire in time of a storm. Other ships came in response to the wireless call but so stormy were the waters that rescues could not be made and 136 people went down to watery graves. At last a ship laden with oil came and by spraying oil on the waters the sea became calm enough for small boats to be used and many were saved.

—The Odell Hardware Co. has recently been making an exhibit of a fireless cooker, which we have been long convinced is a good thing.

—The Journal and Messenger: "The Roman Catholics are coming to the view that their Vulgate edition of the Bible is not what they want it to be. It was made to conform in large measure to the Tyndale and, finally, the King James translations; and now that there has been some improvement in the common version, it is in order for Rome to avail herself of the scholarship of the age. Accordingly, Abbot Gasque, head of the English Benedictines, is on his way to this country in an effort to raise funds for the proposed revision. Cardinal Merry del Val has given him a letter informing him that the pope highly approves his project, and it is probable that he will meet with much success in his mission for money."

THE SUFFERING WAY.

"In bringing many sons unto glory, to make the author of their salvation perfect through sufferings."

"Alawys bearing about in the body the dying of Jesus, that the life of Jesus may be manifested in our body."

Oh! this is a Suffering Way—
My feet are weary,
My heart afraid—
As I go, I query
"Why am I made
To walk in this Suffering Way?"

Oh, this is a Suffering Way!
When I cast my heart
In the furnace of fire
It seemed to burn hotter—
I questioned the potter.
"Is it your desire that I suffer this fire?
Do you wish me to stay in this Suffering Way?"

Oh, this is a Suffering Way!
I am near the close of the day—
Now I surely may rest—
I know it is best.
I have borne the day's burden,
Now I wait for my guerdon,
And here by the wayside I'll tarry and stay
Just outside the Suffering Way.

But right in the Suffering Way
I saw One on before—
His visage was marred,
His body was scarred
Than all others more—
The print of the nails and the spear
Even there I could see clear
That my heart gave a bound,
And again I had found
My place in the Suffering Way.

And there in the Suffering Way
My feet that were weary before
Seemed to spring with a bound
Of rest newly found—
My heart that was sore afraid
And questioning, "Why am I made
To walk in this Suffering Way?"

Seemed so full of joy, it must shout and sing
Of its freedom and gladness.
A glad new ring
Gave place to erst sadness.
Like a bird on the wing
I sped on apace,
Till I came face to face
With the One in the Suffering Way.

—M. M. F. in Woman's Work in the Far East.

—Religious Herald: "Some people come out from the 'Hardshell' camp like Pharaoh wanted Moses to come out of Egypt—'a little way'; others come out as Moses did come—entirely out. One of our state evangelists recently had a remarkable experience in a county in southern Virginia, where 'Hardshell' sentiment prevails, even in a so-called missionary Baptist church. He preached twelve sermons in eight days; had several professions of faith; received eighty-two cents for his service, and a deacon of the church charged him $2.50 for taking him to the station. Thank God and take courage. There was a time when Baptist preachers could not get out of a county except by way of the jail."

The following official statistics of religious bodies in Japan have been published by the Japanese Bureau of Religion:

Christians	140,000
Buddhists	29,420,000
Believing Buddhists	18,910,000
Shintoists	19,390,000
Believing Shintoists	710,000
Temples with priests	72,128
Temples without priests	37,417

It is especially remarkable that of the adherents of Shinto, which is the State religion, so few are Shintoists by conviction and in fact (that is "believing"), but it is declared to be true, because every official, officer, and teacher, must be a nominal Shintoist, tho he may be a Buddhist in reality. Of the temples without priests, large numbers are closed, and many others abandoned as speedily as possible.

The number of Christians reported is supposed to include Roman and Greek Catholics, but the enumeration is incomplete. Baptized Protestants alone number over 80,000, and with adherents must reach about 120,000. Roman Catholics report 65,000 (including children), and Greek Catholics claim 30,000. This would make a total nominal Christian population in Japan of over 200,000 men, women and children.

—Christian Intelligencer: "The Society for the Propaganda of the Faith, the one great Roman Catholic foreign mission agency of the world, reports receipts for 1912 of $1,610,000, a sum larger by $155,400 than in 1911, and the largest in the history of the society. Of this, $85,200 increase was sent by Catholics of the United States, or more than half. American Catholics contribute a far larger sum than any other, France alone excepted."

—Baptist Advance, Arkansas: "The believer has now everlasting life; and he shall not come into condemnation; for he is passed out of death to which he was in bondage into the freedom and blessings of life. Something worth more than gaining the whole world has happened to him."

POPULAR TALKS ON LAW.

FULFILLING THE CONTRACT.

By W. K. Towers, A. B., J. D., of Mich.

Not infrequently, in his anxiety to close a bargain, one will agree to furnish an article or perform services to the satisfaction of the other party. Your watch is out of order; you take it to a watch maker, yet hesitate about leaving it for him to repair. He agrees to fix it to your satisfaction. You wish to purchase a silver dish of a jeweler, but you desire a monogram placed upon it, and you doubt that he possesses the artistic ability and good taste to do the work so that it will please you. He assures you that he can and will please you. and that if he does not perform the task to your satisfaction you need not take the dish. You give him an order under these conditions.

You wish to have your roof fixed and driving a close bargain, insist that the carpenterr agree that he will perforrm the task to your satisfaction, else he need not be paid. You go to your tailor to place an order for a suit. In his anxiety to secure the order, which you seem somewhat loathe to give, he assures you that he will make you a suit that will satisfy you and that if he does not, you need not take it.

In each of these cases you have entered into a contract with the tradesman or workman, calling for the performance of certain labor and the furnishing of materials or the sale of an article. Now, suppose that in each of these cases the work specified is performed in a fair and workmanlike manner, with reasonable skill. Yet, suppose you have changed your mind in every case and no longer desire the article or the work that was done, or you feel that the work does not quite please you. Therefore, you insist that as the others took the risk of pleasing you, you are entitled to insist that they do it and if they do not you may refuse to accept the work which they have performed for you. They insist that the work is well done and that you ought to be satisfied. Your contention is that no one but yourself can say whether you are satisfied or not and that if you say you are not that settles it.

Suppose that the watch maker, the jeweler, the carpenter and the tailor all sue you, insisting that they have performed their portion of the contract and that you must make the payment agreed. Are you entitled to insist upon the letter of the contract and enforce your own word as to whether you are satisfied or not, regardless of whether a reasonable man would say that you ought to be satisfied? The answer is that in some cases you can and in some cases you cannot.

The watchmaker and the carpenter could force you to accept their work and make the agreed payment; the jeweler and the tailor would probably be forced to accept your decision that you were not satisfied, and make such other disposition as they could of the dish engraved with your monogram and the suit cut to your measure, without receiving any pay whatever from you. The distinction which the law draws between these cases is the distinction between work requiring a mechanical execution and a mechanical excellence and work designed to fit varying personal taste, as work of an artistic nature. If a brick foundation is to be built for your new shed, and is to be completed to your satisfaction, and it is completed in a substantial and workmanlike manner, and a jury of ordinary men decide that a reasonable man would be satisfied, then the law will insist that you ought to be satisfied whether you say that you are or not. So it is, also, with the repairing of the watch and the repairing of the roof. These are mechanical acts, and if the jury finds the work well and properly done, and believes in view of all the circumstances that a reasonable person would be satisfied, you will be compelled to accept the work, despite the fact that the agreement required that it should be done to your personal satisfaction. But a suit of clothes and a monogram upon a silver dish are matters involving personal taste rather than mechanical excellence. If these articles do not conform to your personal tastes you do not want them, and no one can decide that you ought to want them, for it is proverbial that there is no accounting for tastes.

It is a general rule that a contract must be performed literally. Neither party can claim to have performed the contract unlti he has done just exactly what the contract requires in all of its terms. The work or material to be furnished, or the money to be paid, must be supplied in the exact quantity and quality at the place and time specified.

Yet this rule, like all others, has exceptions, one of which we have noticed above. In certain classes of cases the law is inclined to allow substantial compliance with the terms of a contract as amounting to performance. When a matter involving many details is generally completed as specified, yet fails in details of minor importance, the law regards this as substantial performance and requires that the other party fulfill his part, though an allowance is made to cover the items in which the work was not as specified. Thus, if a house is being built for you under contract, and is completed in accordance with the contract in all the larger details, but varies in a few lesser places, you cannot refuse altogether to accept the house, in case he sues you on the contract, but an allowance will be made amply sufficient to cover the cost of making the defective parts conform to the specifications.

What is known as impossibility of performance is stated as one of the legal excuses for failure to perform a contract. This is very likely to confuse the average person, as most of the things which we would view as "impossibilities" are not such "impossibilities" as will, in law, excuse the failure to fulfill a contract. The impossibility which will put an end to a contract must be of a sort that the parties can be deemed to have contemplated as an adequate excuse, should it chance to occur. Hardship or unforeseen difficulty, no matter how severe, will not excuse failure to perform according to the terms of the agreement. If a man agrees to paint your house in two days, it is no excuse that he finds it impossible to finish the house in two days, no matter how hard he works. Neither is it an excuse that his materials are stolen or destroyed and so he cannot proceed. Nor is it an excuse that his workmen strike, unless this is provided against in the contract. But if the house should be burned, that would amount to a destruction of the subject matter of the contract, which is such an impossibility as will furnish legal excuse for failure to perform.

If one contracts to furnish his own personal services (not to do something that anyone may do) and dies, or is seriously injured or falls ill, no damages for failure to perform his contract may be recovered against his estate, or against him, since this is such an impossibility as furnishes legal excuse.

When one has completed his side of the contract, and not until then, may he bring legal action to force the other party to do his part. An exception to this is where the other party has definitely broken the contract in advance by word or action, as by a definite statement that he did not intend to fulfill the contract. A person who has contracted to deliver goods must have the goods specified at the time and place required. Then if the other party refuses to accept them a breach has occurred which gives to him a legal right of action. If the agreement is to sell for cash he need only tender delivery, and if the other party has not the cash to fulfill his part of the agreement there has been a breach of the contract.

MIZPAH.

The U. F. W. Society and other friends of Mizpah church have recently made up and given to the children's home $10.00, which they hope will be of great help to them.

Rev. W. F. Ashburn filled his regular appointment at Mizpah Sunday morning. He preached an interesting and helpful sermon to a large congregation.

PILOT CHURCH, SURRY CT.

I am a little girl eight years old and I love to go to Sunday school. I have not missed a single Sunday since it began. My papa is our superintendent. My sister is my teacher. Brother A. L. Hunter is our pastor and we all like him very much and hope he will come back another year.

SILER CITY.

We were glad to have Rev. Robt. Troxler with us on 2d Sunday night. He supplied for our pastor, Rev. J. H. Bowman, who has been unwell for a week. Hope he will soon be well again.

Fourth quarterly conference will be held with the church at this place Saturday before the 4th Sunday in this month at 10:30 A. M.

I am sending a clipping from our local paper, The Grit, about our church here:

"The M. P. church building will be dedicated the fourth Sunday, and the dedicatory sermon will be preached by Rev. R. M. Andrews, of Greensboro. All the former pastors are expected. The church was built about seven years ago and now that it is free of debt it is to be dedicated. Four weeks ago the building was freshly painted, and early in the spring it was equipped with modern seats and the walls handsomely frescoed. The building is this week being wired for electric lights."

BURLINGTON.

The attendance at our Sunday school last Sunday was 179, and the offering amounted to $4.81.

The Sunday school decided to set apart the fourth Sunday in this month as Home Department and Cradle Roll Day. A committee was appointed to prepare a program for the occasion. All members of the home department and cradle roll will be especially invited, and will form a class and be taught by our pastor. We expect to have a large attendance on that day.

Mr. and Mrs. P. E. Moran were received into the church by letter last Sunday morning.

Messrs. G. L. Lambert and T. Paul Davis, students of the University of N. C., spent Saturday and Sunday here with the latter's parents, Rev. and Mrs. T. E. Davis. Mr. Davis, who was formerly the Burlington reporter to the Herald, reports that he is getting along splendidly in the University.

The church and parsonage were recently photographed by an expert photographer, and we hope to be able to have a picture of both published in the Herald in the near future, provided the editor desires to publish them.

Our .fourth quarterly conference will probably be held on the first Tuesday night of November. C. B. W., Reporter.

SANDY RIDGE, OAK RIDGE CT.

Our special meeting embraced the first Sunday in Sept. It continued until second Sunday night. We had a grand and glorious meeting. Bro. Braswell came on Saturday, preached three sermons on Sunday to the delight and edification of a large congregation. Owing to the busy season with farmers the meeting was held at three and seven-thirty P. M. through the week. Congregation small at day service, good at night. It is useless to tell you that Bro. Braswell knows how to use the gospel lash. Yes, he just took off our old coats and he thrashed Sandy Ridge good, just exactly what we had been needing for quite a while from the fact that we became careless and unconcerned in regard to our duty to the church and to God. The brother had enough fire to lay on the lash sufficiently to wake us up. He did not only wake up the church but succeeded in waking up about twenty-five of those that were out on the cold mountain of sin. It is to be regretted that only seven out of that number gave their names for membership. But some of them were members before. It seems to me the proper thing for a person to do after conversion is to take the vows of the church. Then put forth a strong effort to live up to the vows. Bro. Braswell's preaching was very plain and to the point and had the desired effect. It was enjoyed and was highly complimented by all that heard him. Come again, Bro. Braswell. I forgot to say that Bro. Lowdermilk made up a purse of $25; while his throat trouble prevented his talking very much, yet he was not idle, but was busy in doing this act of kindness to help his brother who was laboring so earnestly and faithfully for the salvation of those who are dying for want of the bread of life. It seems to me that D. A. can talk more religin than any man I was ever in company with. It is a benediction to be with him. We had the satisfaction of having Bro. Rufus Pegg with us a few days during the meeting. Thanks to Bro. Pegg for his earnest prayers and help.

Our third quarterly conference met with the Kernersville church on Saturday before the fourth Sunday in Sept. A short but a splendid sermon by the President, Rev. C. A. Cecil, at 11 o'clock. Dinner. Conference at 1:30, President in the chair. Bro. Cecil asked a number of questions that were real interesting as well as instructive. We had to expose our ignorarnce of the Discipline, but learned some very important facts. A very interesting and harmonious session. Bro. Bob Durigon, delegate elect to Annual Conference, Prof. M. H. Holt alternate. Sunday school not attended as well as it was two months ago, but doing fairly well. Had a good prayer-meeting last Sunday night. J. H. Gordon.

WOODLAND AVE. M. P. CHURCH, WINSTON.

Our Sunday school is doing splendid work. Last Sunday we had 80 present; 21 new scholars. Mr. H. B. Martin's class of boys started a Red and Blue Contest two weeks ago with 7 members. Today the Reds had 16 and the Blues 14 members.

Our S. S. attendance is good, but the teachers are scarce. We have five classes, only four teachers. If we had a Baraca teacher I'm sure the class would take more interest.

Sunday we elected officers. W. A. Speer was elected superintendent, H. B. Martin, assistant; G. F. Snyder, Sec. and Treas.; Mrs. H. B. Martin, organist; Misses Hattie Jordan and Irene Speer, assistants. Misses Kathleen Sink and Zonie Gentle were elected to bring flowers to the church, then carry them to the sick. Messrs. Aquilla Crissman, Lewis Gentle and John Henesdale were elected ushers.

Mrs. Gentle one of our members, has almost recovered from fever. Mrs. Jordan is slowly improving.

Rev. S. M. Needham preaches every 1st and 3rd Sunday. Rev. S. W. Taylor delivered a splendid illustrated lecture for us the 4th Sunday.

Our congregations for the night services are not as large as we would like to have them. We certainly hated to see our pastor move to the country. We feel that if we could have our services every Sunday like our pastor started the first of the year that our church would grow. There certainly is work in East Winston; a church built in July has over 100 members. If we had the M. P.'s to work with us like their denomination is helping them we could grow. We certainly appreciate the service some of their members gave us. Reporter.

UNION GROVE, ORANGE CT.

We have not been heard from recently, but we are not dead.

Our church building has recently had a nice coat of paint inside and out, which is a great improvement to its appearance. We have a nice pulpit and the L. A. S. have purchased two chairs for the pulpit. We hope to continue the work until it is neatly fixed up.

Our special meeting began the 3rd Sabbath in Sept. Rev. J. D. Williams came on Monday and preached three excellent sermons for us. We are always glad to have him come home, and so sorry he had to leave so soon, but glad to learn Mrs. Williams is improving and trust she will soon be restored to good health.

Our beloved pastor, Rev. R. C. Stubbins, continued the services until Thursday. We had a good meeting and three joined the church. Mr. Wain, Miss Lonie Garrett, and Miss Lola Lloyd. We are glad to welcome these young people to our church.

We have a very interesting S. S.: had a good Children's Day service the 5th Sabbath in July.

We were glad to have Mr. Hersey Cates, Baptist, with us yesterday; he is a good S. S. worker.

Sept. 24, Mrs. Bessie Kirkland and Mr. Thomas Pearson were married by Mr. J. M. Lloyd, J. P. We hope they will continue to come to Sunday school.

Prof. T. O. Pender was with us the last day of our meeting, and every one enjoyed his singing so much. We hope the United Brethren and our church will both get busy trying to save souls, and stop trying to unite, for I believe all we need to make us succeed as a church is regenerated members of the church. Is uniting with any other church going to bring us that? We trust it will soon be settled.

With best wishes to the Herald and its readers,

EDEN, HALIFAX CT.

Last Sunday Rev. J. E. Pritchard preached a delightful sermon. Communion service was observed after preaching. We used for the first time our new communion set. The fourth quarterly conference will convene at Bethesda church Sat. before the fourth Sun. in Oct. I believe they have decided to have an all-day affair, dinner on the grounds. Hope all the official members will be present.

There is only one more preaching Sun. at our church before Conference. We will have to wake up and get busy to have things ready.

A singing school has been organized at the McDaniel school house with Mr. A. L. F. Dosier as teacher. Our enrollment is right large and the pupils seem to be getting along finely.

We were glad to have so many of the Eden folks with us at our Sunday school at the McDaniel school house first Sunday afternoon; hope they will come again.

We were glad to see the preacher's wife out Sunday, as she has been gone some time for her health. We hope they will send our same pastor back, as we all are carried away with him and his little wife.

Irene Hawkins.

FRIENDSHIP, HAW RIVER CT.

Our Sunday school is progressing nicely. Attendance last Sunday, 55.

We are now making preparations for our Children's Day. We expect to have it next Sunday, beginning at 10:30 o'clock. Bro. McCulloch will be with us and preach a missionary sermon. We hope to have a large congregation. Every one is invited to come.

Bro. Ashburn has preached us some good sermons this year. We are sorry he cannot be with us next Sunday also.

To Whom It May Concern.

As we failed to get our rally day programs in time to have our rally day exercises the first Sunday in October, we are making arrangements to have it the fourth Sunday in October. We are trying to secure the help of good speakers to follow the rally day exercises. We hope to spend the day profitably for the betterment of our S. S. work. We will further announce in next week's Herald, the names of speakers, if secured, and full program.

CID, UWHARRIE CT.

The special meeting closed at Jerusalem Wednesday night. They had a good meeting from start to finish. There were 10 converts and several accessions to the church, with more to follow, so I learn. The church was greatly revived. Bro. Matthews from Denton was Bro. Trogdon's pulpit help and did some excellent preaching. But the Sunday morning sermon by Bro. Trogdon was one of the deep ones and I believe was seed sown on good ground. It seems as if the churches almost everywhere are in such a lukewarm condition that it is so difficult to get the members of the church to step out and help save the lost: what is the matter?

Credit to whom credit is due: we have a few excellent workers on this circuit. Why not many more take up the cross?

As the Conference year is drawing to a close we are sorry. But we hope to be made glad by the return of our pastor to this work again, as we feel it will be a great loss to the work if he leaves us. But we must all have good faith with our work.

Mr. Atlas Ridge from Canaan assisted in the Jerusalem meeting. He is a good worker. Bro. Trogdon had a bad spell with his side Saturday, the 11th inst., and we were all sadly disappointed by his not being able to be at Cid that day. But I'll trust in a Higher Power to restore his health to us again and to his dear family who need his help. But while he was so sick he thought of his little flock at Cid who would look for his appearing, and he got Bro. Ridge to come and fill his place. We all had an enjoyable time and one heart was made to rejoice aloud and praise God, for it was good to be there.

I am always glad to read the reports from all the churches, but home churches come first. I bid every one God speed.

Mrs. N. W. Lanier.

HOPE, SILER CITY CT.

Last Sunday dawned beautiful and clear and it being our preaching time a large crowd assembled at this church for worship. We were disappointed in not seeing Bro. Bowman, as he was unable to be present. However there was a treat in store for us as he had made arrangements with Rev. J. F. McCulloch of Greensboro (editor of the Methodist Protestant Herald) to fill his appointment, and to say his sermon was thoroughly enjoyed but feebly expresses it. Although we regretted very much the illness of Bro. Bowman, yet we were pleased to have Bro. McCulloch with us, as it was his first trip among us.

We were also glad to have Bro. John Tally of Bonsal with us.

Our Conference year is nearing a close, and I am glad to report that we are coming up nicely with our claims. General interests are paid in full and pastor's salary is very near paid up. We have also insured our church this year and hope to make some improvement on it in the near future.

Success to the Herald and its readers.

HAWKINS CHAPEL, LITTLETON CT.

Our pastor was with us the 2d Sun. in Sept. and delivered a good sermon. The Lord's supper was administered. A good many partook. Our pastor was with us again to-day and preached another of his good sermons to a large congregation. All listen very attentively to the good messages brought. As the Conference year draws to a close we feel that we want our faithful pastor to come back. We have learned to love him. We have one appointment before Conference.

Mr. Billie Hawkins had his leg broken by the falling of his horse; he is getting along very well.

The farmers' union gave a nice dinner at Hawkins Chapel school house the 2d of Oct. that was enjoyed by a large crowd of people. They had two speakers, Mr. Green and Dr. Templeton. The speaking was good. Vannah Shearin, Reporter.

Woody.

On September 13, 1913, the death angel visited the home of Rufus Woody and called to its eternal home the spirit of the dear wife and mother, Mary Ellen Woody (more commonly known as Marie). She had been critically ill for nearly eight weeks, suffering untold misery, yet she bore it with meekness. She was as a rose bud plucked before it reached full bloom, her age being 26 years, 8 months, and 10 days.

She was converted at an early age and joined the M. P. Church at Concord of which she remained a faithful member until death, always attending when health would permit.

She was the oldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Thompson of near Saxapahaw.

On March 31, 1907, she was joined in holy wedlock to Rufus Woody. To this union were born four children, three infants which had just preceded her to the glory world and a little boy who survives.

She leaves to mourn her loss a husband, a baby boy, 18 months old, a father and mother, one brother, seven sisters and a host of relatives and friends.

Her pastor, Rev. G. W. Holmes, conducted the funeral at Concord M. P. church on Sept. 18, and her body was laid to rest in the cemetery at that place amid a sorrowing host of relatives and friends. It would have touched the hardest heart it seems to have heard her darling baby crying, "Mama, Mama, poor Mama's gone." Our hearts go up for the precious little one who will never know the sweetness of a mother's love. Doubtless he will be well cared for, but there is nothing except the love of God which exceeds a mother's love for a child. May the Lord so direct his steps that he may some day join that dear mother, little brother and sisters who now wait for him in glory. She cannot come to us, but it is comforting to know that we can go to her.

Her character was one of gentleness and kindness. Now she has gone and darkness has settled down upon the home. The light of her presence has drifted away, and there is left the feeling of desolation, relieved only by her beautiful life and the hope of meeting her again in the glory world. God's voice echoes through this cloud of darkness and whispers, "My will is best."

Whereas our Heavenly Father in His wise providence has seen best to remove from our midst our beloved sister,

Resolved, 1. That in her death the church has lost a loyal member, the Sunday school a constant attendant, the husband a devoted companion, the son a loving mother, and the community a kind and noble woman.

Resolved, 2. That in the death of our sister, we bow in humble submission to Him who is too wise to err, and too good to be unkind, for we feel that our loss is her eternal gain.

Resolved, 3. That while we drop a tear of affection over her grave and weep with those that weep, we rejoice with them in the many high and noble actions of her womanly life.

Resolved, 4. That we tender the husband and relatives in this sore bereavement our warm and loving sympathy and point them to the tender mercies of her Lord and Savior who doeth all things best.

"Dear sister, thou hast left us,
And thy loss we greatly feel;
But the God who hath bereft us,
He can all our sorrows heal."

Resolved, 5. That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the church Herald for publication; also a copy furnished the bereaved family.

FOR THE CHILDREN'S HOME.

Since my last report I have received the following donations:

M. P. Church Union Bridge, Md., $5; Granville Ct., N. C., $75 to furnish one room; Fallston Ct., $10; Rev. C. L. Whitaker, $7.50; Ada M. Beck, Nunda, N. Y., $5; G. B. Harris, Henderson, N. C., $25; Grace M. P. Church, La Grange, N. C., $6.10; Mt Hermon Church, $7.81; Friendship S. S., $1.59; M. P. There are yet six rooms in the Home that have not been taken to be furnished. Each can be furnished at a cost of $75. I hope that the good people throughout the denomination will be interested enough in this work for at least six individuals or churches to furnish these six rooms.

We now have 22 children in the Home with plenty more applicants wishing to be admitted and if we expect to care for these orphan children we must continue to rally to the cause, furnish the Home and support the children.

All contributions for furnishing the home should be sent to me, and all contributions for support of the children should be sent to the Supt., H. A. Garrett.

Many wonder why I do not write more about the Home. None but those who saw the condition of the grounds when the Home was opened can imagine what was to do. All the remnants of the building material, weeds, briars, bushes and all the dirt taken out when the basement was dug must be removed. We have hired nothing except some grading which the boys and I couldn't do as we needed horses to pull the scrapes.

We had to move the barn farther away from the house and now we have a very good little barn but not much in it to feed.

We hope to have it full of feed next year to feed our cows and horses provided the good people will help Sister Dixon buy the pair of horses she is wanting you to take stock in. I trust you will respond to her call, because we need a good pair of horses for our work. The horse we have is too old to do farm work unless it is light.

Many of our readers don't know that the following have furnished or are furnishing rooms: High Point, Mr. W. J. Armfield, one room, $100; Mrs. J. J. Welch, one room, $75; Mr. Geo. Penny, one room, more than $100. Henderson church, one room, $75. Julian, Philathea and Baraca classes, one room, $50. Shiloh church, one room, $50. Granville Ct., one room, $75. Mr. Leonard of Lexington gave $100 for one room.

Let others do the same generous act.

Mr. E. W. Freeze, Secy. and Treas. of Cannon Fetzer Co., High Point, is clothing two of our boys complete the year round and gives us special prices on all goods bought from his store. Can't some one else do as well as Mr. Freeze?

CLIPPING FEATHERS FROM THE LIVE OSTRICH.

The clipping season on an ostrich farm is a period of unusual interest. The gorgeous white plumes, which so regularly appear upon the wings of the male ostrich, are always cut—not pulled out, as many people suppose—just before the feathers are ready to be shed in the natural molt. Plucking or pulling out the quills is never practiced upon the tame birds, for that method would so damage the great sockets in which they grow that very likely no more such feathers would be forthcoming.

On clipping day all the full-fledged fowls are driven into a triangular inclosure. The ostrich to be plucked is led into a sort of cratelike coop, where a cloth hood is slipped over his head. The big bird instantly appears to grow quite docile; for when he is blindfolded and cannot see he seems to imagine himself to be perfectly safe. With a helper holding the full-feathered fowl to keep him quiet, a man with a sharp pair of shears proceeds to clip, one by one, the handsome plumes, cutting each one off close to the flesh. When all the ivory white wing and tail plumes have been thus taken, the shorter black and drab feathers of the body are carefully pulled out. The hood is then removed, and the big bird passes out free into an adjoining paddock. So quickly has the operation been performed and so absolutely painless the process, that the shorn bird does not appear to realize that he has, within those few minutes, been deprived of his main point of beauty.

These proceedings are continued until all the birds have been stripped of their surplus plumage. The stumps of the clipped quills are allowed to remain in until they drop out of their own accord. As soon as the inside pulp has dried up, the stubs may be easily removed, although they are more generally permitted to shed naturally, which procedure will take place within the space of a few weeks, when new feathers begin to take their place.

The plucked feathers are immediately taken to the factory, where they undergo the various processes of sorting, washing, curling, dyeing, and finishing. In the final preparation for the market the ends of other quills are added to the stubs of the plumes in such a clever manner that the substitution is scarcely discernible.

Until a few years ago all ostrich plumes were supplied by feather hunters from the wild birds on the sandy plains of South Africa. Recently, however, ostrich farms have been established in some of our own States, and these domestic birds now furnish most of the fancy feathers of commerce. It is claimed that one bird ranch in Southern California contains over a thousand domesticated ostriches, which are given special care for the commercial value of their feathers.

At the nesting season a pair of these domestic birds three years of age are placed in a separate corral. During the six weeks of the incubation period the male sits on the eggs at night, the hen relieving him during most of the hours of the day. When the dozen or more striped chicks are hatched, they stand about twelve inches in height, are strong and full-fledged, and are each the size of a full-grown barnyard hen. This is not strange when we remember that an average ostrich egg weighs more than three pounds. For the first two or three days, bits of shells and tiny stones form the main diet of the newly hatched ostrich chicks, but before the ten days have gone by the greedy birdlings commence to grow fat from swallowing the same variety of food at that upon which their parents thrive—tender shoots of green alfalfa, chopped beets and cabbage, and all sorts of fruit and grain.

For the first half year the young ostrich is supposed to increase in height at the rate of one foot a month; at the end of six months the youngster will often weigh nearly as much as either of the parent birds, but it is not until the third year that the plumage reaches its prime. Afterwards the plumes may be regularly removed every eight or nine months.

The most valuable ostrich feathers are the twenty white plumes that grow upon each wing of the male birds and the few plumy tail quills, the short black plumage of the body being of small value. The plumes from a flock are generally disposed of to wholesale dealers by weight, and usually each male bird will yield an annual crop of feathers to the value of fifty dollars or more.

One of these huge ground birds is quite strong enough to bear a man's weight upon its back; and while unable to fly, it is capable of running at the rate of an average express train, and when in full swing can cover a distance of twenty-two feet at every stride. The average height of a full-grown ostrich is over seven feet; its weight is two hundred and fifty pounds, and, barring accidents, it may live to the ripe age of seventy years.

It is said that a pair of these big birds, when once mated, remain zealously devoted to each other through life, and that should one bird happen to die the other will revere the memory of its lost consort by ever refusing to choose a second mate. —AUGUSTUS W. DOUGHERTY, in Nashville Christian Advocate.

DENTISTS IN PREHISTORIC TIMES

Prof. M. H. Saville of Columbia University has just returned from an exploring expedition to Ecuador. Although he went unaccompanied and his expedition led him only a short journey south of Panama, he made discoveries that surpass any previously made in that region. He spent most of the two months he allowed himself digging into mounds in the province of Esmeraldas, in northwest Ecuador, in search of pre-Incas relics. The results of his discoveries indicate a surprisingly high order of civilization among the brown peoples of that part of South America.

He brought back with him some skulls that showed their owners to have been men superior to the Aztecs—even equal to the Egyptians in some respects. Some teeth in these skulls were filled with gold and cement, indicating that the art of dentistry had reached a high degree of perfection in Ecuador, perhaps more than a thousand years ago and certainly before the time of Columbus. These gold-filled teeth are the most valuable feature of the finds, in Prof. Saville's estimation.

In his explorations in Mexico he has found teeth filled with cement and stone for ornamental effect, but never before has he seen prehistoric teeth filled with gold. The gold in these teeth appears to have been used less for ornament than for preserving them, because it has been applied from the inside so as to show but little from the outside. He found a few fillings of cement. Whether filled with cement or gold, the borings indicated that an instrument had been used that did the work as well as those of the modern dentist. Other teeth were found which after coming loose in their sockets had been fastened to their stable neighbors by means of gold bands, much as is done in modern dentistry.

The people found living in those parts were unable to give any information in regard to the fillings. Prof. Saville infers that the owners of the teeth must have been persons of the highest class, and that they were possessed of a remarkable degree of courage to undergo the process of drilling and nerve killing without the use of cocaine or other anesthetics. Gold in that country was comparatively plentiful, but the fact that some of the people had their teeth filled with gold and others had theirs filled with cement indicates that only the aristocrats used gold for that purpose.

In addition to the skulls containing the filled teeth, Prof. Saville brought back two beautiful clay-modeled heads, about the size of an ordinary orange.

These were colored a light hue, and it is thought they may have been made so in imitation of the complexion of the Ecuadoreans of the period of the artist. The features of the faces are delicately molded and show much expression. The professor says he has never seen more skillful work of the sort anywhere. The customs inspectors, after examining the specimens when he landed, pronounced them objects of antique art, and as such they were allowed to enter duty free.

Prof. Saville says the province of Esmaraldas from which he brought these relics is a territory practically unknown to the scientist. He believes there are many marvelous treasures buried there which would greatly enrich American museums. In one instance he saw a wooden chest containing valuable gold ornaments of great beauty dug out of a mound and he has little doubt there are other mounds in the territory from which like treasures may be obtained.—The Pathfinder.

THE CHILDREN OF CHINA.

By Mrs. M. W. Hemingway.

(By One Who Was a Child in China.)

The Chinese are very fond of children. So, although most people in that crowded population are poor, with a poverty of which we have no conception, still parents do a great deal for their children, and the children of China usually manage to get their birthright—a happy childhood.

Take a look at the Japanese dolls sold at stores and you get a good idea of how cunning Chinese children are, with their round, brown faces, large dark eyes and little shaven heads, which sometimes have a ring of hair left and sometimes four or five tiny braided tails sticking out in all directions. Rich children are gorgeous in silk, satin, and velvet, with wonderfully embroidered caps. The babies of the poor are dressed in plain, blue cloth, but the mothers always manage to find scraps of bright-colored cloth to make a gay cap for their little ones. The most curious are those suits made to imitate animals. A tiger suit is made of yellow cloth striped in black and has a tiger cap to match, with glaring eyes and flapping ears. Even the tail is not forgotten, nor the backbone, with vertebrae made of cloth stuffed with cotton. The first sight of a child dressed in a new tiger suit, tail and all, was too much for the gravity of some American visitors, even though it was in church time. There is a great difference in the appearance of a child at different seasons of the year. In winter Golden Peach or First Joy is dressed in cloth thickly wadded with cotton, just like a bed comfort. A child who is well off will wear several wadded suits, one over the other, till he looks too wide to waddle and only meant to roll. By summer the plump child shrinks with his clothes, and in very hot weather you find most Chinese tots in regular summer costume of a bib apron and a pair of cloth shoes. The bib is tied round the waist and contains a pocket for peanuts and toasted melon seeds.

Two books, the "Chines Mother Goose" and "Chinese Boy and Girl, written by Dr. Isaac T. Headland, give many examples of Chinese Mother Goose rhymes. Finger and toe rhymes are common in Chinese, as well as in English, though the Chinese usually call the little pig who went to market a duck, and refer to the baby's feet as ducklings. Perhaps the commonest rhyme to be said for little feet is that of the cows:

"This little cow eats grass,
This little cow eats hay,
This lititle cow drinks water,
This little cow runs away,
This little cow does nothing,
Except lie down each day—
We'll whip her."

Another very much like our "East or West, home is best," is this:

"Gold corner,
Silver corner,
None to compare with one's own poor corner."

The Chinese have a wealth of such nursery rhymes which Dr. Headland's book does not pretend to exhaust. Any resident of China for a length of time knows many more to add to the collection. This nursery lore can be utilized and is being adapted for the use of the kindergartens begun in several of the missions in China. Kindergartens in China will find a rich store of material ready for their hands. There are songs about sawing wood, drawing water, keeping store, and all the various occupations which children try to imitate. Each mission kindergarten has its training school, and the bright, capable young Chinese girls who take the course will be able out of the store of their own childish recollections to bring out much that will be interesting and valuable in the development of kindergarten work in China.

Child nature is so much alike in all lands that we are not surprised to find Chinese children masters in the art of making mud pies. With very elaborate little clay molds, costing about one tenth of a cent a piece, they make their little men, animals and cash with holes in the middle. Games of Blindman's Buff, Fox and Geese and Peas Porridge Hot, are played under slightly different names. Top spinning and jackstones are favorite amusements. The Chinese child loves his pet kittens, doge or goldfish. If he cannot feed a lark or a canary he will keep a green cicada in a cage which he himself weaves of grass, so as to enjoy the shrill chirping of his pet in the cool of the day. Every little Chinese girl hopes to own silkworms. She feeds them mulberry leaves and keeps them spinning raw silk handkerchiefs and mats for her.

As for the toys which amuse Chinese babies, many can be bought from the traveling salesman, whose rolling drum calls together all the children of the village to inspect his wares. There are tin rattles, wooden rattles and tiny drums, the exact copy of the salesman's larger one; there are glass rings of every color and size to attract the little girls, and there are tiny insects and animals modeled beautifully in clay, and there are larger animals stuffed with buckwheat chaff, elephants, dogs, camels and toy mules drawing miniature Peking carts. But the best toys are made at home by the children's own mothers, with scraps of cloth and silk and a great expenditure of paste, thread and time. The cloth dolls made for Golden Peach wear just the same kind of clothes as Peach herself wears, with real black hair fastened on in entrancing knots and loops, and she has a countenance of India ink. Any little American girl would like Peach's doll. It is in kite season that Chinese boys are perfectly happy. On a spring day one can see the sky all alive with kites of wonderful shapes,—here a dragon, there an owl, here a snake and there a butterfly, and at the end of the string a radiant little Chinese boy.

Besides the toy-seller there are others for whose street cry the Chinese child learns to listen. There is a glass blower who blows little glass bottles while you wait, and the candy blower who blows molasses paste into forms of men, tigers and chickens, and puts the complete product on to a straw handle. A candy man costs three cash (one twentieth of a cent) and the animals cost two cash, so it doesn't matter that they are all very fragile. When one tiger breaks the child eats the fragments and buys another.

There are the dog and the monkey shows, or the sheep and trick bear, and other traveling jugglers who earn a few cents for each performance. The fact that such a large number of these shows can make a living speaks for the liberality of the Chinese parents toward the children. It is said that in no other country is there so large an army of those who earn a living by amusing children.—Mission Studies.

PUNAN NEST GATHERERS.

The wild jungles of Borneo are marvelously beautiful, filled as they are with majestic trees from whose mighty limbs fall veils of waving vines, while rare orchids of every known color bloom among ferns whose fronds are truly gigantic.

These tropical forests are singularly quiet, their silence being broken only by the musical dripping of water, the hoarse, croaking cry of the hornbill, and the low, birdlike note of the wawa monkey.

The jungles of Borneo are quite as interesting as they are beautiful, too, for they are inhabited by some of the queerest people to be found anywhere around and about. For it is deep in their darkest parts that the Punans dwell, that strange race of men and women who are first cousins to the terrible head hunters, but who have none of the wildness and fierceness of the other tribe, being as gentle and harmless as children, while their simple lives are lived right out in the open, with no bed save the grass and no roof save the leaves and the sky.

The Punans sometimes build fragile little huts of tree boughs, interlaced with broad palm leaves laid upon the top for a roof. As a writer who has lived among them says: "They have never a thought of the morrow, no cares, no responsibilities, no possessions, no enemies; for they desire nothing that other people have, and have nothing that other people desire, not even clothes. Money is dross to them, and their home is where they hang up their blowpipes and parangs. Night cannot find them homeless, for home is wherever the setting sun finds them. If rain comes, a few poles and a few leaves make a shelter; if the night be clear a soft bed of leaves in a nook between the great flat roots of the tapang tree is luxury itself. And, finally, in the happy land of the Punans there is no dressing and undressing morning and evening."

The Punans are the people of Borneo who gather the strange birds' nests that the Chinese regard as such a delicacy. These swallows, or swifts, go to Borneo in the spring by the thousand, and from time immemorial they have built nests in the far-famed caves of Mount Subis, as the openings in he Niah hills close to the coast are called. Each year the Punans gather immense quantities of these nests, their method being so unique that it is well worth telling.

Mount Subis is about fifteen hundred feet high, and the entrances to the caves are far up the side, and can be reached only by expert climbers, as the way leads right along a path of slippery limestone, where even the surest-footed sometimes slips and receives a hard fall.

Close by the "Great Cave," where the swallows build, is a smaller cavity in the hillside known as the "Trader's Cave." This is where the Chinese traders who come up to bargain for the nests make their homes during the swallow season. The funny little houses are built inside the cavern, and have no roofs at all, for there is no rain in there, no moon, no sun, no anything but space, utter silence, and constant gloom.

The main cave is a weirdly beautiful place, the great varied roof rising fully six hundred feet. The floor dips abruptly from the entrance to a deep valley, and is covered fully three feet with a queer dry powder, not at all unlike tanbark, made entirely of the wings and dry skins of millions of beetles that the birds have discarded.

In the dark recesses of this mighty cavern the swifts, or swallows, build by the million each year; and when a stranger enters their gloomy nesting place and they come whirling out, the beat of their countless wings sounds like the rush of mighty waters. Just inside this cave are the funny little platform houses of the Punans. They have no roofs, and the walls are merely boughs carelessly woven together. They are built upon stilts, and are reached by means of the notched log generally used by the natives of Borneo.

The Punans gather the nests in a very ingenious fashion and one that makes a civilized man's hair stand on end when he has a chance to watch the performance. Long poles are securely lashed together with rattan, one after another, until they reach almost to the top of the cave. And right straight up these wobbling poles do the jungle men climb, going up with the agility of monkeys. Each climber carries with him a stout pole with a hoe and homemade candle at one end. The sputtering candle furnishes them with light enough to see where the nests are, and they scrape them off with the hoe, the men on the ground gathering them up as fast as they fall and putting them in rude baskets. The swallows will build three times, and the nests are taken only twice, the birds being left in possession of their last little homes.

Some of these swift nests are known as the "white nests" and others as the "black nests." The Mount Subis caves furnish the black kind only; but though these are not regarded as such a delicacy as the white nests, thousands of dollars are brought into Borneo each year as duty on these little swift homes. The Chinese traders pay the government a certain price each year for the privilege of securing all of the nests in a certain area, the space to be determined by the detaching poles. These poles are owned by the traders, who pay the Punans a paltry price to climb them, the amount being absurd when the danger is remembered, for a slip of the foot means certain death to the daring climber.—Young People

THE SAINT ANNE RELIC SWINDLE

During nine days in July there was on exhibition at the church of Saint Anne de Brighton Park in Chicago, a so-called relic of that alleged saint, who is declared by the priesthood to have been the grandmother of Jesus. It is claimed that on previous displays of this relic many miraculous cures were effected, and on the present occasion several thousands of "the faithful" journeyed to Chicago in the hope of being relieved of their ailments, being encouraged to visit the city by newspapers of that town which—as was stated by J. H. Davis in his recent contribution to the Menace—are "schrambling forward to kiss the pope's big toe." Those editors know as well as we do that this pretended relic is a fake, a fraud and a contemptible device of the priesthood to cheat the ignorant and superstitious victims of that church, and that the alleged miraculous cures are purely imaginary, like the relic itself. They also know that the priests themselves are fully aware of the dirty swindle in which they are engaged. This is proved by the fact they exhibit this alleged relic for only nine days in each year, whereas if they believed it to be genuine they would keep it constantly on view to relieve the sick and suffering every day in the year. We have further proof in the fact that when these same priests are afflicted by any disease it is not to the relic of Saint Anne that they apply for relief but to the nearest doctor of medicine; following in this respect the example of the pope himself,who during his recent sickness summoned several physicians, although the churches in Rome are rich in saints' shin-bones, holy coats and fragments of the true cross. These sacred relics are all right for the comon herd, but no one has ever known or ever will know of their being resorted to by the priests themselves.

The story manufactured by the priesthood to account for the origin of this relic is substantially as follows: After the death of Jesus his followers were so persecuted that they fled from Palestine. Fearing that their enemies might desecrate the graves of the dead they unearthed the body of Jesus' grandmother and took it with them—just how is not explained, but it was probably carried in a suit case. The fugitives subsequently tired of their burden, rid themselves thereof by depositing it in the vault of a church in southern France. There it remained until the time of King Charlemagne, about 700 years later, when somebody with a good memory suddenly recalled the aforesaid alleged circumstances. A delegation of ecclesiastics thereupon proceeded to the church and easily identified the bones, which were afterward conveyed to Rome. Although the actual name of the deceased was unknown, the priesthood surmounted this difficulty by giving her the name of Anne and also made her a saint.

About a dozen years ago a priest of the church of Saint Anne de Beaupre, situated near Quebec, visited Rome and while there he asked for a section of the skeleton and was given a piece of a wristbone. On his way home he left this relic on exhibition in the church of Saint Anne in the city of New York. There it remained for several weeks, being visited by many thousands and of course performing the usual miracles. A fee was also of course charged and a large sum of money rewarded the swindlers. Indeed, its success as a money-making scheme was so brilliant that after the relic was taken to Canada the New York priests applied to Rome for a duplicate thereof and are exhibiting it at intervals. It now appears that a Chicago church is engaged in the same confidence game, and if the skeleton holds out, every church in Christendom will be working the same racket.

It is not complimentary to our police officials that while they diligently hunt down the gold-brick, fake mining, green goods and other swindlers they calmly look on while the Roman Catholics are engaged in conducting schemes so nefarious that in comparison the highwayman is an honest, upright and desirable member of society.—The Menace.

DENTON HIGH SCHOOL

——OPENS SEPTEMBER 1, 1913——

DENTON is situated in the Piedmont hills of Davidson County twenty miles South from Thomasville on the Carolina and Yadkin River Rail Road. This Railroad connects us with the Southern at Thomasville and High Point on the north and with the Southbound at High Rock on the South. About 350 yards west from the depot on Salisbury Street, nestling among a beautiful grove of oaks, is the home of Denton High School.

OUR COURSE OF STUDY prepares for any College, also for our State University. We give each student personal atention and do everything necessary for their comfort and advancement. A thoroughly competent teacher has been employed for the Music Department, and those who take this course will receive special attention. A High School Business Course will be taught free of charge as to tuition. Special work in Pedagogy for those who intend to teach.

FREE TUITION to ministerial students and children of the ministers of the North Carolina Conference. Cost of all necessary expenses for a year ranges from $115 to $145. We board students in good private homes. Indigent young men can get rooms and board themselves at actual cost. If any one wishes to pay a part or even all expenses by work, write the Principal for particulars. The school uses water from deep drilled wells with pumps, which eliminates all danger from germs in the water. Pure air, pure water, plenty of work; if these do not give health to the student, he will never have it. Write the Principal at Denton, N. C., for any further information.

EVERY WOMAN: A PARABLE

Mrs. H. W. Hunter

Every Woman had passed a beautiful childhood. In a world poignantly sweet with beauty, but where there was still much suffering, it had been her privilege from earliest childhood to walk in "parched ways, and "blossomy ways," "acquaint with pain" and too "acquaint with rose and song."

As a little girl she had lived in a garden spot of the world and had played with Joy and Laughter and Beauty and many another pretty companion. But although Nature outdid herself in beautifying this garden spot, and although there were many gardeners to care for it, still when she was only a mite of a girl she was given a little corner for her very own and she was encouraged to give a little time each day to the care of it, so that she early had a share in the joy of work and sacrifice and could dance away the remaining hours with her pretty playmates in lightness of heart.

Now this gracious garden spot of the world had around it a very high wall with massive gates that shut in all the beauty and shut out whatever might be on the other side of the wall.

Every Woman could remember distinctly the day when, pausing breathless in her play, she had noticed that one of the great gates had swung open, and the light died out of her eyes at the sight of that world out there. Her playmates were strangely affected by it, too, for Laughter fled far away across the garden, Beauty hid herself near at hand behind a clump of lilacs, and Joy—well, Every Woman thought Joy had fled too.

Outside the wall a long and dusty road climbed a rugged hillside. And up the hill was marching an endless procession whose dull, dead tramping beat into the rhythm of a dirge. On under the pitiless sun they marched, and when Every Woman had recovered from the shock sufficiently to single out the hideous details a wild-eyed, raving mother was hurling her baby girl against the wall while a hideous gaunt creature held her by the arm, laughing hysterically the while she whispered in the poor mother's ear.

That, Every Woman afterward learned, was Despair, who was most often to be seen near the mothers of baby girls. Another poor creature, from whose eyes the light of reason had altogether faded, usually held Despair by the arm. Her name was Suicide.

On marched the procession. Poverty had at his heels a rabble clad in miserable rags like himself—a rabble that shuddered and groaned alternately when Famine and Disease and Over-population, dreadful creatures all three, overtook them in the procesion.

A band of red-robed little girls marched past her. Every Woman looked again. Yes, they were little girls, though they had the look of little old women in their faces. And then she noticed that underneath their red garments were heavy weights about their necks, dragging them down—the little child widows of the East.

Next came a great mob of men, women and little children who huried on their way as if driven along by some unseen, horrible force. They kept looking furtively behind them. Fear was stamped upon every face. In her excitement Every Woman stepped forward and caught one of them by the arm.

"What is the matter?" she cried.

"Oh, can't you see?" gasped the breathless wayfarer. "He's coming; he's right upon us!"

"Where? Who is it?" asked Every Woman.

"There! It is Superstition!" whispered the poor mortal, and he broke away and ran fearfully after his companions. Every Woman caught just a glimpse of the dreaded ghost, Superstition, as he went in speedy pursuit of his victims.

Her attention was caught next by a man in priestly garments, but with a face so disfigured by sin that she closed her eyes till he passed. Behind him came a group of pretty flower-bedecked dancers who bore a strange resemblance to their priestly leader. They tried to dance, but they could not. Underneath the set smiles on their faces was an expression of utter hopelessness. They stretched out their arms to Every Woman as they passed. She understood that the leader in the priest's garments was Immorality and that he had traveled from a country far across the seas.

Suddenly, like a green spot in a desert, came one unlike the rest. She held a sick baby in her arms; several children clung to her skirts; a crippled woman leaned upon her for support—and she smiled at Every Woman. There was an invitation in her smile. And Every Woman felt that she wanted to go; that she would gladly forsake her garden spot forever if only she might follow in her train. But the lovely stranger marched buoyantly on, and Every Woman could see (for she looked until she was out of sight) that she moved among that vast throng, helping the weak and fainting ones over rough places, carrying water to the thirsty ones, giving a smile here and an encouraging word there and always with crowds of little children around her. Every Woman noticed that whenever she appeared the dreadful creatures Poverty, Despair, Superstition and the rest fled far away and their victims suffered a glad relief.

As the last flutter of the stranger's garments disappeared over the hill, Every Woman turned and ran back through the garden, never stopping till she had found her mother. There kneeling at her knee, she sobbed out her story. And there she learned that it was not chance, for the time had come when the daughter must catch this vision of the world. The lovely stranger, her mother told her, was Service, and her smile was an invitation. Every Woman must choose between her garden spot and that great procesion without the wall.

She went out into the loveliest spot in all her garden and there she made her choice. And the next day found her outside the gate climbing the hill with the others. When she was ready to start Beauty still hid behind the lilac clump, Laughter was nowhere to be found, but Joy had a surprise for her, for she announced her intention of going too.

'That is just where I belong," she said, "out there with you and Service."

As Every Woman joined the procession, Service held out her hand and said, "I am glad you have come. I need you."

And right from her heart Every Woman answered, "And I need you."

The years passed by. Every Woman had much to learn, but Service was her constant companion and she taught her the secrets.

As soon as she could she had the high wall torn down. Then she transplanted trees, flowers and shrubs from her garden to the other side of the road, until finally the day came when the roads wound right through the midst of a garden. Through her ministrations the hill was made less rugged, "the mountains and hills were made low and the rough places plain." She made "streams break out in the desert and the desert rejoiced and blossomed as the rose."

The time pased very quickly, until one day she and Service stood with Hope and Faith and Love and some others and looked over the garden full of happy, busy people moving buoyantly among the garden plots. Joy moved among them, Beauty was there too, and even Laughter flitted here and there.

"And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes," murmured Every Woman, and her voice thrilled with happiness, "and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain. For the former things are passed away."

"Yes," answered Servise, "and it is you, Every Woman, who have done this glorious thing."—Mission Studies.

DIED.

Miss Mary Viola Lewis died Oct. 3rd, and was buried at Fair Grove M. P. Church on Saturday. She was the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Lewis. She was 26 years, 9 months and four days old. She had a severe spell of sickness while a child and has been an invalid all her life. We sorrow not as those that have no hope, for we feel sure she is much better off, and while she was a constant care, the family treated her more like a pet than a trouble. It was hard for them to give her up. The Lord will guide you to the other shore, if you only follow on. Funeral by this writer.

C. E. M. Raper.

—Northwestern Advocate: "Recently the municipal dance censor of Lenox, Mass., resigned his position rather than submit to being drawn into unpleasant controversy with the society people of the town, who strongly resented his order to bar objectionable dances. This statement is but another in the cumulative evidence that the greatest curse to the dance evil is found among our 'better' classes of society."

—Biblical Recorder: "When certain states of Christian (?) America are banishing the Bible from the public schools, it is interesting to learn that the government of Egypt, through its minister of education, recently ordered 4,600 Bibles, 400 New Testaments, 20 reference Bibles and 20 copies of the Concordance for their schools. It is stated that this is the first time the Bible has been introduced into the government schools of Egypt."

—Miss Cynthia A. Miller tells the following experience which took place when she was preparing to leave China: "Last Saturday I was talking to the women of the Training School and asked each of them to give me a message that she would like me to take to the good sisters at home who had been instruments in God's hands in raising funds for the splendid building that they have now for the Training School. There were many sweet and tender messages given, but the teacher, Mrs. K'u, just said: 'Many years ago when my dear mother was living I remember this same request was made of her by a missionary leaving on furlough, and her message then is my message now. In this life there is not enough time to thank them for what they have done; but wait till we all meet around the great throne above, and we will have all eternity in which to thank them and thank him and can all praise and adore our Lord together, forever and ever.' "

I may but gasp His name;
Preach Him to all, and cry in death,
'Behold! Behold the Lamb!' "

MY CONSCIENCE.

BY JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY.

Sometimes my Conscience says, says he,
"Don't you know me?"
And I, says I, skeered through and through,
"Of course I do.
You air a nice chap ever' way,
I'm here to say!
You make me cry—you make me pray,
And all them good things thataway—
That is, at night. Where do you stay
Durin' the day?"

And then my Conscience says, onc't more
"You know me—shore?"
"Oh, yes," says I, a-trimblin' faint,
"You're jes' a saint!
Your ways is all so holy-right,
I love you better ever' night
You come around—'tel plum daylight,
When you air out o' sight!"

And then my Conscience sort o' grits
His teeth, and spits
On his two hands and gabs, of course,
Some old remorse,
And beats me with the big butt-end
O' that thing—'tel my closest friend
'Ud hardly know me. "Now," says he,
"Be keerful as you'd orto be And allus think o' me!"

Elon College, North Carolina

For a quarter century Elon College has rendered the best families of the South a paragon service in providing young men and young women with the best mental, moral and physical training under positive Christian influences, tho entirely free from sectarianism.

Karl Lehman, of Boston, testifies that "of all the Colleges I have visited as International Field Secretary of Christian Endeavor during six years, the spirit of Elon College appeals to me as most genuinelu Christian." Elon College is situated in the delightful hill country, a section unsurpassed for beauty, with a climate far-famed for its healthfulness. Its campus, comprising twenty-five acres of native oak and hickory, shrubbery, winding walks and driveways, is one of the most beautiful in the South and, with its two unsurpassed gymnasia, provides abundant opportunity for recreation and relaxation.

The splendid equipment of Elon College was only made possible through liberal endowment. It maintains seven elegant new buildings, especially designed and appointed for college work. These are furnished with every known convenience; steam heat, electric lights, running water, baths and sewerage. The College plant is conservatively valued at $300,000.00.

Elon College is distinctly a high-grade institution, though its charges are moderate. Its graduates are admitted to the graduate departments of all the great universities without examination. Its literary and scientific courses are arranged in various departments which lead to the degrees of Master of Arts, Bachelor of Arts, Bachelor of Science, Bachelor of Philosophy, Bachelor of Pedagogy, and a three-years' course leading to the degree of Licentiate of Instruction, designed especially for teachers. goal. The valor and enthusiasm of Balboa conquered all obstacles. He made friends of those Indian chiefs who were willing, and fought with those who preferred to be his enemies. At last, when he entered the territory of a chief called Cuarecua, he arrived at the foot of a mountain chain from whose summit the Indian guides told him he could see the object of his search.

Only 77 Spaniards were able to scale this height. The rest were disabled by exhaustion or by wounds. At daybreak on the 25th of September the little company, led by Balboa and Pizarro, began to ascend the ridge. Before noon they reached the top. Before them was a cone-shaped peak which obscured all the view toward the south.

"'There,' said one of the guides, 'from the top of that rock you can see the ocean.' Nunez de Balboa shouted to his men, and alone scaled the height. What a magnificent sight greeted the eyes of the governor of Antigua! Covered with splendid vegetation such as is seen only in those regions, was the steep southern slope of the ridge, broken here and there by rocks and gullies, and far away on the horizon was a shining line of silver which confirmed all that he had been told about the existence of the new sea.

"Balboa drew his sword, and raising it toward heaven, took possession of that sea for Spain, and named it the Southern sea. He then called to his men. With Pizarro leading, the little company was soon at his side. Those strong men, hardened by endurance and the sight of many battles, looked in wonder at the expanse of water that shone in the sunlight far away, as if they were seeing a vision. Somebody began to sing a religious chant, others followed, and for the first time a Te Deum was heard on the isthmus of Darien.

"When all the men were satisfied with looking at the far-off sea, they cut down trees with their daggers and hatchets, and carrying the trunks of these to the top of the rock, built there a huge cross which they supported with heavy stones. After this their only desire was to touch the waters of that ocean and walk along its shore. The thing was not easy, but a few days afterward they had opened a way through the forest and accomplished it.

"The tide was low when they arrived, and they had to wait for it to rise, because between them and the water was a stretch of sandy mud in which the men sank to their knees. As soon as the tide began to rise Balboa, carrying in one hand the Spanish flag and in the other a drawn sword, advanced into the green waves until the water reached his waist, and took formal possession of the sea and all its shores in the name of Ferdinand of Aragon and his daughter Juana of Castile. That sea which for so long a time belonged to Spain, was the same which Magellan afterward wrongly named the Pacific ocean.

"By a strange chance the ships with which Pedro Arias was coming to take possession of the government did not meet the ship in which Balboa was sending to the king of Spain news of his discovery and a large quantity of the treasures secured in his journey. Pedrarias's squadron arrived at Antigua the 29th of June, 1514, and its commander immediately sent an officer to look for Balboa.

"The messenger found Balboa dressed in a shirt and cotton trousers, directing the construction of a roof on his house. The officer with his shimmering silk raiment and silver-plated armor must have been greatly surprised at such simplicity. However, with the greatest courtesy he notified the governor that the squadron in sight had brought his substitute, and Balboa quietly replied that he might disembark and that he would be well received.

"Pedrarias landed with his men, and immediately had Balboa arrested, informing him that he would be judged guilty of causing Nicuesa's misfortune. Soon after this Balboa was justly rewarded, for the king sent him a message of congratulation for his discoveries, declared him innocent, and named him general and governor of any lands which might be discovered in the Southern sea. . .

"Of course Pedrarias was much displeased with this news. His hatred for Balboa grew until three years later he pretended to have discovered a conspiracy, accused Balboa of being a traitor, and loaded him with chains. A few days later the brave discoverer of the Pacific, the man who had accomplished the greatest feat of exploration in America, was beheaded."—The Pathfinder.

POPULAR TALKS ON LAW.

By W. K. Towers, A. B., J. D., of Mich.

As a very large proportion of us must either direct the work of those who serve us or follow the direction of those whom we serve, the question of the duties which employee owes to employer is indeed vital.

The method that an employer usually adopts to enforce his authority is to dismiss from his service the employee who fails to obey his commands, or perform the duties expected of him. The fear of "losing the job" is what holds most employees to their duties. The employee usually enforces his rights by quitting when he is ordered to perform a task which he believes unreasonable. In cases where the employee has been hired for no definite period, and there is no understanding that the employment is to continue for any period, the relation of employer and employee is continued merely at the will of the parties and may be readily dissolved by either. But where there is a definite agreement—a contract—between employer and employee, fixing a term of employment, the employer may not discharge the employee without adequate grounds.

When we speak of "master" in the popular sense we usually think of one who has wide authority over the person of an employee who is in a decidedly inferior position. We are inclined to think of a "servant' as one serving in a somewhat menial capacity. But such is not the meaning of master and servant in legal terminology. The words master and servant are as broad as employer and employee, including all employers and all employees, whatever their rank, whatev- their calling. The general manager with the widest authority employed at a salary of a hundred thousand dollars a year is, in law, a servant. The simplest employer is a master.

The duty of the servant to obey the master is fundamental. It is of the essence of the contract of employment and must always be recognized. "A promise by the servant to obey the lawful and reasonable orders of his master within the scope of his contract is implied by law," said a New York judge. "Submission to the master's will is the law of the contract." An authority on this subject has written, "Where a servant deliberately violates his master's orders, or refuses to obey them when given, he is clearly guilty of the grossest breach of contract. His duty is to obey the master in all things for which obedience is implied from the nature of the service undertaken."

The employer's usual redress for a refusal to obey on the part of the servant is a dismissal from his service. This right of a master to dismiss a servant who has violated this duty of obedience is firmly settled. As to just what amounts to such a defiance of proper authority as to justify an employer in dismissing an employee who it has been agreed is to serve for a definite period is the question that is of most immediate interest and importance to employer and employee.

Spaine was a farm laborer in the employ of Arnott for the usual term of one year. He usually breakfasted at five o'clock and dined at two. One day Arnott ordered him to go with some horses to the marsh which was a mile off, before dinner, dinner then being ready. The plaintiff said that he had done his due, and would not go until he had had his dinner. Arnott told him to go about his business, and he went without making any submission to the instructions. Later Spaine sued Arnott because of wrongful dismissal, seeking damages for the breach of contract of employment, but he failed to recover.

"If Spaine refused to obey his master's orders," said the judge, "I think he was warranted in turning him away. It would be exceedingly inconvenient if the servant were to be permitted to set himself up to control his master in his domestic relations, such as the time of dinner. After a refusal on the part of the servant to perform his work the master is not bound to keep him on as a burthensome and useless servant to the end of the year."

This case is rather extreme, and many courts would probably now rule such an order as unreasonable, and refusal to obey it not sufficient grounds for dismissal. It illustrates the undoubted principle that a master may dismiss his servant for a single act of disobedience. A farm laborer who refused to work during harvest time till 8 o'clock was held properly dismissed, as was also a coachman who, against his employer's express orders, carried friends of his own in his employer's carriage. A traveling salesman who refused to comply with the request of his employer to return his samples, the superintendent who refused to obey his superior's orders to reinstate an employee, and the teacher who refused to reinstate a pupil who was instructed to do so by the school board, were all held to be properly dismissed for such single acts of disobedience. Numberless examples might be discovered of instances of disobedience that have been held to justify a dismissal.

Not only may a master dismiss a disobedient servant, but he may also sue that servant and secure damages for any injury which may have been caused by reason of the servant's disobedience.

While the general rule is that the disobedience of any order is a breach of the duty which the employee owes to the employer, and so a justification for dismissal, there are certain circumstances which will justify a servant in his disobedience. A servant need not obey an order which is unreasonable, but an employee should be very certain that the instruction would be deemed obviously and certainly unreasonable by a normal person before he disobeys for that reason. Nor need a servant obey instructions which are unlawful. Neither may an employee be dismissed for failure to obey orders instructing him to perform services which are not properly within the duties for which he was employed.

A servant may not be dismissed for the failure to obey an order in regard to a matter of small importance and so trivial that the contract of employment was not affected. If the disobedience was unintentional, and in regard to matters of no importance, and the instructions were in regard to matters of mere detail and not of a character to require in all circumstances strict obedience the law will generally insist that there is not sufficient grounds for the severing of the relation of master and servant.

A master may dismiss a servant tho the act in question was not actually injurious to him—it is enough that there was a failure to obey in a matter of importance, or a wilful disobedience of any character of a proper order.

As before stated, a servant may not be dismissed for failure to obey an instruction requiring services of a kind different from those which he was hired to perform. An employee is bound to perform the duties he was engaged to do and no others. Thus a boy hired to care for sheep and assist at hay time, cannot be required to perform the additional duty of taking charge of several cattle in the winter. A ballet dancer who has been engaged as premiere danseuse cannot be compelled to take an inferior position in the ballet, nor is a lady's maid expected to milk cows. But the master's requirements must be clearly beyond the scope of the servant's employment to justify a refusal. Thus a man hired for general work on a farm is not justified in abandoning his employment because he is set to cutting flax with a machine and thinks this too hard work.

The hours at which a servant is required to work are not infrequently fixed by the terms of the agreement between employer and employee. The length of a working day may also be prescribed by law. It may be understood from the nature of the employment, but a servant cannot be required to work at unreasonable times, nor for periods, which considering all the circumstances, are excessive.

As to holidays the laws of the state control. Other days off may be recognized and understood by custom or stated in the contract. Sunday is usually a legal holiday, or understood as a holiday, yet it may not be in exceptional callings as those of seaman or railroad employee.

Sickness, or other urgent necessity, is a recognized excuse for an empployee's failure to work during periods of required labor. But a servant who absents himself from work, contrary to the instructions of his employer, for no good cause, is guilty of a breach of duty and may be dismissed.

GENTLEMAN JIM.

"Help yer across de street, mom?"

The timid-looking old lady, standing helplessly on the corner, turned her eyes from the motley array of passing vehicles to the face of the boy who stood, hat in hand, awaiting her answer.

His hands were grimy, his clothes sadly in need of repair, while a small blacking box slung across one shoulder proclaimed his avocation that of a bootblack. His attitude of respectful attention, however, was one that might have been envied by the palace bred scion of one of the so-called four hundred. Little did the boy dream that this act of politeness was destined to change the whole course of his life.

The small old lady smiled, and placing one hand on his arm, allowed him to conduct her through the maze of hacks, street cars and automobiles, each one of which to her mind at least, seemed to be moving in all directions at once.

"Dere you be, mom, all safe an' sound," said the bootblack, as they reached the other side.

The lad was about to move away, when the old lady caught him by the arm. "Wait," she said, opening her purse, "I haven't paid you."

The boy's glance rested for an instant on the rather shabby black shawl, then he looked straight into the kindly face above it.

"I ain't in de habit of charging fer a little kindness like dat," he said, with a quiet dignity that impressed Jane Rushly far more than the words.

"What's your name?" she asked, closing the purse.

"Me name's James Budd, but I never uses it, mom," replied the bootblack; "de boys calls me Jimmy de Bud, an' Gentleman Jim."

"I think the last fits you the best," she said, smiling. "And now, Jimmy, where do you live?"

"In de city," answered Jimmy, with a comprehensive sweep of his hand.

"Oh! but I mean, where do your parents live; surely you have a father and mother?"

For a moment the boy was silent, then

Hutcherson, Mrs. T. S. Wray. We have 10 regular members. We will have our meeting every Monday after the first Sunday in each month. Will meet at the church the next meeting. We hope to have a good number out and have new members to join us. Pray for us in this work. Mrs. D. L. Carroll, Cor. Sec.

Mt. Hermon, Mt. Hermon Ct.

Our special meeting began the third Sunday in this month. Although it was raining almost all the time Sunday, and the roads were in a bad condition, yet the house was filled to its utmost capacity. Our pastor, Brother Lowdermilk, had no ministerial help Sunday. Rev. G. F. Millaway came Monday and did all the preaching until the close. Brother Millaway is not unknown to us, he having assisted in a special meeting at Mt. Hermon about six years ago. Large congregations came every day to hear his excellent sermons. Not only did the people come to hear, but they had a "mind to work," (I mean the Christian people), and, as a result of that, there were fourteen conversions and nine accessions. The church was greatly revived; some were so filled with the Spirit that they praised God aloud.

The third quarterly conference was held at Mt. Hermon on Saturday before the fifth Sunday in August. The business was transacted in harmony. It was found that Bro. G. W. Patterson was elected delegate to the next Annual Conference. Bro. A. A. Sharpe was made alternate. Best wishes to the Herald.

VISIT TO THE CHILDREN'S HOME.

Dear Editor:

As I have been a visitor at the Children's Home I would be pleased to say a few words in regard to it. I think they have a real nice place and a most beautiful Home, one that we ought to be proud of.

On my arrival I did not feel like a stranger at all to meet those bright little faces with those sweet smiles and the loving kindness of the children, and to have them take me over the building and show all the different parts from basement to garret and to hear them tell what different people sent them, and to hear them talk and chatter. It would be a pleasure trip to any one, I think, to go to the Children's Home and see how well they are trained; and best of all, it is nice to see the interest that Mr. and Mrs. Garrett take in the children and the pains they take in teaching them how to do their work. Each child, boy and girl, knows what they have to do, and it isn't any trouble to get it done and they seem to take a great delight in doing it. I don't think we could have found any one else to take care of the Home any better than Mr. and Mrs. Garrett, and I as a Methodist Protestant am very well satisfied with having them in their care, and I pray that Heaven's richest blessings may be with them and the children, and may the Lord help me to do more for the Home than I ever have.

DIED.

Jenkins.

At Worthville, Sunday, Sept. 21, 1913, James Jenkins, aged 28 years, passed out of this life. Bro. Jenkins was a member of our church at Worthville and was a man of most excellent virtues.

Early this year he was elected as superintendent of our Sunday school at Worthville and rendered good service until the mills closed down, when he went away for some time. He was taken sick while away and came home sick, and never was well any more. He was loved and honored by all who knew him. He has left an influence among the people at Worthville that will live long. He will be remembered for his consecrated life in the service of his Lord. He was true and loyal to the church, but was far from being narrow, always manifesting that charity and broadness which characterizes the real man. He leaves one brother and seven sisters and a host of friends. On Monday, Sept. 22, the funeral was held in our church at Worthville after which his body was laid to rest in the Worthville cemetery. A large crowd of people attended the services. Our church was full and some standing at the door on the outside.

The relatives and friends have our sympathy in this hour of affliction.

Tucker.

James Prior Tucker was born June 11, 1856, and died July29, 1913.

He leaves to mourn their loss a wife and brothers and sisters. He was married the second time to Elmira McKoughan.

When quite young he professed faith in Christ and joined the church at Palestine in Rockingham county and later moved his membership to Ai Methodist Protestant Church of which he remained a faithful and active member till God called him to come up higher.

He did not enjoy good health for the past few years, but he had been about his daily work as usual until that day he was complaining some, but not thought to be seriously ill. He ate his dinner and went to take his rest under the shade tree when the death angel came and claimed his soul.

Jesus saw fit to take this good man from our midst, and while we are left to mourn our loss, we can feel that we have another link added to our chain to draw us closer to heaven.

He was a great friend to his pastor and was always ready to show favors to him. He was superintendent of the Sunday school and was devoted to his work. I have seen him go when I knew he was scarcely able, but he was so interested in his church and to see God's work prosper he would not give up to his feelings. He loved his Sunday school people and always had an encouraging word to say to them, and would try to get everybody in Sunday school. His scholars will miss him, but he has left an example behind worthy for us to follow, and if we live as close to the Master as I think he did we need not fear the summons to come suddenly as it did to him.

We have lost a loyal member, a kind neighbor and friend. We pray that our loving Heavenly Father that doeth all things well will bless and bind up the broken-hearted wife and that she may find comfort in fleeing to Jesus Christ for comfort and consolation and that the vacancy made by Providence may be filled by His Holy Spirit.

One of the largest gatherings of people we have seen at this church attended the funeral services held Thursday afternoon, July 30th, at Ai M. P. Church conducted by his pastor, Rev. W. R. Lowdermilk.

Mr. Tucker is gone, but we feel he is rejoicing on the other side of the river and waiting for his loved ones and his friends whom he so much loved. He would often say, "Meet me in Heaven."

A Friend.

Cheatham.

William H. Cheatham, son of Isaac and Cynthia Cheatham, born August 27, 1840, died September 21, 1913. On April 22, 1868, he married Sallie Gooch and to this union were five children born, two of which preceded him to the spirit world. His wife also departed this life a few years ago and many were the times we have heard him speak of the time when they should be reunited; for it was his delight to talk of heavenly things and to talk of his faith in a future state of happiness for the faithful. Brother Cheatham had been a faithful member of the church for 58 years, having joined when he was 15. He never did get too old to have an interest in the work of the Sunday school either, as was attested by his presence every time he was able to be there. Many times would he quote John 3: 16, "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotton Son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Surely this good man will be greatly missed at Rehoboth where he was always in his place unless providentially hindered. Even when he was not permitted to attend services on account of failing health he was missed by his pastor as he was a very attentive listener to the word. We shall miss him in the quarterly conferences of this charge as he was often on hand to show his interest in the work of the charge. Most of all he will be missed in the home where his advice and example counted for the most.

Surely the children will miss him, but to you sorowing ones the best way you can reflect honor on the one you loved so much is by being true to the church and to the interest of the Kingdom as he was faithful. A vacancy for you sons to fill if you will and thus carry on the work that your faithful father delighted to see prosper. "A hoary head is a crown of glory if it be found in the way of righteousness." Surely such men as are faithful are wearing this crown that brings to them the glory that can be carried to the other world and this is the only kind worth seeking for.

"Servant of God, well done,
Rest from thy loved employ,
The battle's fought, the vict'ry's won,
Enter the Master's joy."

OUR FOREIGN MISSIONARY WORK.

Another Gift to the Board.

To-day's mail brought a check for five hundred dollars from another brother in West Virginia, and in the brief note accompanying it he wrote: "and we hope it will help to build up the Master's Kingdom," signed by him and his wife.

Yes, it will help to build up "the Master's Kingdom;" for this amount will pay the salary of two Japanese preachers for a year, and the rent of a house or two used as a chapel. This good brother recognizes his stewardship, and is faithfully trying to use his money in the way God will approve, and surely his heart will be enriched with great joy, and his life with rich spiritual blessings.

There are many more in different parts of our denomination who should follow this worthy brother's example and send us a substantial gift to help develop the great foreign missionary work of our church which now has urgent needs. Let us hear from you at once.

A SAMPLE.

Here is a fine sample of what an organized class can accomplish.

The Servo Adult Bible Class has had a rapid growth. Organized 1911, with seventeen members, within a year the enrollment had increased to eighty-six. One hundred and twenty-seven names were on the roll during the year.

The officers, members and committees of the class are energetic and resourceful, as a record of the year's work shows. This record includes the gift of an individual communion set to the church, the purchase of song books for the Sunday school, and the assuming of the salary of the church organist. In addition to the gifts, one Sunday's offering each month goes to the treasury of the school.

On Tuesday evenings the class conducts a social service study course. During the first winter, The Challenge of the City was the text-book used. Special lectures on various allied subjects, as well as a stereopticon lecture, housing conditions and the prevention of disease added to the value and interest of the work.

During the second year the theme was "Civic Needs. Just before the city voted on the new charter there was a debate on "The Commission Form of Government vs. The Ward System." Judge Ensign, of the juvenile court, told of the need of this special work. The city attorney addressed the men on the police courts of the city.

We will gladly send you free helps for organizing just such a class. Write today to C. H. Hubbell, Adrian, Michigan.

"UNANIMOUS DAY."

We like that term. We want to pass it on to you as a watchword for your Rally Day.

"Unanimous Day is the name given to the fall rally Sunday by a class in a small town, the aim being to make the attendance roll call "unanimous". Last year's slogan was "every person in town in the Sunday school on Unanimous Day," and they actually accomplished just that—one convalescent invalid being taken in a wheel chair.

Here are some more pointers for making Rally Day a success.

We had an experience meeting at our Rally Day Social preceding the Sunday Rally. Each member was asked to give two minutes to telling what ought to be done in the class and how it could be done. When finished we found we had spent an exceedingly profitable hour.

We gave four boys megaphones and started them out through the town on Saturday afternoon. They went through the streets calling the attractions of our class Rally Day. It may not have been very dignified, but it got the crowd.

We asked all our members to submit names of persons to whom they would like to have personal letters written. We secured a long list of names in this way and divided them up among the class with the request that personal letters be written each one inviting them to Rally Day. These letters did much to boost the class.

We had a stereopticon sheet put upon the front of a large building in the heart of the business center of the town. As everybody in our town goes down to the business part on Saturday night, that night we took the stereopticon and showed pictures with invitations to our Rally Day. We showed pictures of some of our boys in our school, some of the little tots in the Primary Department, a picture of the inside of the church, and pictures of our various class banquets and outings. Had a great crowd the next morning.

We have an excellent program which is more popular than any of our previous issues. The demand is far ahead of any former year. Send to-day for your share. These programs are free and are sent prepaid. Send your order to C. H. Hubbell, Adrian, Michigan, now.

GOOD ROADS PROCLAMATION BY THE GOVERNOR.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, RALEIGH.

Whereas the modern highway is essential to material prosperity, and to the advancement of the social life of every community; every people that aspires to join the forward procession and that hopes for the opportunities of our time is beginning to realize the necessity of improved roads; all sections and all progressive citizens are demanding them and determined to have them; the whole country has awakened to their importance; everywhere there is a generous rivalry to have the best, and everywhere enthusiasm for them is apparent, and increasing; and

Whereas the the people of North Carolina are losing, according to reliable estimate, twelve million dollars annually on account of bad roads—this vast sum paid as a tribute to mud:

Now, therefore, recognizing the universal sentiment for road improvement, and realizing the benefits which must result therefrom to all the people, I, Locke Craig,

Governor of North Carolina, do set apart Wednesday, the 5th day of November, and Thursday, the 6th of November, 1913, as GOOD ROADS DAYS, and do appoint these days as holidays and days of festival throughout the State, to celebrate the beginning of an era wherein improved highways shall be built in every neighborhood, that all the people of farm and city may enjoy the opportunities which they bring.

I call upon all patriotic people throughout the State to work upon the public roads and refrain from all other occupations on these appointed days; and I call upon every able-bodied man to shoulder his shovel, and march out and strike a blow for progress. Let the farmer, the merchant, the lawyer, the doctor, the minister of the Gospel, the rich and the poor, and the men of all walks of life enlist as volunteers in this mighty army for grand accomplishment.

Let no man be above this work, nor forget his duty to himself and to his neighbors. It will be an honor to every man on these days to labor with his fellow-man to banish from the country the curse of bad roads and the evils that accompany them.

Let all the people of every station, high or low, be moved by the same patriotic impulse to work for the common weal. To all the benefit will come. Let all participate.

I do appoint and set apart these days, the 5th and 6th of November, that the people may have an opportunity to give substantial expression to the universal desire and determination of the State, in action inspired by hope, and rejoicing that will resound in one unbroken chorus from the mountains to the sea.

I call upon all the women to participate. In every hour of danger they have inspired the men of North Carolina with faith and courage; in this day of realization, they with their children will come to lend to this noble cause the charm and the encouragement of their presence. They can provide good things to eat, and decorate every worker with a badge of honor.

Let every citizen do his duty, and these days will be long remembered for the impetus they gave to the cause of good roads and a finer civic spirit.

I call upon the county commissioners of every county in the State to issue a proclamation urging the people to go out on the 5th and 6th days of November, and labor for the welfare of their respective counties and communities, as well as for the whole State of which they constitute a part.

I call upon the president of the Farmers' Union to issue his proclamation to the farmers of North Carolina, and to their local organizations, that this great body of our citizenship, constituting as it does the bone and sinew of the State, may join with energy and enthusiasm in this movement. More than any other class of our people, they are dependent upon the country road. More attractive homes, better farming, and a finer rural life will result from the building of modern highways.

Let the work be completely organized so that it will reach to every neighborhood, "and be conducted in a systematic and business way, to the end that at sunset of the second day there will be no community in all the State where the hand of progress and toil has not left its mark in permanent road improvement, and the progressive spirit its impression in the hearts and minds of the people."

I call upon the ministers of the Gospel, the educators, and the press of the State to use their mighty influence for this work, which means not only material development, but moral and intellectual development.

I call upon all road overseers, good roads associations, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and all associations and organizations for the public welfare and civic betterment to give to this movement the energy of their influence.

I call upon the mayor of every town and city of North Carolina to issue his proclamation that his people may enlist in this organization, and in the building of roads upon which the prosperity of town and city depends.

Let every North Carolinian show by his work that he is for the improvement of his State. "Let us labor that we may enjoy the fruits of today, and our children a fuller fruition to-morrow."

Done at our city of Raleigh, this the 27th day of September, in the year of our Lord, 1913, aand in the one hundred and thirty-eighth year of our American independence. LOCKE CRAIG, Governor.

By the Governor:

JOHN P. KERR, Private Secretary.

STATEMENT CONCERNING THE ACTIONOF THE NATIONAL CONGRESS OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION FAVORING THE RESTORATION OF THE SALE OF ALCOHOLIC LIQUOR IN THE ARMY CANTEEN.

The National Congress of the Daughters of the American Revolution at Washington last spring adopted a resolution favoring the sale of alcoholic liquor at the Army Post Exchange.

It was SLIPPED through. Many delegates had gone. There was such confusion that few knew what was going on. The newspapers, hungry for news favorable to the canteen, failed to catch it. I learned of it myself by accident. To make sure I sent for the leading papers of New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Chicago and St. Louis. I found it only in the Washington papers, and then only in an obscure form in the running story.

Believing this to be part of the same campaign to discredit the W. C. T. U. by enlisting women in behalf of the canteen, which had secured action by a little body of army officers' wives and a little group of doctors' wives, I wrote a letter to every D. A. R. Chapter Regent of America asking her to co-operate in an effort to have the D. A. R. set right, and to submit the matter to her local chapter for action.

The replies are interesting. A few defend the "Canteen" but the great majority do not. Many write that they did not know of the action until the receipt of my letter. A few had already protested. Some chapters have since met and officially protested. Many expressed indignation. Some who take no sides on the "Canteen" question say that it was an improper subject to be brought before the D. A. R. The President General says she regrets the action. I am informed that the Executive Board decided after my first letter last May that such questions shall not be brought up in the future. But to stop here would leave the "Canteen" advocates in possession of the field, so we shall be compelled to insist that it be considered enough to rescind the action.

To this end, and to show the real sentiment of the country, I shall introduce a resolution at the National Convention of the Anti-Saloon League at Columbus, O., November 10-13, asking the D. A. R. to recede from this action on the ground that this question is outside the province of such an organization.

Women are the greatest sufferers from the liqpor traffic, and I do not believe that any body of cultured, patriotic women will stand for the brewers against the people when they understand the issue.

Instead of going backward by consenting that its private soldiers be officially tempted to drink, this nation is preparing to insist upon total abstaining officers in harmony with the efficiency demands of the business world.

GOLDEN ROD.

Golden rod, as gold as the dawn is golden,
Torch of beauty lighting the autumn pathways,
We who tread the shadows of life autumnal
Fain are to follow.

Into darkness, into the wastes of winter,
Into voids whence never a foot returneth,
Such a guide to brighten the deepening silence
With rays immortal!

DISCOVERY OF THE PACIFIC.

It was on Sept. 25, 1513—four centuries ago—that the Pacific ocean was first viewed by the eyes of white men. This anniversary is being celebrated in various ways in America and Europe. Some historians have erroneously given Cortez the credit for discovering the Pacific, tho of course it belongs rightfully to Vasco Nunez de Balboa. Even the poet Keats in one of his sonnets repeats the blunder where he says:

Then felt I like some watcher of the skies
When a new planet swims into his ken.
Or like stout Cortez, when, with eagle eye,
He stared at the Pacific—and all his men
Looked at each other with a mild surmise,
Silent upon a peak in Darien.

At a meeting of the Royal Geographical Society in London recently the anniversary was fittingly observed and Keats' error was corrected. Sir Clements Markham in an address on the subject said: 'There is no reason why Keats should not have used the name Nunez instead of Cortez if he had known. It would have fitted his verse equally well. Nunez was one of the best of the Spanish conquerors, one who overcame by far the greatest difficulties by the most praise worthy methods, and whose life was as romantic as his death was deplorable and sad."

Sir Clements related how Balboa had made the discovery of the isthmus of Darien, or Panama as it is now called, and from the backbone of the continent looked out upon the Pacific, and how his first act on seeing this splendid expanse of water was to sing a Te Deum of thanks to the Almighty. He reviewed how the great object of the explorers of that time was to find some water passage through the continent which would give them their coveted route to the Orient.

Magellan argued that by sailing south along the coast of South America he must come either to some opening in the land or to the termination of the land itself. As we know, he finally came to the straits at the extremity of South America which bear his name, and was the first man to round the western hemisphere and the first to cross the Pacific. This was seven years after Balboa's discovery. The completion of the Panama canal marks the final conquest of the isthmus and gives the world the waterway to the East which the bold explorers of four centuries ago so eagerly sought for.

The government of Panama is planning to erect a colossal statue of Balboa at the Pacific entrance to the canal. The cost of the monument will be defrayed by public subscriptions. King Alfonso of Spain has shown his interest and generosity by heading the list with 50,000 pesetas((about $10,000.)

The following account of the discovery of the Pacific was translated for the Pathfinder by Margaret H. Benedict of Cincinnati, from a Spanish source. It is particularly interesting because it tells the story from the Spanish point of view:

"About the middle of the year 1511 the bold explorer Vasco Nunez de Balboa was governor of Santa Maria de la Antigua. Don Diego de Nicuesa had been appointed for this place, but some of his countrymen who envied and hated him had not even allowed him to disembark when he came to take possession of the government. Santa Maria de la Antigua was one of the first cities founded by the Spaniards in Colombia. It was on the river Darien, and the new governor, never content to be idle, began to explore the surrounding country, visiting the Indian tribes and trying to establish friendly relations with them.

"Balboa was a genial, kind man, tho severe enough in cases of necessity, and his fine character together with his good looks soon won for him the hearts of the natives. One of these, the chief Careta, whom Balboa met in one of his journeys, went so far as to give him one of his daughters in marriage, and was always his firm friend.

"Nor was the only advantage which the Spaniard gained by his friendship with the Indian. In one of his expeditions through the Colombian territory Balboa met another chief called Comagre, who lived in the interior of the isthmus of Panama. This chief had a son who presented the traveler with many jewels of pure gold. When Balboa asked him where this valuable metal could be found the youth replied that beyond his father's lands toward the south was a sea whose shores abounded in gold and pearls.

"Rejoiced at this news and eager to profit by it, the governor of Antigua hastened to send word to Spain asking for men and supplies to enable him to reach the unknown sea. Meanwhile Balboa was ignorant of what was happening in Spain. The news ofNicuessa's repulse had reached there, and Balboa was unjustly accused of having caused it. Pedro Arias de Avila, better known as Pedarias, had been appointed as a new governor in Balboa's place, and was coming to America to depose him.

"It seems that to some men are given mysterious and happy inspirations. Nunez de Balboa was one of these men. When he saw that the time was passing and no answer to his petition was sent from Spain he began to be uneasy and determined to search for the unknown sea without waiting for the men whom he had asked to have sent out from Spain. He called together his friends in Antigua, and with them discussed the difficulties of that journey which might possibly take them to Marco Polo's mysterious Cipango, (or Japan) the principal object of Columbus's famous voyage.

"Well might a thousand men be needed for such an expedition, but it was impossible to find so many, and the explorer had to start with 190, who left the city on the 1st of September, 1513. Vasco Nunez de Balboa and Francisco Pizarro were the leaders. They took with them a pack of bloodhounds to help in fighting savages and to guard the Indian slaves.

"The difficulties of the undertaking seemed at first insuperable, and once conquered, unbelievable. The company had to carry on frequent and terrible battles with fierce and warlike mountain tribes. Continual quarreling and fighting among their own men hindered and delayed the march. The country was almost impassable, and it was the custom at that time for Spaniards who went on such expeditions to wear all their armor, which burned under the rays of the tropical sun. One can imagine what it would be for a small army of men, under the weight of helmets and breastplates, to pass through almost impenetrable stretches of virgin forest where the swampy ground was covered with thorny underbrush, and across steep mountains which could only be scaled with the greatest difficulty.

"The distance from Antigua to the end of the journey was not great, not more than 70 miles, and yet it was nearly a month before the travelers reached their urday till Friday morning and did the preaching. The people enjoyed his sermons and visits very much. He did good preaching, which was plain and truthful. We are all glad he came.

After he left us I did the preaching. At some of the services several were at the altar showing their interest in their salvation. We know of three conversions. At the last service three united with our church. Mr. Joe Sutton came froom the Free-will Baptists, and Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Vinson joined on profession of faith.

GRANVILLE.

Since my last report many things of interest have happened, but being so busy with special meeting work have left all the reporting for the local reporters to do. I do not know that Dr. Slewfoot has done us any good, indeed I am afraid that many of our young people have left off their duty for fear that they would be assailed by this monster of the deep and I have noticed that many things that were interesting to me do not appear any more. I do not think that any one need to fear Peter as he almost run out of soap the first time for there was quite a drop off in the quality of his first article and the second; so much so that it seemed to me of all the time and space that could be wasted he was at it and I did not think it worth while to answer him any more and am not at this to have any more of his soap advertisements but to try to encourage the young reporters to go on with their work and if there are defects why those of us who are not so old and sour will look over that and will encourage you to go on to perfection.

Our meeting at Mt. Carmel was one of the best, so the people there say. Quite a number were saved and reclaimed, seven joined the church during the meeting and there are two others to come at the next appointment. Some who were never known to talk in the church before were so strengthened that they arose and spoke of the good that had come to them from the ser ☛. The closing day was one in which the Spirit came upon us in great power. I am sure that the people were blessed as the result of faithful praying and working. They all sang that could. They prayed, they did personal work, in fact there were no idlers that week at Carmel. When the people have a mind to work as of old they will have the power as of old. Thank God it has not departed from the church when the servants of God put him to the test. This has been a good year on Granville in spiritual things and we appreciate the co-operation of the people of the different churches of the charge in making the work go and thus bringing to the Lord his own as they have given of their time and talent to his services. We are stronger for another year's work because of the experiences of this year.

I want to mention the names of those who have helped in a material way to make the burden lighter and to encourage us by these extra expressions of appreciation: Sisters Lizzie Finch, Sadiah Stone, William Garrett, Sallie Hedgepeth, Van Dyke, Minnie Pardue, Mabel B. Harris, George Hicks, Ida Harris, Lena Floyd. Also from the following brethren has come substantial help: Jos. Beckham, Bro. Harp, James Thomp son, W. C. Rogers, Charlie Hunt, J. W. Davis, John Harris, Alonzo Woodlief, A. K. Rogers, Hugh White, Eugene Pardue, H. A. Finch, L. W. Huff, L. J. Edwards, J. C. Stone, G. N. Hicks, J. H. Harris, and E. G. Finch. All these have helped in a way that I feel that they should be mentioned and if I were to take the time to mention the articles given it would take too much space. We thank you, friends, for your gifts of appreciation and pray God to bless you richly in spiritual things.

Brethren, have you thought that it is only two months and we will be in annual session? May the good Lord enable us all to come up with the best of reports of every department of our church work.

Sincerely, N. G. Bethea.

Grace Church, Greensboro.

We had a good day at Grace Church last Sunday. It was Rally Day in the Sunday school. Every department was represented. Supt. of the Home Department called the roll and many members answered to their names; likewise the Supt. of the Cradle Roll called the names of the babies on this roll and the mothers answered for them. Then they were brought forward to the altar and the pastor offered a prayer for them and their parents. Only part of the program of our Young People's Board was used, time was insufficient for all of it.

There were present in all departments 289; the collection for the Young People's Board was over $8.00.

Supt. Hunter and the officers and the teachers are to be congratulated upon the success of this day. It was great for what it revealed as well as for what was done: it gives assurance of better things in the days to come.

Our third quarterly conference decided to make a strong effort toward paying off the church debt. The matter was referred to the Advisory Committee, and this committee worked out a scheme which was referred to a called session of the conference for endorsement, which was heartily endorsed and will be pushed to consummation early as possible.

It was found that Bro. W. W. Hunter was elected delegate to Conference, and Bro. W. S. Jones was elected alternate.

The work on the new Sunday school room has been delayed somewhat, but it has not been abandoned; it is too badly needed for that. We hope that the church debt will soon be gotten in satisfactory shape so this work can be pushed to completion at no distant day.

Our special meeting is to begin the fourth Sunday in October. Bro. J. D. Williams will assist the pastor in these services. We are expecting good results from these services. R. M. Andrews.

Mebane Charge.

The special meeting at Hebron began the 3d Sunday in Sept. and closed the Thursday evening following. Sunday was a very rainy day. Notwithstanding this there was a large congregation—more than the church would hold.

On Monday Bro. Curry came and did all the preaching thereafter, and all who heard him declare it was well done. Hebron neighborhood is peculiar in one respect. There are fewer adults out of the church in the community than any place I can recall. There were seven or eight professions and six united with the church. On Wednesday evening of the meeting, after the afternoon service, quite a large part of the congregation went over to Bro. Frank Jobe's and held a service there. Bro. Jobe has been confined to his room for a long time. He is now an old man. In other days he was very active in church work. All the preachers who traveled the old Orange circuit, to which Hebron used to belong, can testify to the faithfulness and consecration of Bro. Frank Jobe. Though he has suffered much physical pain there is that calm, resigned expression in his face that is really helpful to see. Bro. W. D. Fogleman, the former pastor of this charge, was at every service, and though he has not been well for some time, his power in song is little abated and his prayers are mellowed with the fervor of a trusting soul. Altogether the meeting was good. The preaching and singing were both good and we feel like thanking Bros. Curry and Fogleman for what they have done.

THE TIDINGS..

On Monday night, Sept. 8, a twelve days' revival was closed at Glen Raven. The meeting was a glorious one indeed. The exact number of conversions and reclamations is not known, but the number was something more than twenty. Six joined the church. It is to be regretted that more did not join the church but it is still hoped that others will at a later time. Besides other results the church was very much revived and encouraged. The pastor did the preaching. At a recent visit to Glen Raven it was the pastor's very pleasant surprise to find that a nice altar rail had been built and nice carpet laid on the floor of pulpit, altar and aisle. This adds very much to the interior of the church. The Ladies' Aid Society is responsible. They did it. Again Glen Raven surprised the pastor and family when on Saturday night, Sept. 21, twenty-five persons came to the home and asked for a place to unload. While the pastor and family were somewhat embarrassed and did not know exactly how to do among so many, they swung doors wide open and told the good people to take possession. These good people did not fail to bring many good things to wear and to eat, all of which the Lord knows about. May God bless these good people.

The Haw River revival began Sept. 8 and closed Sept. 19. Bro. Taylor was the pulpit help and did most excellent preaching. He left an impression on the people of Haw River that is sure to last. There were more than twenty conversions and reclamations, and fifteen joined the church. Others have been converted since the meeting closed. It has been said that this was the best meeting that has been in Haw River within fifteen years.

All the churches on this work have enjoyed good revivals this year.

On Aug. 31 the third quarterly conference declared Br. Spencer Holt elected delegate to Annual Conference. Bro. Hulbert Cates was elected alternate.

To the Official Members of Each Church:

Take due notice and stand straight: Hear me, know your duty and be present, every one of you Official Members. Get busy and have good reports. You know it will be only about five weeks to Annual Conference. Our fourth and last quarterly conference will meet at Mt. Carmel on Saturday before the second Sunday in Oct. Our president, Rev. C. A. Cecil, will be with us and preach to the official members at 11 o'clock; dinner, business of Q. C. Bro. Cecil will remain with us and preach at Bethesda on second Sunday in Oct. at 11 o'clock; Friendship at 3:30 P. M. and Yadkin College at night. Yours for the Master,

H. L. Powell, Pastor.

I have held five special meetings on the work; I have two others to hold. We have had glorious meetings: 264 conversions and reclamations; 70 have joined our church. Rev. W. F. Ashburn aided in three. Rev. S. W. Taylor, in one, and Rev. J. H. Bowman, in one. All these brethren did good and faithful work which was greatly appreciated by pastor and people. Thanks to each of these brethren for efficient services and to God be all the glory.

Yours in the Master's Service,

H. L. Powell.

FROM LOCAL REPORTERS

MILL GROVE, STANLEY CIRCUIT.

Our church work seems to be moving on very well. The Sunday school attendance is not very large, but one cause, I suppose, is, there have been revival meetings and all seemed to want to attend these. Our pastor filled his regular appointment the second Sunday in this month, preaching three sermons for us. Every one seemed to like the sermon on Sunday night best. I heard several say it was an excellent sermon. We still have the cottage prayer meetings, also have mid-week prayer meetings at the church. These meetings are not very largely attended, but all seem to take an interest; on last night in the prayer meeting there was a proposition made for all Christians to come forward and shake hands, and the proposition was then changed, for all who wanted to be Christians to come forward, and every one came; there wasn't one that didn't move under one of the propositions. Pray for us that we may go forward, for Christ and his Kingdom. Nealie Fincher, Reporter.

Giles Chapel, Richland Circuit.

Our meeting has come and gone, but I trust its influence has gone out through this entire community and will reach out through all eternity.

There were twelve conversions and one reclamation, we think; we could not number them definitely as all were not present the last night of the meeting. Four additions to the church. Rev. D. A. Braswell was pulpit help; and help he was, for I surely think he helped all who heard his earnest pleadings and prayers to save poor unsaved souls. We certainly love to hear Father Braswell preach and trust he will live many years to expound God's word to poor dying men.

We were very glad indeed to have Rev. and Mrs. Joel Trogdon and little son J. B. attend the meeting. We are always glad to see them back at the old home church. We pray that Bro. Trogdon may be restored to perfect health and be spared to live a long while yet with his dear family.

Mr. J. C. Allred, our S. S. Supt., began holding prayer meeting on Sunday night in each week, a month before the series of meetings began, which did much good, as some of us church members felt stronger and ready for the work in the meeting. We feel determined to carry on the prayer meeting all the year. Readers, pray for us that we may grow stronger in the faith.

I certainly do love to read the Herald and am eagerly waiting for its arrival each week. Long may it live. Best wishes to the editor and its many readers. Mrs. W. R. Hamlin.

Concord.

We have just closed a ten days' meeting with very good results. Bro. Dixon Reed was with us a week. We enjoyed his presence much. Seven united with the church, backsliders were reclaimed and the church was revived.

Our Sunday school is doing nicely.

We are still trying to make improvements on our church. The Ladies' Aid Society has raised money to have it painted inside. The painters began work this morning. Our Busy Bees are still busy with their good work and they seem to have the will and the mind to work for their Master.

Our meeting closed sooner than was expected on account of Bro. Suits' health. He is better at this writing, I am glad to say. L. F. B.

Reidsville.

The ladies of the Reidsville Methodist Protestant Church met at the church on Sept. 25 and organized a Ladies' Aid Society. The meeting was opened by reading the 19th Psalm and a very fervent prayer offered by Rev. C. E. M. Raper. Then came the election of officers as follows: Mrs. A. P. Sands, president; Mrs. G. M. Thompson, vice president; Mrs. D. L. Carroll, Cor. Sec.; Miss Madge Thompson, Rec. Sec. and Treas. A committee of three was appointed to secure new members: they are Mrs. J. R. McCollum, Miss Treva Raper and Miss Berta Cannada. Another committee was appointed to formulate plans to raise money for the society: they are as follows: Mrs. G. S. Kernodle, Mrs. John C.

THE MESSAGE FROM MARYLAND.

BY LYMAN EDWYN DAVIS, D. D.,
President of the General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church.

The unofficial paper sent forth last week by ministers and laymen of the Maryland Conference is at once too late and too early. If it is intended to modify or amend the basis of union in the hands of the commission, it is too late, because the commission has adopted it and passed it on to the annual conferences as authorized and directed by the General Confenence. If it is intended to modify or amend the basis of union in the hands of the General Conference, it is too early, berause the meeting of the General Conference will not be held until all the conferences shall have voted, and the proper time for a conference a conference to express itself is in the reguar session. But, inasmuch as the basis of union is being adopted by the annual conferences, subject to such changes as may be agreed upon in the joint-session of the two General Conferences," there and, then, as everybody should know will be the opportunity for any conference to present any kind of deliverance it wishes to bring, through its duly elected delegation.

Whatever is said in Maryland, however, deserves immediate attention, and certain statements in this particular paper are evidently based on misapprehensions which should be at once removed. because they are subtly calculated to produce an impression that there is discord in places where there is absolute harmony on this great question. To these expressions I will here give brief answer:

1. As to the expressed fear that 300,000 United Brethren might outvote 185,000 Methodist Protestants. Even so, in ordinary General Conference the 28,000 in Maryland might outvote the 8,000 in Ohio; and the 8,000 in Ohio might outvote the 6,000 in Alabama. But while that is a possibility, nobody considers the matter as a practical contingency, simply because the conference units are lost in the larger consciousness of the denominational unit. If the two denominations unite, it must be just that kind of unity, and such is the kind of union which the Lord will give us in the final consummation. But, in the meantime, the two denominations are mutually protected in a way vastly better than a mere agreement. In the first place, our annual conferences are calling our own session, not the United Brethren General Conference. And when our General Conference meets it will do exactly what it wishes to do in all respects, and can surround itself with whatever safeguards it may think uecessary. And the same is true of the United Brethren General Conference, for let it be understood once for all, that the two General Conferences will meet separately at the first, and that every vital question is to have first a majority vote of each General Conference voting separately. That is understood by everybody, because all precedents of recent date have made it a tacit law.

2. As to the proclaimed haste with which this matter has been prosecuted. This reason is urged with apparent seriousness to explain presumed "defects" in the basis of union. The fact is that more actual time and more general discussion has been given to this proposed union than to any consummated union in the history of modern Christianity. If it has been less than a year since these negotiations began, let it be remembered that these negotiations were grafted upon the negotiations of many years. Furthermore, after our first meeting at Columbus, the name having been decided upon, the work of writing the syllabus was then divided into four units, with special sub-committees for each of them, whereupon an adjournment was taken until March 19, thus giving for the development and elaboration of these several units, not one week, but four months. Whether these gentlemen were satisfied with the time allotted to this task may be safely judged, I am sure, by their signatures to the various reports brought in at the March meeting. For this basis of union, let it be noticed bears the signature of every member of our own commission present at the first and second meetings. The report on vested interests was signed by J. E. Peterson and J. F. Howe; the educational unit was signed by Dr. T. H. Lewis and J. F. Howe; the report on benevolent interests was signed by Dr. C. D. Sinkinson and Colonel J. J. Barge; the report on doctrine and discipline was signed by Dr. M. L. Jennings and D. D. G. Helmick. All these are signatories to this basis of union, and not a single word of complaint was heard from any one of them to the effect that this long interval of more than one hundred days was too short a time for the completion of the work. As to the declaration of faith. In so far as that instrument reproduces the Dayton creed, it has borne the critical study and won the reverent praise of many years. In so far as it represents the sacrificial toil of Martin Luther Jennings it stands as a martyr's monument; and the sturdy and worshipful doctrines comprehended therein are those of real Protestanism, and something vastly more and vastly better than any mere negation. As to the constitution, that was fully discussed in my article entitled, "The Old Books in the New," as published in The Recorder and in the Protestant of very recent date, and I humbly ask attention to that article as an answer to the assertion that the constitution offers either book to the exclusion of the other. It is only necessary to say in this connection that every essential of that constitution, besides representing equally the fundamentals of each denomination, is firmly embedded in the administrative experience of three generations,, and, when elaborated on the lines laid out by the commission, will command the support of both denominations in all their united future.

3. As to the name. We paused and reconsidered that in the second meeting of the commission; reconsidered it with great patience and prayerful long-suffering, only to return to the name originally agreed upon. And the chief diffeulty met by those who object to the name, The United Protestant Church, is to fit upon a substitute which has any hope of winning either the mutual agreement of the two denominations or the favorable judgement of the Christian world. For let it be remembered yet again that Methodist Protestant objection to the word "Brethren" in the commission was just as strong as United Brethren objection to the word "Methodist." This difficulty is particularly illustrated in the name suggested in the Maryland paper: "The United Brethren Methodist Church!" I do not believe that even those who propose this name would be contented with it until the next meeting of the quarterly conference!

4. As to pausing and reconsidering. Let us see. Fourteen conferences have now voted on this basis of union, and every one of them, after the most thorough discussion, and after the most liberal use of the religious papers as a public arena on the great subject, has voted in favor of this basis of union, and by a vote unprecedented for its unanimity. Seven of the conferences stood absolutely unanimous for the proposition, while the opposition in the other conferences was so slight that it will melt away in the love feast of the union. These fourteen conferences, representing the east and the west, the north and the south, and comprising about one thousand ministers and delegates, and representing one-half the membership of our whole denomination is a sufficient indication of the fixed will of the Methodist Protestant Church. Therefore, I submit that it is time to reverse the exhortation to "pause and reconsider." It is not for the denomination "to pause and reconsider" at the suggestion of any one man, or any one constituent unit; but it is for the one constituent unit to pause and consider at the authoritative voice of the Methodist Protestant Church, as expressed in behalf of this union by the General Conference; and in behalf of this basis of union by the duly appointed commissioners, by the National Executive Committee, and, as we have every reason to believe, by the answering sentiment of the people. And yet, the whole denomination will pause and consider, at the called session of the General Conference, when every conference must have opportunity to present its own deliverance on this subject, and where every opinion must have voice, and every voice its due weight, in the final determination of this great question..

ATTENTION, METHODIST PROTESTANTS!

Within about two months the Annual Conference of the North Carolina District will be in session. Before that conference is to come a question of very great concern to both ministers and laymen. It is the duty and great privilege of each minister to be present and express his convictions on all questions coming before that body. Such duty is not imposed upon laymen and that great privilege is denied them. They may speak, but they must speak through their representatives. The representative in the annual conference can represent his constituents only as he knows their will. He may speak on all questions coming before the conference, but, unless he knows the will of his constituents, he speaks for no one but himself. If, therefore, the great body of laymen are to be heard on the important question which is to come before the next annual conference, they must make known their will to their representatives. That they have but a short time in which to do this is very manifest.

Laymen labor under another disadvantage. They must speak, if they speak at all, before there has been the fullest discussion, A minister need not make his decision until he has heard the discussion in the annual conference. If laymen are to speak, and speak intelligently, there should be as complete discussion as possible before the conference convenes. Of necessity this must be done very largely through the church papers.

At the last General Conference of our church, after a very heated discusion on the question whether the old Commission on Church Union should be continued, and after it was decided to continue it, the resolution of D. S. Stephens, D. D., came up for consideration. The purpose of this resolution was to secure, if possible, the speedy union of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ and the Methodist Protestant Church. The resolution contained what some believed to be an unfavorable criticism of the old Commission on Church Union. Hence it was vigorously opposed. Dr. Stephens himself offered a substitute from which the supposed criticism was eliminated. This substitute proposed that the basis for negotiations should be the Act of Union by the Tri-Church Council at Chicago. This did not meet the approval of the General Conference. The substitute was, therefore, laid on the table. F. T. Tagg, D. D., then offered the following: "We believe that a union of the Methodist Protestant Church and the Church of the United Brethren in Christ is both possible and practical, and therefore we authorize our Commission on Church Union to enter into negotiations with the Commission of the Church of United Brethren in Christ, just so soon as that Commission is fully authorized to enter upon such negotiations." This was unanimously adopted.

Thus authorzied, our Commission entered into negotiations with a like Commission of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ. The Joint Commission has formulated a Basis of Union. This has been published in the Methodist Recorder, the Methodist Protestant, and the Methodist Protestant Herald. It is now being presented to the various annual conferences for ratification. It will come before the next session of our own conference. What shall our conference do with it?

The answer to this question depends upon four considerations: 1. Whether the organic union of two or more denominations should in any case be sought; 2. Whether the Church of the United Brethren in Christ and the Methodist Protestant Church should form such a union; 3. Whether the procedure is in accordance with the law of our church; and 4. Whether the Basis of Union guarantees the perpetuity of all in our church which ought to perpetuated.

Upon the first of these considerations my conviction is firm. I believe in the organic union of Protestant Christianity. I go further. It is my belief that the whole militant church should be organically united. My reasons for so believing may be comprehended under the following heads: 1. Historical Reasons; 2. Practical Reasons; and 3. Scriptural Reasons.

Historical Reasons. These may be stated in the following propositions: 1. The Church was originally one organization. At its head stood the College of Apostles. There were no denominations. The united church stood in solid array against the heathen world, and it grew most rapidly. The spirit of schism took advantage of this rapid growth to create divisions. Into the church came converts and partial converts from both the Jews and the Gentiles. The partial converts from the Jews would confine Christianity within the narrow bounds of Judaism. They came near disrupting the church, but Paul withstood them and the integrity of the church was maintained. The other partial converts sought to liberalize Christianity until it would include much that was heathen. Against these stood the Apostle John. Again the integrity of the church was saved. There were, of course, parties within the church, but the church went into the second century a united church.

2. It follows, of course, that all the divisions of the church have occurred since the days of the Apostles. The first serious rupture came in the year 325, when the Nicene Council condemned Arianism. The next schism occurred, in 431, when the Council of Ephesus rejected Nestorianism. Twenty years after another division was occasioned by the condemnation of Monophysitism at the Council of Chalcedon. Still another occurred, in 680, when the Third Council of Constantinople refused to tolerate Monotheletism. All these schisms were in the eastern part of the church. In the west there were a few short-lived divisions growing out of differences of opinion on questions of discipline and polity. The great schism which divided the church into Greek and Roman came in the year 1054. The Protestant revolt began in 1517, when Luther posted his ninety-five Theses. Almost immediately Protestantism began to disintegrate. But time would fail me to tell of the many divisions.

3. All these divisions of the Christian Church have been occasioned by some error. Arianism denied the deity of Christ. Nestorianism taught that he had two personalities. Monophysitism denied that he had two natures. Monotheletism refused to believe that his will is theanthropic. The Greek Church denied that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son. Protestantism was occasioned by an error in the doctrine of justification. The ground of every division in Protestantism is to be found in some error, chiefly in doctrine or polity.

4. From the above proposition it follows that had no error crept into the Christian Church there would have been no divisions.

5. What divided the Christian Church into hostile denominations is still holding those denominations apart. No denomination can justify its independent existence without reference to what it regards as the errors of other denominations. There is no valid argument for the separate existence of two denominations which have the same Christian spirit, the same Christian thought, and the same Christian purpose.

6. When the errors which separated the Christian Church into denominations, and still holds those denominations apart, have been overcome, the denominations will naturally gravitate toward organic union. The affinity of kindred spirits will draw them together. Since the Great Revival of 1857 there has been a growing interdenominational fellowship. Until then the various denominations had viewed one another with feelings of mutual suspicion and distrust. But in this work of refreshing there was no room for sectarian strife. The denominations began to magnify the things which they held in common rather than the things which kept them apart. Since then there has been a growing unity of spirit, of thought, and of purpose. This is inevitably breaking down denominational barriers. Denominational loyalty is giving way to a larger and better loyalty, to the kingdom of God. "Church union is in the air." No one man started the movement and no group of men can stop it. Whoever makes Jesus Christ, the Redeemer and Savior of men, the central theme of his preaching and the model of his living, is promoting church union. As surely as Jesus is lifted up men will be drawn together.

Practical Reasons. These must be very briefly stated. 1. Church union would eliminate denominational competition. That such competition is an evil will hardly be questioned. It engenders denominational strife, divides Christian communities into hostile groups, wastes Christian energy, and paralyzes Christian effort. By crowding too many churches into certain communities, it makes it impossible for those communities to give adequate support to any of them. The minister's salary is of necessity small. It is unusual for such communities to commond the services of strong, well prepared ministers. In consequence, the spiritual life of the community suffers. The ministry too frequently emphasizes that which differentiates the denominations while the people hunger for the Bread of Life. It is almost impossible to have a good revival in a church divided into hostile factions. It is just as difficult to have a good community revival where there are too many rival churches. In such communities the various churches are so occupied with their own struggle for existence that they have not the time to consider nor the means for assisting the larger enterprises of the church.

2. Co-operation would follow competition. This would make possible the establishment of stronger religious centers in each community, the maintenance of a stronger ministry, and a united Christian community against the forces of evil in the community. These would secure to the community constant spiritual development. More than that, such a religious community would have something to contribute to the larger problems of the church. Co-operation would enable the church to build and equip better colleges and distribute them to better advantage. It would enable us to have religious instruction in the public schools, for it is not usually the non-religious man who objects to such teaching but the man in the other denomination. In fact there is little objection to the teaching of religion. It is to the teaching of sectarianism that objection is made. A united church would give great impetus to all moral reforms, to evangelism, and to foreign missions. The non-Christian world cannot long withstand a united Christendom.

To those whoo have merely the individual point of view these practical reasons will have but little force, for to such persons congregational factions are not very objectionable. What do they care for congregations? Church membership is nothing to them. They can be as good Christians out of the Church as they can in it. Those who have the social point of view feel the need of the congregation. But they wish it to be free from factions. As the social view broadens there is a growing demand for larger units of organization. The congregation cannot do all that it would like to do. Hence it forms an organic union with other congregations. But the circuit does not include the whole view. Circuits must be organized into larger units and these units into still larger. Does our view extend beyond the denomination? Then it calls for a more inclusive organization. Are we concerned chiefly for God's Kingdom? Then it must be seen that contending denominations sustain about the same relation to the Kingdom that striving factions do to the congregation.

Scriptural Reasons. In the New Testament the word church has two meanings. A local congregation is called a church. In this sense the word is often used in the plural to indicate two or more congregations. The word is also used to indicate the whole body of Christians. The record gives us but two occasions on which Christ used the word. In Matt. 16: 18, Christ speaks of organized Christianity. In Matt. 18: 17, he speaks of the organized congregation. Nowhere else in the Gospels does the word occur. The great word upon the lips of the master was the Kingdom. In the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles the word church is more frequently used. The Master discoursed concerning the Kingdom; the disciples, concerning the Church. The two are not exactly identical, but they are very closely related. They sustain to each other about the same relationship as do the mind and the body. A United Kingdom requires a United Church through which to operate. Let us observe then:

1. What Christ thinks of a divided kingdom. Though he is speaking of the kingdom of Satan, he states a general principle. "Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation; and every city or house divided against itself shall not stand." This principle is applicable to Methodist Protestantism, to Protestantism, and to Christianity. It is as applicable to the Church of Christ as it is to the Kingdom of God.

2. What Paul thinks of a divided church. He entreats the Roman Christian to mark and avoid those who create divisions (Romans 16: 17). He beseeches the Corinthian Christians to avoid divisions and to cultivate unity (I. Cor. 1: 10). It may be said that Paul is not here speaking of denominational divisions. This is very true, for such did not then exist. But who can read I. Cor. 3: 1-8 and doubt what Paul would have said, had he been present, when Protestantism began to break up into denominations, some following Luther, others Zwingli, and still others Calvin?

3. What is involved in the prayer of Jesus for Christian unity. "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word; that they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me" (John 17: 20, 21). We need not enter into a discussion of the mysteries of the Trinity. It is enough to say that while the Father and the Son are two distinct persons, they are one in thought, one in emotion, and one in purpose. They think alike, feel alike, and act alike. But there is a deeper unity. They are one in substance. Neither tritheism nor unitarianism expresses the truth concerning the Godhead. There are, in the Godhead, three Persons so united that there is but one God. In other words, the Godhead is an organic unity. Such a unity is involved, I believe, in the prayer of Jesus for his church. Such a unity, he intimates, would hasten the coming of the Kingdom.

4. What is involved in Paul's great analogy. This may be found by reference to the following scriptures: Romans 12: 4, I. Corinthians 12: 12-27. On this analogy and the application of it to present conditions, I quote Amos. R. Wells:

"Organic union, then, is not identity. Some bodies of Christians are full of fire and fervor, but no one wants to make the body all heart. Other denominations are more cautious, deliberate and thoughtful; but no one wants to make the body all brain. Still other denominations excel in preaching, and others in missions, and others in charities, and others in the reception and adaptation of new ideas; but no one wants a body that is all mouth, or feet, or hands, or ears. The very conception of organic union is an implication of diversity of organs.

"But—and this is the truth to be emphasized—the organs must be united, or there is no organism.

"Were Paul speaking now, he might say, "Ye Christians, how have ye dissected the body of Christ? Are the Methodists the heart? To what purpose does the heart beat apart from the body? Are the Presbyterians the brains? To what purpose do the brains think in a heap by themselves? Are the Baptists the missionary feet; the Episcopalians the ministering hands, the Congregationalists the eloquent tongue? But I see the feet in one pile, and the hands elsewhere, and the tongue by itself. Disjecta membra, and not the glorious body of Christ! Why, not even His robe was torn apart, nor a bone of Him broken, and would ye dissect Him utterly?"

"The ideal of Christian fellowship, of church federation, that many entertain is a bundle of sticks tied together. The sticks can be broken separately—for they remember the old story—but the bundle cannot be broken. Brothers, when sticks are tied into fagots, it is not that they be broken, but that they be burned. What an ignoble symbol for the church of the living God—a bundle of dead sticks!

"Rather, the body, the BODY! One presiding intelligence, directing every part to vigorous deeds. One weaving sympathy, that all may sorrow and rejoice together, and move in harmony. One well poised strength, all the body fitly framed and knit together through that which every joint supplieth. And one Spirit of the living God at home in every organ, in one no more than another and no less than another, rejoicing in the instrument of his will."

Why, then, do I believe in the organic union of Christendom? Because it would be the climax of our splendid church history. Because it would place the ability of each at the disposal of all, and the power of all at the disposal of each. Because it would combine the utmost flexibility with the utmost strength, perfect freedom with perfect stability. Because it would inspire every Christian with the momentum of the Church Universal, and confound the workers of iniquity. Because it would be the maximum of utilization with the minimum of machinery, the greatest results with the least waste. Because it would transform religious drudgery into a religious zest, and the aching strain of a dwarf into the easy swing of a giant. Because it would put the Church of Christ in harmony with the organic union of the Triune God. Because it is the will of Christ, who desires all good for his churches, nothing but good for them—because it is his loving will that they all may be one.

The second of the four considerations mentioned at the beginning of this paper must, because of limited space, be very briefly discussed. I believe that the Methodist Protestant Church and the Church of the United Brethren in Christ should form an organic union. Some of my reasons for so believing are:

1. The principle of organic union is, in itself, right. My reasons for believing this are stated above.

2. It would follow that, without some very good reason for so doing, Christian denominations should not remain apart.

3. There is no good reason for these two denominations continuing their separate existence. But there are several specific reasons why they should unite.

4. They are already one in spirit, in thought, and in purpose. In spirit they are equally Mehodistic, in thought they are equally Arminian, and in purpose they are equally Christian.

5. In polity they are in substantial agreement. There is no fundamental principle of government recognized by the one that is not recognized also by the other. In each the doctrine of mutual rights is sacred, the right of appeal is inviolate, the itinerant system is practiced, and the unit of power is the individual. In each, the congregation, the quarterly conference, the annual conference, and the general conference are organized on the same general plan and perform the same functions. The Church of the United Brethren is, in some respects, more democratic than the Methodist Protestant Church. In that church overtures for changes in the articles of faith and in the constitution are submitted to the local churches. In our church they are submitted to the annual conferences. In that church delegates to the general conference are elected by the people, though they are nominated in the annual conferences, the ministerial by the ministers and the lay by the laymen. In our church they are elected by an electoral college. Though that church is more democratic than ours, it has a stronger central power. Of this our church has long felt the need. Each denomination recognizes but one order of ministry. Their bishops are, therefore, merely officers, elected like the President of our General Conference by each general conference for a term of four years. Their presiding elders are elected by the annual conferences and perform about the same duties as the President of our Annual Conference.

6. To a very large extent the two churches occupy contiguous territory. A union of the two would enable the united church to hold its members much more securely than either can do now. In moving from one community to another members are often lost because there is no church of our denomination in that community. By a union of the two churches such loss would be greatly diminished.

7. We need the inspiration of larger numbers and greater enterprises. Our people are in many places discouraged. They see but little future for our church. Large numbers of those converted at our altars either go to other churches or join no church at all. Either because we have lacked courage or the means, we have not had convenient educational advantages for our people. Because of this, large numbers of our brightest and best young people go to other denominations. To a certain extent these things are felt in all parts of our church. In the western part of it they are felt very keenly. There they are facing a crisis. They must either go forward into union, disintegrate, or die. Their disintegration or death would have a disastrous effect upon the church in the east. A satisfactory union of the two denominations would give to all concerned a great inspiration.

8. The effect of such union upon other small churches would be most wholesome. Other denominations are watching these negotiations, and if the union is succesfully formed, some of them may reasonably be expected to enter it.

THE CHURCH UNION.

I thought I would not write anything on it, but will ask a question or two, and then say a little.

How many United Brethren congregations are there in N. C.? Will we be any better equipped as Christians to do the work assigned by our Father? Was the widow's mite accepted or those that gave of their abundance? Do not some small things confound the wise? Can you explain how, not the process, a grain of corn sprouts? How has the M. P. Church ever managed to exist if it is not based upon the Bible?

If this talk of union does not put her out, what union next will we discuss? Why send men into mission fields to build new M. P. churches at a sacrifice of time and means if we have done but little good for nearly 100 years? We talked of union with the Christian church, M. E.'s, and now with the United Brethen: Has it not caused harm, brethren, to think less instead of more of each other? Has it not made an almost world-wide impression that we are either dissatisfied or wanting gain or popularity? While we were negotiating with the M. E. Church, we were talking of our church in Reidsville, I know it hurt us, and retarded our work and is still hurting. An M. E. minister told my people, I mean my wife and daughter, we would soon be united. What do you suppose he told other people? Right now people are staying out of our church to see if we do form a union, and if we do, or they do, our loss will be many. I have heard a slang phrase, "there are more ways to choke a dog to death than on hot butter." If this matter of union is talked a while longer, and with a few more denominations, my candid opinion, it may not be worth much, but we will have to join some other and not unite. It actually keeps some of us uneasy for fear we will wake up some morning, and will have to ask some body else who we are anyway. St. Luke 12: 31. I quote thirty-second: "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." My concern is: are we in the flock? I do not understand this to mean any particular denomination, but His flock. I prefer to be one of the little "flock" where I may know and be known, rather than be in a large "flock" where the finger can be pointed at me by one of the large flock and say, "You came from scrub stock; you have lost your identity; name, please sir, what is your name?" Some say not much in a name; take Christ out of the Bible, what have you left?

HOW CHURCH UNITY WILL COME.

Organic unity on the basis of denominational compromise is unthinkable. The whole of Christendom is wiser, and represents more fully the sum of truth, than is possible to any single denomination. All denominations, however small, have some demonstrable right for their existence. No one denomination, however historic or powerful, has the right to ask a lesser denomination to surrender or submerge its convictions. The working hypothesis for the unity of Christendom will finally be developed by the compelling power of great truths which must appeal to the universal vision of the Christian world. As has been well said, the final unity will come "not through compromise, but from comprehension." George P. Mains, D. D., in The Constructive Quarterly.

CASH AND CHARACTER.

A reliable magazine is responsible for the statement that New York City expends annually more than thirty millions of dollars, and Chicago twenty-two millions, for the education of their boys and girls. The rural districts of the United States expend seventy-five millions of dollars per year for public education.

When such a tremendous sum of money is lavishly thrown by a nation into the lap of childhood for the child's intellectual development, the parent should stop, and prayerfully consider how best he might utilize the apportionment that has been assigned to his or her child. Our nation is acting nobly and wisely in seeking to raise the standard of citizenship. It is doing a work that is commendable in God's sight in making it possible for the poor to educate their sons and daughters. While this enormous sum is being yearly expended for the intellectual development of childhood, the parents of the nation should by no means feel immune from personal responsibility with reference to the training of their sons and daughters. All the gold and silver of this rich and productive nation—the tremendous and enormous wealth of the whole world might be thrown into the lap of one boy, with the express purpose of educating him, but to rely on silver and gold alone would reveal a sad failure, and a probable curse.

However useful and valuable our money may be, it is only a means to an end, and cannot by any means be substituted for character development in the home. Having noted the worth of the child in the estimation of the parenthood of our great country, let us consider briefly a few things, which, if rightly impressed upon the child's heart and life, together with the monetary assistance given him or her by the government, will develop a citizenship of the highest type, a nobler manhood, and a purer and more virtuous womanhood.

The peace and happiness within a nation depend upon the obedience of its citizens. When they are obedient to the will of comon law, strife, theft, murder and all kinds of lawlessness are unknown. Where obedience is the watchword, peace and power reign supreme. Obedience is one of the corner stones of a home. Without it, home is not home, but a vague imagery of what might be a foretaste of heaven on earth. Obedience, then, playing such a conspicuous part in the formation of a real home, should be woven into the child's life even before the infant lips can lisp the name of mother. Industry is another very important element to weave into a child's life. The world is overcrowded with shifts and deadbeats today, because they were not taught to work from early childhood. The lack of early training along industrial lines is evidenced by idle boys who seem to have absolutely nothing to do, but loaf and whittle away the time that God has entrusted to them for an holy purpose. Many a prison cell is occupied today by sons who were permitted to grow up as weeds of the field. They grew to manhood without any special care or special training, and consequently at maturity they discovered themselves unequipped, and unqualified for the serious problems and battles of life. Not having force of character sufficient to offset their lack of early parental care, they yielded at the weakest point, under the pressure of evil desire and unrestrained ambitions, until they were curbed by the law of the land, and branded by society as wreckage and driftwood.

The formation of a princely character should be the lofty aim of our American youth. It should be the happy task of every father and every mother, to spare no pains in lending every possible influence to make Christian character first and foremost in the lives of their sons and daughters. During this past age, a great many people's chief concern is the dollar; while the moulding of character has but very little, if any, place in their daily program. Many children who are sent to Sunday school until they are grown, surprise their parents by failure in the world. No parent should ever be surprised at his or her child's failure, when he knows that he never manifested enough interest in the child to lead him to Sunday school.

The nation may appropriate thousands for the individual boy; the Sunday schoool may lend every good influence possible, but if the deep underlying principles upon which true character is based, are neglected in the early home training, the child is a failure. The prayers and the tears and the earnest pleadings of parents and friends, apparently harden his heart, and hurry him toward eternal shame and despair.

In conclusion don't trust in the government's cash alone to make successes of your boys and girls, nor to the day school, nor even to the Sunday school. Seek the guiding hand of God, and establish in your home a little heaven on earth, where love, obedience, and every Christian grace are sought as hid treasures. Thus will the standard of citizenship be elevated, the home purified, the church raised to greater power, and God's name honored and glorified.

Sept. 19, 1913.

RESTLESSNESS.

We often are reminded of the restlessness of our age, and there have been many attempts to analyze it and find its cause and cure. At the outset we must meet the theorist who would persuade himself and others that restlessness is a good sign, and prevents stagnation and ease-seeking, and is hopeful of improvement and achievement. Such a theorist flies in the face of common judgment, even the experience of men. Activity, with plan and purpose, is hopeful and good in its effect. But activity without purpose accomplishes nothing, and this is restlessness. When we find a boy who has a plan, a purpose, and is active to execute the one in order to accomplish the other, he breeds admiration and confidence and gives promise for future manhood. But when we find a boy who has neither plan nor purpose, yet cannot sit still, but is ever on the go, we rightly conclude that he has troubles with his nerves and with his mind. Soul and body are unhealthy, and he breeds either pity or contempt. He is restless. The other boy is active. Restlessness, save under artificial restraint, is no omen of good.

When, then, we are convinced that restlessness is evil, we do the more earnestly inquire into its cause and cure. There are many to-day making such inquiry, and there are just as many ready to give the answer. One would say that restlessness is due to selfishness. One's mind is so centered upon self that it becomes weary with the narrow vision; and selfishness violates a law of our being, and so restlessness is the result. Doubtless this is the occasion of restlessness in some cases. It is very likely to be the cause in those cases where the person has abundance of this world's goods. But there are cases of restlessness which cannot be attributed to selfishness, although there is much that is due to this important disposition. Another would say that ambition and self-esteem are causing our restlessness. We want everything, and we are confident that we can get everything; and so pressed on by one and led by the other, we take no time to rest. There is some truth in this. It exactly fits some cases, but not all. There are still souls who could be content with little, and who doubt their ability to get that little, and still they are restless. Still another would say that restlessness is due to pampering. Every whim to-day is gratified. Indulgence is cultivated, and discontent is the result. This is true in many cases, but not in all. We find the poor as restless as the rich, and there are many laborers who are never indulged who are still very restless.

A medical man would likely say that our restlessness is due to the condition of our nerves. It is a physical problem. We eat badly, we sleep badly, and we take pleasure badly. We violate the laws of our physical being, and the nerves and blood are in bad condition, and we cannot rest. This, indeed, comes near the truth. The rush of the age, its intense enterprise, is nerve-wrecking. But there are those who do not know that they have nerves who are nevertheless very restless. A sage might say that much of the restlessness was due to looking too much on the dark side of things. The light departs from life, and we are driven about by imaginary fears and dangers. This, too, has much in it; but it does not explain all. There may be other causes which still others may mention.

After all, are any of these things mentioned true cases? Are they not each an occasion of restlessness in particular cases? What is the real and general cause lying back of all these occasions? If we find this, then we may find a cure for it. Where does man find rest? What satisfies him and gives him contentment? Not this world nor anything in it. And does there not come a suggestion for our age from this very fact? We will all acknowledge that with most of us we are seeking our rest and contentment in the things of this world, and they never can give it, and we never can find it. This is an old trouble which presents itself in all ages, though in some due to an unsatisfied and discontented soul. Nothing can remove this and give contentment and rest but the presence of God what different form. Our restlessness is himself. Faith in him is the cure for restlessness in all people and in all ages. He comes to us, recognizing our malady and offering us his cure. Here it is, as compounded forty centuries ago: "Fret not thyself to do evil. Trust in the Lord. Commit thy way unto the Lord. Delight thyself in him. Rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him, and thou shalt dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed. He will bring thy way to pass, and he will give the desire of thine heart. He will show forth thy righteousness as the light, and thy judgment as the noonday. Rest in the Lord and wait patiently for him." Here it is again, twenty centuries later: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you; for my yooke is easy, and my burden is light. Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls."—The Presbyterian.

—Mr. James Irwin, Southern representative of a Canton, Ohio, firm manufacturing sheet metal goods, was here for the week-end. He is an old Adrian boy, and has a special liking for Mr. Gurley Coble, also an old Adrian boy. We were pleased to see both in our office Monday, for we, too, are an "old Adrian boy."

—Already they are talking about candidates for 1916. We wonder whether it would increase or diminish the talk about candidates if national elections came every six years instead of every four.

—Next Sunday Grace Sunday School, Greensboro, is to have a RALLY DAY. Bro. Hunter, superintendent, wants to see, not only every scholar present, but also every member of the home department, and, not satisfied with that, he wants all on the cradle roll to come, even if they have to bring their cries with them. There will be special exercises at 10:30 A. M. COME.

—Greensboro's Sunday school attendance has been climbing up the last year. It verges on to 200 now. Burlington and High Point and Thomasville may have to do some extra work to keep ahead.

—We are glad to hear that our people in Asheville are proceeding with their church-building enterprise. They will need help, of course, but that will not be difficult to get when they have done their best.

—Contrary to popular belief, forest fires seldom travel more than 2 or 3 miles an hour. Even in extreme cases it is questionable whether they burn at a rate of more than 6 to 10 miles an hour.

—The trials of M. I. Diggs and F. D. Caminetti at San Francisco, under the federal "white slave" act, resulted in the conviction of both men. This is a very notorious case. Diggs was formerly state architect of California, and Caminetti's father is one of the leading Democratic politicians of that state, who was recently placed at the head of the immigration service by President Wilson.

FROM OUR PASTORS

SILER CITY.

Our special meeting began here on the second Sunday in September and continued including Thursday night. The weather was very unfavorable, and yet when it was not raining too much, the congregations were good, sometimes large. The meeting was pronounced by all to be a most helpful one. For general inspiration the meeting is rarely excelled. Bro. Dixon was my much appreciated help; his sermons met the approval of all. The church is undergoing a new painting; when done we will have a beautiful house of worship. There has been in the last year and a half or so perhaps between eight and nine hundred dollars of improvement on the church. We now have a church that should be a joy to our conference, and a better membership to its size I am sure cannot be found. Our church at Siler City, to my mind occupies a very important position in our conference, being located in the enterprising town of Siler City, and surrounded by M. P. churches whose members from time to time move to town. The church should have the fostering care of the conference. What I have said of our church at Siler City is largely true of Hope, centrally located in the young and thriving town of Bonlee. The special meeting at Siler City completes my campaign of six special meetings on this work. The meetings have all been good. The cause of our beloved Zion is no longer at a discount in this part of the Lord's moral vineyard. J. H. Bowman.

RICHLAND CIRCUIT.

Several things have been happening since I wrote.

Cedar Falls. The meeting was not what it ought to have been. There was some revival and three additions. A new carpet had been put on the floor, which adds greatly to the appearance and comfort.

Brower's Chapel. The same may be said of the meeting there; two additions. A new roof had been put on the building.

Flag Springs. Storms interfered, but good was done and four names received.

New Zion. This is our new church. Rain interfered almost the whole time;—still there was good done, and three additions.

The debt was paid off and the building will be dedicated in the near future.

This young church has paid pastor's and all the general interests claims in full, besides paying balance due on building.

When the spirit of progress and improvement gets hold of a church they want to keep at it. All these churches have other improvements planned. More about that later.

Has the warm weather affected the M. P. Herald? We do not get it now until Saturday; we had rather get it earlier.

C. H. Whitaker.

[No, but the breaking down of an electric motor put us back last week.—Editor.]

REIDSVILLE.

The fourth quarterly conference will be at Reidsville on Friday before the first Sunday in October. Preaching at 11 A. M.; conference at 3:30 P. M. This is a very important conference. Several things to come up. You had better be there. I am glad to say my wife is some better. I have improved right much, but it takes quite a while to get rid of the malaria.

Fraternally, C. E. M. Raper.

LITTLETON CIRCUIT.

My special meeting began the second Sunday in August at Hawkins Chapel with Rev. Geo. L. Curry as pulpit help. The church was greatly revived and many persons professed conversion. The second meeting began the third Sunday in August at Weavers Chapel, with Bro. Curry as pulpit help. This meeting, like the other, was good. Several persons were converted in this meeting and the church was very much awakened. Bro. Curry preached the plain gospel in its simplicity.

The third meeting began at Corinth on the first Sunday in September, with Bro. L. W. Gerringer as pulpit help. This was also a good meeting. The results were good. Bro. Gerringer did good work while with us at this place.

My fourth meeting began the second Sunday in September at Vaughn, with Rev. T. J. Ogburn as pulpit help, and Bro. T. O. Pender to lead the singing. This, like the other meeting, was good. The preaching and singing were such as convinced men of their sins.

I have one more meeting to hold which will begin at Littleton on the third Sunday in October, with Rev. J. D. Williams as pulpit help.

The charge seems to be doing nicely in almost every way. At present there is a net increase in membership of eighty-five. There may be more to follow. With but a few exceptions, the converts on this charge have joined the Methodist Protestant Church. Chas. J. Edwards, Pastor.

—Rev. W. R. Lowdermilk was here Monday to consult Dr. Banner regarding his throat trouble. The doctor advised him to refrain from talking and encouraged him to hope for improvement through this means.

FROM LOCAL REPORTERS

PINE GROVE, OAK RIDGE CIRCUIT.

Our special meeting at Pine Grove will begin the third Sunday in October. Rev. D. A. Braswell will be our help. We are all looking for a good meeting.

Prof. B. F. Phipps closed his singing at this place with a large congregation, and some nice singing.

Our third quarterly conference will be held at Kernersville next Saturday, September 27.

Rev. Gordon Mines was to fill the pulpit last Sunday at this place for pastor Lowdermilk, but owing to the rainy weather there wasn't any preaching.

We are sorry that Bro. Lowdermilk is not able to preach to us on acount of throat trouble, but we hope and pray that soon he will be well again.

Greetings to the Herald.

Mary Cooke.

MT. CARMEL, GRANVILLE CIFCUIT.

Our special meeting began Sunday morning, Sept. 14, and closed the following Thursday afternoon with wonderful results, there being about fifteen professions and reclamations. Six joined this church as a result of this meeting. On Sunday morning Mrs. Clarence Finch was taken into this church by letter from the M. E. Church, South, on Main st., Henderson. Mrs. Finch has been attending our services and assisting since her marriage, but now we can more greatly appreciate her. During these services Bro. Bethea preached ten sermons which he said he worked up while on his vacation in Florida last winter. Some one suggested that he go back to Florida this winter, could he do this again. Truly they were, taking them consecutively, I believe, ten of the most wonderful sermons I ever heard him preach. There was not an "off" one in the entire number, and I think he felt paid for the effort by the encouraging results.

SHILOH, YADKIN COLLEGE CIRCUIT.

In spite of the downpour of rain there was a goodly number out to hear Bro. Powell preach for us on yesterday.

Our revival meeting, which was held in August, was indeed a good meeting. About thirty conversions and reclamations, and the church greatly revived. Twenty-three joined the church. Much credit is due Bro. Ashburn for his good sermons and the gospel truths he left with us will linger in our hearts.

We trust that our church will be well represented at the quarterly meeting on this circuit, which is to be held at Mt. Carmel church on Saturday before the second Sunday in October. The president will be there and preach at eleven o'clock.

Think! it is not long until Conference. It will be held in November, and we know there is much work to be done between now and then.

Our Sunday school is doing some good work, but could be better if more attended regularly.

The third Sunday morning in September at ten o'clock at the home of the bride, Mr. Harvey Leonard and Miss Annie Hill became man and wife in the presence of a few friends. The ceremony was performed by their pastor, Rev. H. L. Powell. Many congratulations.

CID, UWHARRHIE CIRCUIT.

There will be prayer meeting at Cid church the fourth Sunday at 2:30 o'clock by Bro. Atlas Ridge and others. Hope to have a large attendance. The writer had the pleasure of attending the special meeting at Piney Grove this week and enjoying an old-time revival. There was quite a number of conversions and several reclaimed. It was a golden opportunity that I had of being in the several homes of my old friends once more and to enjoy their personal hospitalities as well as the spiritual blesings. And I found family altars which should be in every Christian home. But tongue cannot express the joy it was to me. May these good people reap their reward on that celestial shore where there will be no parting. I must hasten on or Peter Slewfoot will be criticizing these remarks. Bro. Powell from Lexington was Bro. Trogdon's pulpit help. He surely did preach some soul-stirring sermons and it took effect in the work that was done. But still, as always, there were some hard-hearted that would not yield. May his words still ring on and be remembered.

There are seven of Mr. Benny Nance's family, near Piney Grove, down with typhoid fever. May he have the prayers of the Christian persons that see this for their recovery. We had the pleasure of having Bro. Trogdon and Bro. Atlas Ridge, wife and daughter, Myrtle, in our home the 20th and we sang some beautiful songs with consolidated prayers for having the privilege of having such a meeting one time more. We did enjoy it so much and may we live to enjoy many more, God being our helper. For Bro. Trogdon without a doubt has been the means of saving many souls and his influence has been the source of Christian people's doing more for the Master's work; for when you have a good shepherd the sheep are liable to follow. And now in the close I will say we people want our president to send Bro. Trogdon back to this work, or whoever it lies in the power of to do so, as this circuit has had some fall backs and I feel that Bro. Trogdon has been the means of building it up. And he is the one we want to remain to get the ox farther out of the ditch. Now some one may say I am saying too much praise in Bro. Trogdon's behalf; but I am one of those that believe in and through the spirit to give people praise while they are living, for after we are dead these long obituaries can not be read nor flowers seen. Bro. Atlas Ridge, as well as some others, is taking on new spiritual life every day. We were pleased to see Mr. Pearl Cameron, of St. Louis, Mo., attend the Piney Grove meeting.

With best wishes to Herald and its many readers, yours for Christ. L.

PINEY GROVE, UWHARRHIE CIRCUIT.

Our special meeting closed Thursday evening and a glorious time we have had this week, if it did rain the most of the time, for the most of us had rather be sprinkled than dipped. There were many souls saved, and a great revival throughout the church. There were ten accessions to the church, with more to follow. We can never forget Bro. Powell, who came Monday and labored so faithfully, preaching the word of God so plainly even a little child could understand. And they came flocking to the altar, seeking the Savior while he could be found, in the days of their youth. Jesus said, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." We feel grateful to those of our sister churches who came, labored, and prayed so faithfully with us during the meeting.

We feel so thankful in our hearts toward God for bringing our good pastor through so many dangerous periods of life and giving him strength to be with us all through the week. He has such a Christ-like way, that his very presence seems to lighten the burden of those whom he comes in company with.

We feel a pain at heart when we think of those that could sit under the sound of such gospel as we heard this week and not decide to be followers of Christ. I pray the seed sown this week may be as the bread cast upon the waters, gathered many days hence.

I would love to read a piece from all the different churches every week. I would that the Herald could be read in every home. I am always so hungry for mail day to come that brings the paper. Hope many more will become interested and spread the good news abroad.

Best wishes to the Herald and its many readers. Mrs. C. H. Hill.

UNION HILL, FORSYTH CIRCUIT.

Our pastor, Rev. Mr. Austin, began the protracted meeting at this place last second Sunday, Rev. G. E. Hunt being pulpit help, there being some good preaching by both . Mr. Austin and Mr. Hunt. We would like to have you come again, Mr. Hunt. There were several professions, but not any united with the church. The attendance was not very good on acount of the bad weather.

Mr. Austin says he has $104.00 subscribed for the new church at this place.

Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Needham spent a part of last week with Mrs. Needham's parents, Mr. and Mrs. T. H. Stimpson.

We were glad to have Misses Leota Hunter and Myrtle Scott with us during the protracted meeting.

HICKORY GROVE, SILER CITY CIRCUIT.

Bro. Bowman was a very, very welcome visitor in the home of the writer last night. We are always glad indeed to have him with us. He gave us a very helpful sermon today. His theme of discourse was "Do We Know That We Are Christians?" He brought out some good points that should tend to set us to thinking. There was a nice little crowd present to hear Bro. Bowman, despite the fact of a revival meeting at Rocky River church, a mile or so from Hickory Grove, and that the roads were so muddy and it was still raining.

We were glad to have Miss Lelia Lemmons, who has been visiting her sister in Burlington for some time, with us again today. We are also glad to note that Mrs. Cadd Allred, who was kicked by a mule some time ago, is able to get about without her crutch again. Old Mrs. Beard, better known as "Granny" Beard, also deserves mention in these columns. She is a very old lady, about eighty years old, but she is one of our most faithful members. She came to church about every day during the revival meeting, and was present this morning, as rainy and bad as the weather was. She lives a good little step from the church and always walks. She is almost as supple as a school girl.

And last but not least, I am going to tell you about the good men of our church. They have built a very pretty recess pulpit to the church, which has improved the appearance of the church beyond our greatest expectations. We thank you, brothers, one and all. They intend to paint and carpet the church in the near future. We have not had Sunday school for a few Sundays because of the church's being under repair, but it will start again next Sunday at 10 o'clock. It was announced that we would have prayer meeting again next Sunday, but the announcement may be recalled because of the meeting at Rocky River. We will have communion service at this church next third Sunday. I will close with love to you all.

HICKORY GROVE, GUILFORD CIRCUIT.

We are not dead, still living and are looking forward to the time of our special meeting, which will be the fourth Sunday in September. We hope to see many souls saved and the church revived. We are looking for Bro. Lowdermilk as our pulpit help. On Saturday the thirteenth we had a Sunday school picnic, which we all enjoyed. Our pastor, Rev. T. F. McCulloch, read a portion of Scripture, followed by prayer. Then A. L. Jones made a very interesting talk on attending Sunday school and the duty of parents in regard to their children, which was enjoyed by all; followed by our pastor on Christ Feeding the Multitudes on Five Loaves and two Fishes, which was grand. Others made some brief remarks on the orphanage and its needs and a collection was taken up and we received $6.00 for the indebtedness. Then we all retired to the grove, where we found a fifty-foot table all laden with everything that was well pleasing to a hungry man's eye. Then we partook to our own heart's content. The remainder of the day was spent in rejoicing together. Our Sunday school we think is doing nicely. May the Lord bless all Sunday schools.

Yours for the work. E. S. Jones.

BURLINGTON.

Our atendance in Sunday school Sunday was 172. Many of our people were attending meeting out of town, consequently the attendance at Sunday school was below the average.

Our pastor was called to Fairview M. P. church, near Gibsonville, last week, to assist in a revival meeting at that church. In his absence Sunday morning, Rev. P. H. Fleming, D. D., superintendent of the Burlington graded schools, filled the pulpit, preaching a splendid, old-time gospel sermon, which was very much enjoyed. There was no service Sunday night.

Our special meeting has been postponed indefinitely.

Miss Margaret Davis, who spent about six weeks visiting relatives and friends in Pennsylvania, returned last week, and delighted the Junior Philathea class, of which she is teacher, by her presence in our Sunday school Sunday morning.

The members of the Junior Philathea class are preparing to have a "Hot Weather Brigade" next Saturday night for the benefit of their class. We did not learn the nature of the project, but we do know that the young girls who compose the class always make a success of whatever they undertake, and those who attend may expect a delightful time.

Our church choir, under the leadership of Bro. G. L. Amick, meets every Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock for practice. There is much comment on the marked improvement of the singing.

Miss Nellie Davis, teacher of the Junior Baraca class in our Sunday school, is teaching in the Haw River graded school this year. C. B. W.

MT. PLEASANT, MT. PLEASANT CIRCUIT.

Ten persons joined the church at the close of the special meeting in August. Some others, I think, will join. Bro. Troxler has been preaching some searching sermons recently, his last subject was, What Think Ye of Christ? He said it could be told in the home life, in the social life, and in the church life.

Mrs. Elisabeth Clapp was buried Sept. 16. I believe she was a Christian woman. While she lived in this neighborhood she was faithful in Sunday school and church services.

Frank Suits has gone to Kansas City to study veterinary surgery. Miss Dovie Mendenhall and Miss Mary Griffin are the teachers next term. I sometimes wonder how large Bro. W. F. Kennett's Postal Cards are and if "Uncle Sam" made them. I can't write as much on mine. A.

PRAYER ASKED.

I have been a reader of the Herald for a whileand have never written one word any way. I have been much strengthened by the many good letters from other pens. Now as I have received so much, I will ask a little more. I am now a subject for the hospital. My doctor has done all he can. That dreaded trouble, indigestion. I can't make up my mind to go. I want every one of our good brothers ond sisters who know me and all that will that don't know me, to remember me in prayer, so I may decide right as to what is for the best. I am needed in my home. I think I am needed in my church. I live near Laurel Hill on Lincoln Circuit. Our home has been the preacher's home and also the president's. Our preacher has been faithful this year. He had Bro. Loy from Gastonia for his help this year. Bro. Loy left a warm place in every heart that heard him. His sermons left a lasting impression on me.

We have no reporter from our church. Now, if this escapes the waste-basket I may write again. Mrs. B. E. Sain.

SILER CITY.

Our revival services began second Sunday morning and closed Thursday night. Rev. A. G. Dixon came Saturday and preached twice on Sunday and twice every day till the meeting closed. We certainly enjoyed having Bro. Dixon with us. Every sermon he preached was fine. His coming among us has done us all good. The weather, after Sunday, was rainy, but the congregation kept up well. Sunday A. M. and night we had all that could be seated and a few standing up. Come again, Bro. Dixon, you will always find a hearty welcome at Siler City. G. E. M.

FURNISHING THE CHILDREN'S HOME.

Since my last report, the following donations have been received to pay for furnishing the Children's Home.

Cleveland Ct., $22.00; Fairview Church, Concord, $4.00; Salem Church, Manakin, Md., $1.25; Hickory Grove S. S., $6.00; Concord S. S., $3.75; Baraca-Philathea class, Julian, N. C., $25.00 part payment on furnishing the office; Baraca-Philathea class, Shiloh Church, Randolph Ct., Julian, N. C., $12.50, part payment on furnishing the dining room; W. J. Armfield, High Point, N. C., $100.00 for furnishing infirmary.

Very truly, J. R. Reitzel, Sec.-Treas.

Dear Editor: I am a boy aged thirteen at the Children's Home near High Point, N. C. I have been living at Denton, N. C., at the Children's Home and the people have been very kind to give the orphan children a home. There was a great difference between our home at Denton and the Home we have now; the people at Denton were very kind to us and we appreciate what they did for us, but now we have a nice Home near High Point and I like it fine. We have thirty-eight acres of land here; we have one horse and one cow, the horse Mr. Benbow gave us, and the cow we had at Denton. We will have another cow very soon. Mr. Garrett, the superintendent, will have it sent from Alamance County; he owns it and has it down at his father's. We will have to have a good team of horses next spring. We work hard through the week trying to get the grounds cleaned off, and on Sunday we all go to Sunday school and preaching.

Mr. Dixon is our pastor; last Sunday he was not there, and Mrs. Dixon took his place. High Point is two miles west of here. We walk sometimes and ride sometimes and we go different ways. Sometimes people come out in their automobiles and take us. I am in the Junior Baraca class in Sunday school. Well, we have a good Home and expect to make it nicer very soon.

I will say goodbye.

DIED.

David Fogleman, one of the oldest and most faithful members at New Salem, was suddenly called from labor to reward early last Monday morning, Sept. 15th.

Bro. Fogleman ate a hearty breakfast as usual and started to lead a calf over to a neighbor's house. He went only a short distance from his home when he, it is thought, felt coming on him a heart trouble which he was subject to, stopped and tied the calf to a little pine bush, and lay down beside the road, where he was found a few minutes later by his son, and was already dead. Apparently he had made no struggle with death as he was lying naturally as though he had suddenly fallen asleep.

Bro. Fogleman was 72 years, 11 months and 17 days old. He professed faith in Christ when a young man and joined the Lutheran Church in Guilford or Alamance County. Later in life he moved to Randolph and moved his membership to Mt. Lebanon M. P. Church, and when new Salem Church was organized he had his membership transferred to New Salem, where he remained a faithful member until God said, "It is enough," and took him. It was a long life spent in the service of his Master, and a quiet peaceful end. We are impressed more and more that the words of the Psalmist are true, "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace." Psalm 37: 37.

A good man is gone from home, church and community. His place can never be filled in the home. God alone can raise up another that can do his work in the church and community, and our prayer is that God may place his hand upon another and bring him forth that the work may go on.

Personally, he was a friend to his pastor; in fact, he was everybody's friend, and we will miss him so much.

We can never forget the social hours we spent together and our many talks concerning the work of the church. He had the work of the church at heart. He rejoiced in the church's prosperity, and lamented when disappointments came, but was always determined to press on and not to yield to difficulties.

The bereaved family has our deepest and heartfelt sympathy in this hour of sore trial, and we commend you to your father's God.

J. B. O'Briant.

Sept. 17, 1913.

Whereas Joseph E. Snider was for nearly twenty-five years a faithful member of our quarterly conference, attending nearly all the meetings of the conference, much interested in the various enterprises of the church, ready with his counsel and with his purse to advance his Master's cause,

Resolved: That we, the members of Yadkin College Circuit, do miss him at our meetings and at all church services.

We extend our sympathy to his bereaved family. We ask our secretary to record these resolutions on our conference journal, and to send a copy of the same to the Methodist Protestant Herald for publication.

LEARNING TO THINK.

"Well, Master Jim, so you want your hoop mended, do you?" said the blacksmith, and he took the iron hoop in one strong hand and put in in the fire to get soft while he worked the bellows vigorously with the other.

Jim and Tom liked nothing better than to visit the smithy, for it was such an interesting place with its big hammers and anvils and the pinchers and queer tools lying about among the horseshoes.

"I've got a tale to tell you, young gentleman," he said as he worked away at the broken toy, "and it's only happened this afternoon, too. Little Tommy Hunsden ran in, poor little chap, to know if I'd make him four horseshoes for his wooden horse, and while I was fitting them a horse and buggy came dashing down the road. I heard afterwards that some young gentlemen had scared it by shooting peas through a pea shooter at it from behind a hedge."

Tom and Jim said nothing, but they grew very red, and the blacksmith bent lower over his work as he went on talking.

"There was likely to be a sad accident, for Tommy Hunsden ran out before I could stop him, and ran right in front of the horse as it suddenly drew up before the shop. It was all in a shiver as I caught hold of little Tommy's coat to pull him back, but the poor dumb animal never moved, and I lifted the little boy up, and soothed the horse till it lost its fright and was ready to go home again."

"It was Tom and I who shot peas at it," said Jim in a low voice, "and we're very sorry."

"I was sure you would be, Jim, when you heard how near things had been to turning out badly," the blacksmith said as he finished mending the rim. "Here's your hoop, sir, as good as new."

"Thank you very much," Jim answered. "I say, we never thought how foolish we were—it seemed only a bit of fun for us. But we'll not do it again."

"That's right," said the blacksmith heartily. "I knew you'd say that, for I'm sure you were only thoughtless, only you see what a lot of mischief folks can do who don't think."

The boys walked quietly home without speaking till, just as they reached the gate, Tom said: "Let's try and think, Jim."—Selected.

AMERICAN WOODS GO TO ORIENT.

Recent statistics indicate a marked increase in exports of lumber from the United States to the Orient. More than a quarter of a million feet of American woods are reported as being used in Samoa, Hawaii, and the Philippine Islands.

Heretofore, it is said, raw materials have been made up into finished articles in the United States, almost without exception, and exported as such. With the discovery by American manufacturers in the Philippines that they could import United States woods and make them up with profit there, wood-using factories were built. Pacific coast woods, in consequence, are in many cases taking the place of the native woods with such picturesque names as apitong, teak, narra, and yacal.

Douglas fir, acording to the information collected by the forest service, is the principal wood exported from this country. It is said to be the favorite wood among insular manufacturers for flooring, ceiling, siding, cornice, shelving, finish, and boat work. Makers of furniture demand California redwood and sugar pine; southern quarter-sawed oak, eastern ash, sugar maple, and western white pine.

Four woods, principally conifers and oaks, go into the construction of boats; for framing parts, masts, spars, interior trim, planking, boat crooks, and tiller handles. Meat blocks are made from sugar maple, which with sycamore supplies the entire demand in the United States. Wagon felloes are made of white oak, and other parts of vehicles are manufactured from high grades of white ash and white oak.

—It has been discovered that the waste from dogwood shuttle-blocks can profitably be made into handles for steel knives and forks.

BINDING THE WILL.

BY VICTOR P. HAMMER.

When considering how some lives are spent,
I pause, reflect, and, judging, would repent,
Did I not feel my conscious soul at rest
From doing things I chose and thought the best;
Those things remote, from where kind nature dwells,
I did in love, for it is love that tellls.

Could I but know my everlasting fate,
And see my course, and ever consecrate
My life and hopes to one eternal end—
The end where life and death unite and send
The soul from out this mortal tower of clay,
To meet its Maker at the Judgment Day;
I'd show the world that future state and live

To bless mankind and all my service give.
But 'neath the shades of everlasting truth,
The darkness there has blinded me from youth,
Where none, as I, can see a span ahead,
Save with the mind—and thus we grope or tread.

Yet should I pause, or fearfully pursue
The narrow course to which I'm always true,
As Hope and Faith direct my steps aright,
With Heart and Conscience as my holy light?
Or blinded, burdened, make my way without
A guide, and stop and tarry here in doubt?

My answer's "No!" And all the wiles of sin
Can never drag me down to live within
The scope of evil lives; for, as I live,
My work is incomplete until I give,
In every act, a full measure of good,
As human life to me is understood.

I trust I'll never harm my brother man,
But live to love my fellows all I can;
For only once I'll pass along this way,
Therefore, must help them as I pass today:
And, then, each morning as I wake from rest,
I'll say: "This day of life shall be the best!"

WHEN THE GRIZZLY MET THE MULE.

In a trip over the Sirrea Nevadas a Californian took with him not only his favorite horse, but a mule named Billy, a large, iron-gray mule of the pack variety. The second day in the mountains the owner tethered Billy to a tree, allowing him about twenty feet range, where there was good feed, and took a seat on a fallen tree not far away to eat his lunch. He had finished his meal, and was half dozing when suddenly the mule reared and snorted loudly His owner sprang to his feet and looked about.

Not far off stood a grizzly bear, evidently with designs on the owner of the mule. That individual rushed for the nearest tree and made good time in climbing it. He was safe for the time. But how about Billy? To his owner's surprise, Billy dropped his head after a moment and resumed feeding, as if oblivious of the grizzly's nearness. A for the bear, he stood still for several minutes, his eyes wandering from the man in the tree to Billy. The mule's composure puzzled him.

By and by the grizzly started to make a circuit of the tree to which the mule was tethered. The bear emitted a series of deep growls, then opened his great mouth and disclosed two rows of ugly teeth. Slowly the great creature advanced upon the mule. Billy still continued to graze. Nearer came the grizzly and nearer. The mule stopped feeding. From his perch the Californian watched the scene with breathless interest.

Finally the bear stopped, rose on his hind quarters and prepared to strike. At that moment the mule, at whose stupidity his owner had wondered, sprang forward, and the grizzly's paws struck the air. Then the man in the tree saw a gray form double itself into a ball and bound forward. It was the mule's turn. Out of that ball flew two iron-shod hoofs, which shot back and forth with a thump, thump against the body of the grizzly, which was compleely off its guard. He was hit all over—on his head on his shoulder, on his side, on his back—by those pile-driving feet. He fell in one direction, then in another, seeming utterly incapable of getting away; and when Billy stopped kicking, life was gone from the bear's body. The mule, after resting a bit, returned quietly to his feeding.— New York Tribune.

—Many people are under the impression that eggs are germ proof, but this is a mistake. A number of scientists havve been investigating this subject and they find that the protective membrane and shell covering egg are by no means sufficient to exclude contamination. Of a large number of eggs examined, only one in eight was found to be free from germs of some sort, and the variety of germs was large. This emphasises the great importance of keeping eggs under clean and sanitary conditions. Eggs that are to be preserved by any of the various processes should be taken before they have a chance to get all stale.—

NATURE'S UNSOLVED MYSTERIES.

A recent author has recorded some of the puzzles of nature and Professor Serviss has called attention to them. The brilliant diamond and the dull piece of charcoal are of the same substance exactly, pure carbon; one is crystalized. The diamond put in the fire swells up and becomes as ugly and opaque as a piece of coke, and no chemistry can ever get the ugly mass back into the diamond, glancing with its interior fires. The poison of the rattlesnake, which injected into the body, kills, contains the same elements as the white of an egg the consumptive takes to save his life. Coal gas, with the most offensive smell, and oil of roses, with delicious odor, each consist of four atoms of hydrogen combined with four atoms of carbon. Oil of orange, lemon cloves, ginger, and black pepper is in every case composed of 16 atoms of hydrogen and 10 of carbon. Ammonia with its cruel pungency of smell, is composed of hydrogen and nitrogen, neither of which has an odor. apples, peaches, pears, plums, and cherries. of the orchards, the grapes on the vine, The berries in the garden, the corn and wheat in the field, are all made of the same material of earth, air, sunlight, dewdrop, and hower, and how different in form, color, and flavor! How does the hen get the egg out of the grain, or the cow milk from the green grass, or the bee honey out of the buckwheat, or the worm the robe for the queen out of the mulberry leaves? If they could speak, they would tell us they do not know, but that the Creator who made them and set them to their tasks does. There are many puzzles in nature that have been solved and will continue to be solved. Luther Burbank has been a marvelous interpreter of the secret of the vegetable world. But here are riddles too deep for him or any one else to solve. Mr. Burbank can turn a field of yellow poppies into a field of crimson ones, but he will never be able to make a poppy or to mix any earthly pigment so that he can paint a flower. We search for an explanation of the puzzles of puzzles, life itself, which is responsible for the mysteries we cannot understand. It is the specific life in the animal or plant that makes it what it is. It is the snake's poison that destroys the body with albumen, and the hen's gift that saves with the same albumen. It is the wheat life that makes the grain small to grow on a slender stem, and to taste like flour; it is the corn life that makes the grain larger, on a stronger stalk, and to taste like meal. It is the individual life in the orchard tree that gives the form, color, and flavor of The hen, minus its head, lays no egg; the cow in the butcher shop gives no milk; the bee, dead on the grround, makes no honey; the dead orchard tree bears no fruit. This great fact is the puzzle of the spiritual world, the mystery of mysteries in the incarnation, and the mystery of the relation of God's life to the human soul, giving to it life, growth, flowers, fruit, dwelling in the soul so intimately, transforming it so completely, and determining its thoughts, habits, character, ministry and destiny. This life of God in the human soul is the love of the living Christ which gives to character the blush of the peach, the sweetness of honey, the beauty and fragrance of the rose. That these significant, saving spiritual facts of blessed experience are veiled in mystery is asserted by the apostle when he says:

Without controversy great is the mystery of godliness. (I. Tim. 3: 16.)—Christian Herald.

We had our books audited with this in view, but at the earnest solicitation of Mr. Garrett and other friends of the Children's Home we have agreed to continue our efforts to collect the unpaid pledges. We realize Mr. Garrett has all he can do getting the Home in running order.

Now in regard to unpaid pledges: It will be seen from the above report that there are still unpaid pledges amounting to $4632.37. Most of this is past due, and we have sent out notices to everyone, and we sincerely trust that every dollar will be paid real soon.

HOW MOTHER ENJOYED THE MORNING.

It wasn't that mother was tired. She was not wearily dreading the breakfast dishes, either, nor putting the house in order, nor doing the many Monday morning tasks that usually fell to her lot. Nor were the girls to blame because their mother was left with all the work to do. If mother would insist on gathering the children around the piano before school time to sing college songs, and if her voice was the most joyous in all the chorus of "Hail to the Victors," it was no wonder the happy circle felt that work sat lightly upon her shoulders. Yet mother, when left alone, felt like idling.

The two little children had gone to school, and John had started for high school, while the two big girls with their cousin Flora had gone down town. To be sure, Flora, being company and on her best behavior, had made a feeble protest about going away without at least washing the dishes, but she didn't offer to stay and do it. The last one gone, mother opened the fall number of a favorite magazine. On the first page the title "Enjoy the September Morning" attracted her attention.

"Well," mother commented, "who wouldn't? I suppose even the mud turtles are enjoying this lovely morning"

"The way to get the benefit of the September morning," declared the article, "is to get out into it and walk and look and listen and sing, or hum, or whistle, or run, or talk, and give the thinking faculties a rest."

Mother wasn't suffering in the least from weariness of "the thinking faculties," but she suddenly longed to get out into that September morning. "I'd like to shake you, sir," she remarked in savage tones to the writer who had dared suggest that the mother of a family could get into the outdoor joy of the September morning. Again turning to the magazine, she continued reading, this time aloud, so that it seemed as if a stranger spoke the words: "And yet, well, of course you are too busy to get out this morning; there are the dishes and the beds, and the other things! Oh, for just this once let routine work go! Get out and enjoy the morning—just this once, at least!"

Mother looked around and smiled; then she laughed aloud. "I'll do it!" she announced, and promised the clock that she would be back at ten, which allowed two hours in the sunshine and two hours to "hustle through the work and get dinner." The family had dinner at noon.

The clock ticked on undisturbed, but the coffee pot on the dining table looked reproachful, and the entire living room preserved a shocked appearance. Mentally shutting her eyes to conditions in the house, mother put on her sun hat, closed the door behind her, and stepped outdoors with a spirit care free as a girl's.

"I'll see that mud turtle for myself and congratulate him on knowing how to live!" observed mother aloud, as the gate clicked behind her, and she sped down the village street and made straight toward the country.

Two hours passed. The clock ticked on, unnoticed. The living room curtains stirred uneasily in the breeze coming through open windows; perhaps they wondered why mother didn't see that they were trailing snowy lengths against the screens. A pile of books, carelessly placed on the reading table, tumbled over, making a discontented sound as they fell. The canary mentioned his bath in fretful chirps. Four flies that had escaped the little children's traps balanced on the edge of the cream pitcher, risked their liberty on the margin of the uncovered butter dish, or dined unheeded in the sugar bowl.

Thirty minutes more passed before the front door opened and three laughing, happy girls trooped into the house, to stand a moment later as if paralyzed by the scene before them. Calls of "Mother, mother," were unanswered.

"Where is mother?" exclaimed Elizabeth in sharp, excited tones.

"Where can she be?" inquired Barbara.

"Oh, where?" Flora wished to know.

"She can't be far away, because she left the house unlocked!"

"But everything is just as it was when we went away!"

"It isn't like her to leave the downstairs work undone!"

"And look at the table! Not even the butter put away, nor the cream!"

"Do you suppose anything has happened?"

"Of course not! She's just stepped out."

"Unless one of the neighbors was dying, mother would at least have put away the butter."

"And she would have run the carpet sweeper over the floor and straightened the chairs around, no matter what."

"She was well this morning, wasn't she?"

"Yes, and she was happy, too! She couldn't have committed"—

"Oh, hush!"

"Maybe a tramp came and"—

"Instead of standing here talking, girls, let's search the house from top to bottom. If she is in the house, dead or alive, let's find her—quick!'"

The girls searched in vain. Almost in tears, they were discussing what to do next, when in walked John.

"Has something happened to mother?" demanded Elizabeth.

"Happened to mother? I should hope not! But how do you expect me to know!"

"Why—because—well, how did you happen to come home so early? You are not usually home until after one."

"Except when the botany class is to go to the woods at one. But what about mother?"

John was boyishly comforting when the girls explained. "I should think," he blustered, "that you girls would be ashamed of yourselves, any way, to go gadding and leaving her with all the work to do!"

"You can't say anything," was Barbara's quick retort. "How about the woodbox? Not a stick in it nor a sign of kindling! Looks as if either she or papa had to get the wood to start the breakfast fire with."

"I'll tell you what!" Elizabeth suggested. "If anything has happened to mother—if she is sick or hurt, or anything, it would just finish her to be brought into such a looking house! Now here is my idea—Barbara and I will make the beds and straighten up the house so it will look decent, while John and Flora go out and see if the neighbors know anything."

Fortunately mother came in at that moment laden with green boughs and trailing vines. Her cheeks were red and her eyes bright; but she seemed ready to offer an apology to the clock when three girls, laughing and crying for joy, almost smothered her with kisses.

"Well, I'll go fill the woodbox," announced John, "and then I think I'll rake the yard. It looks rotten for a funeral."

"A funeral!" echoed mother, releasing herself from the embrace of three hysterical girls. "What do you mean?"

"Oh, the girls had you dead and buried because you weren't at home when they came!"

"Oh, I'm so sorry!" mother began. "You see, I expected to get back sooner, but"—

"Now, don't say another word," protested Barbara. "After today every girl and boy in this family is going to do a proper share of the morning work, if we, all but you and papa, have to get up an hour earlier, so our mother can take a walk, if she wants to, without scaring us almost to death and"—

The house was in order and dinner ready at noon—omelet, fried potatoes, fried apples and cottage pudding.

Father didn't notice that there had been any change in the usual program; neither did the little children. But the next morning father smiled and the little children joyfully obeyed John and "stepped lively," doing trifling tasks that saved mother's time.

That day the ordinary housework was finished at nine o'clock, and mother might have gone for another walk in the September sunshine; but she didn't. Instead, she sat by the window beside the mending basket, and as she darned stockings, she smiled, and smiled, and smiled.—FRANCES MARGARET FOX, in Continent.

—A statue of Nathan Hale, who was captured and hung as a spy by the British at the beginning of the Revolutionary war, is about to be erected on the campus at Yale university. Yale men, it seems, dislike having the great patriot represented as manacled and bound but the sculpt r, B. L. Pratt, insisted that to show Hale in the supreme moment of his life—that just before his death—it was necessary, artistically, to show the figure bound hand and foot, and the sculptor prevailed. Hale's heroic last words, "My only regret is that I have but one life to give for my country," will be inscribed in colonial lettering on the pedestal.—Pathfinder.

According to a table of the post-offces in the Unied States as they were Oct. 1, 1830, the whole number of offces was 8,610. The rates of postage established by congress in 1825 were: On a single letter composed of one piece of paper for any distance not exceeding 30 miles, 6 cents; over 30 miles and not exceeding 80 miles, 10 cents; over 80 miles and not exceeding 150, 12½ cents; over 150 miles and not exceeding 400, 18¾ cents; over 400 miles, 25 cents; a letter composed of two pieces of paper was charged double these rates; of three pieces triple and four pieces quadruple these rates. For newspapers the rate was one cent for 100 miles and a cent and a half for over 100 miles.—Lewiston Journal.

IT COULDN'T BE DONE

Somebody said that it couldn't be done,
But he with a chuckle replied,
That "may be it couldn't," but he would be one
Who wouldn't say so till he'd tried.
So he buckled right in with the trace of a grin
On his face. If he worried he hid it.
He started to sing as he tackled the thing
That couldn't be done—and he did it!

Somebody scoffed: "Oh, you'll never do that—
At least, no one ever has done it";
But he took off his coat and he took off his hat,
And the first thing we knew he'd begun it.
With the lift of his chin and a bit of a grin,
Without any doubting or quiddit,
He started to sing as he tackled the thing
That couldn't be done—and he did it!

There are thousands to tell you it can not be done,
There are thousands to prophesy failure;
There are thousands to point out to you one by one,
The dangers that wait to assail you.

TRUTH MUST BE EARNED.

No man may act in another's place. A decision is no decision, if it be not the man's own. Truth that is truth must be earned. Faith, a great philosopher urges, is a deed. One's father may bequeath to one his fortune, but he cannot bequeath his convictions. One's mother may give to one some precious heirloom; she cannot give, much as she might desire to do so, her ideals or her decisions. Convictions and ideals and decisions are essentially individual, and they must be continually reaffirmed even for the same individual from time to time, and still more for every generation.—Henry Churchill King.

—Battleship No. 39, now building at the New York navy yard, will probably be named the "North Carolina," in honor of his native state, by Secretary of the navy Daniels. The cruiser North Carolina will have her named changed to Ashville, Charlotte or Winstom-Salem.

—The Congregationalist: "Our Baptist friends are nothing if not ingenious. They recently drafted the tank of the Kansas state penitentiary to immerse twenty-three converts among the prisoners."

A NEW MOVEMENT.

On the theory that it takes a thief to catch a thief, Rev. R. J. Patterson, of Belfast, Ireland, conceived the idea of having drunkards catch drunkards and induce them to sign the pledge and reform. The movement is known as "Catch-My-Pal" movement. Through this agency Mr. Patterson has been instrumental in bringing about the reformation of more than one hundred and twenty-five thousand drunkards in a few years. He has been spending the summer in America, and has spoken several times in Pittsburgh churches. The plan appealed so strongly to church workers here that an orginization was formed, and the work will be pushed in the hope of saving the down-and-out drunkard.—Methodist Recorder.

SLEEPING INDOORS OUTDOORS.

If you have taken the fever for sleeping out of doors and don't happen to have a sandy porch or a roof on which to mount your bed and yet be screened from the eyes of the curious you may follow the example of a clever young fellow, who fixed up an arrangement which was nothing more than drawing his bed up to a window in such a manner that his bed was directly in the line with the window. To protect himself from the draught on the head, a woolen hood was provided, a simple task for any seamstress. Some awning, from the nearest awning house, was made to cover a frame of convenient construction, forming a box. Part of the box is on the outside of the window, and part inside, covering the upper part of the body. Without making the room cold, or freezing the body, the boy secured quite as much fresh air for the lungs as if he had been sleeping in the out doors itself.—Felix. J. Koch.

TO CLEAR OUT RATS.

A farmer says he rid his farm as follows: "On a very large number of pieces of old shingles I put about a teaspoonful of molasses, and on that, with my pocket knife I scraped a small amount of concentrated lye, then placed the shingles around under the floors and under the cribs. The next morning I found forty dead rats and the rest vamoosed. have cleared many farms of the pests in the same way, and have never known it to fail."

WHEN IS A SECT NOT A SECT?

When a sect emphasizes its peculiarities to the exclusion of its fundamentals, It is a sect. When a sect recognizes the rights of other sects to employ their peculiarities to the same extent it employs its own peculiarities, it is not a sect. When a sect studies and compares its tenets and policies with like tenets and policies of other sects and seeks points of contact and cooperation, then a sect is no a sect. When a sect sets itself up as the sect and refuses to accord the rights to other sects it arrogates to itself, then it is a sect. Sects, in the proper sense of the term are parts of the whole. The whole is larger than the parts. A sect is a sect when it proceeds on the supposition that it is the whole.—California Christian Advocate.

THE COUNTRY CHURCH.

The country village store has a great social influence. The post-office and store are often united. It is here the latest gossip is told, the political issues discussed, and news of the neighborhood circulated. It may be a place where men spend their idle hours to no advantage, or it may be clean, useful and influential power for good. The country pastor can do much to make the country store a good social center. Never before has so much emphasis been laid upon the social work of the church. The old theory was individualistic—to save man, but the new spirit is social—to save men. Through the different organizations the church can reach all people and create an interest in holy things. Let the church relate itself to every good movement for rural betterment. Let it not think anything unclean but let it reach the ears of men and touch them through their daily toil.—Rev. C. J. Morton.

SICK POULTRY.

Above all, remember that prevention is a great deal more satisfactory than trying to cure. When signs of roup are noticed in a flock, all the sick should be isolated from the well at once. Feeding the remainder of the flock on wet corn meal, to which one teaspoonful of coal oil has ben aded for each dozen fowls, will perhaps prevent their contracting the disease. This should be fed as often as the exigency of the case seems to require, say once or twice a week.—Sel.

OUT IN KANSAS.

Word comes from Kansas that during the first six years of prohibition in that State, insanity has decreased slightly over 16 per cent., or about one in six, as a direct result of the greatly decreased use of alcohol in all forms. General increased efficiency is claimed all along the line, but it is very hard to determine exactly the amount creditable to prohibition. Good for Kansas. Our own statistical experience satisfies us that Kansas is not faking on us. Other states will continue to "get wise" and "get on the water wagon" from time to time, and alcoholism, like yellow fever and plague, will become largely a matter of record.

WORK FOR TEMPERANCE COMMITTEES.

Since the brewers and distillers are placing in our public libraries books defending the use and sale of alcoholic liquors, and are also spending tens of thousands of dollars in advertising in the daily press the virtues of their wares, would it not be a good plan for the Endeavorers of a locality to obtain a good bust or steel engraving of Neal Dow or of Miss Frances E. Willard, with a good set of say twenty of the best books dealing with the physical, mental and financial effects of alcoholic beverages, to be given to the local library? The friends of temperance would hold a public meeting to present to the library the books and bust or picture. Such an effort would do great good in arousing public attention, and would furnish reliable information where now it is often hard to obtain.

USE THE BIBLE.

Here is a splendid testimony from President Wilson:

"I am sorry for the men who do not read the Bible every day. I wonder why they deprive themselves of the strength and of the pleasure. It is one of the most singular books in the world, for every time you open it some old text that you have read a score of times suddenly beams with a new meaning. Evidently the mood and the thought of that day, bred by the circumstances that you cannot analyze, has suddenly thrown its light upon that page and upon that passage, and there springs out upon the page to you something that you never saw lie upon it before. There is no other book that I know of, of which this is true; there is no other book that yields its meaning so personally, that seems to fit itself so intimately to the very spirit that is seeking its guidance."

PIG AND PRIDE.

"Patrick, you were on a bad spree yesterday,' said a friend, reproachfully.

"Yis, sor, Oi was thot,' replied Patrick. "Bless me, if Oi wasn't lying in the gutter wid a pig. Father Dunn come along an' looked at me an' says, says he: 'One is known by the company he kapes.' "

"And did you get up, Patrick?"

"Oi did not, but the pig did."—Sunday Magazine.

—Dr. P. P. Claxton, U. S. Commissioner of education, has pointed out that the average length of the school term in rural schools is only 138 days, or less than seven months. He urges that state officials use their influence to secure for these schools a term of nine months, the same as in the city schools.

SCHOOL DAYS.

Watch out for little Willie and Katie as you send them to school these days. Send them only in first class shape. Nine chances out of ten they need more than watching. It is a four-to-five shot that they need to have their teeth attended to, if you intend them to have a life-long blessing of good teeth. There is only one time to attend to teeth, and that is right now. Six months or a year may mean the permanent loss of one or more permanent teeth, and you doom your children to a lifelong handicap of bad teeth, such as you yourself have had. If there is any lesson parents should learn from hard experience, it is that neglecting teeth does not pay. If children are taught early the habit of using toothbrushes daily or twice a day, and if defects are attended to at once, 95 per cent. of our tooth troubles would disappear.

Willie's and Katie's eyes should be watched these days, too. If they have to hold a book closer than nine inches or farther than tweny-four inches from the eyes, or if they complain that their vision is blurred in one or both eyes, take them to your family physician, or better still, to a specialist on eye, ear, nose, and throat diseases. Never take them to a street peddler who sells "spectacles" or "eyeglasses."

Remember that your child has but two eyes. for life, and you can't take many chances.

Make sure that litlle Willie and Katie hear well out of both ears, that they are not mouth breathers, and that they keep in prevent or cure nine-tenths of the eye troubles of children, but improperly fitted with only two. Properly fitted glasses will good physical trim while they are in school, and you will be proud of the progress and record of your boy and girl at the end of the school year.

—At a British Medical Conference, Dr. Barendt, a skin specialist, advanced the theory that men become bald because they wear their hair so short. He believes that baldness would be very rare if men would allow their hair to remain 13 or 14 inches long. The fact that few women ever become bald may be taken as an argument in support of the doctor's theory. Another skin specialist, Dr. Walsh, told the conference that he considered baldness a result of some weakness of the heart which made the circulation defectivee; he submitted the fact that of 36 bald men he had treated 24 were suffering from valvular heart disease.

REACHING THOSE WHO DRIFT AWAY

Thousands of church members who go from the country to the city are lost each year to various denominations. The problem is how to reach these who, under new environment and for one reason or another, drift away from the church. The Presbyterians of Chicago and New York through their Brotherhood have made an organized effort to deal with this very serious question. A Strangers' Bureau has been for some time in operation in the city of New York, with a salaried man, who devotes his entire time to seeking those who come to the metropolis and do not identify themselves with church. In the city of Chicago the assistant national secretary of the Brotherhood, Rev. Dr. Francis N. Fox, has been placed in charge of the work. Advertisements are used in church papers that are scattered far and wide in that denomination, drawing the attention of pastors and parents to th eopportunity of having young men loked up in Chicago and visited by members of the Presbyterian Church. Then, when a name is sent to this bureau, the person is immediately found, and the name turned over to members of the Brotherhood belonging to the church nearest to where the man lives. Thus already several have been saved to the denomination. This has a two-fold effect. It provides work for those who are already in the churches, and saves that which has been an enormous watste. It is a movement worthy of imitation by all churches. Zion's Herald.

DENTON HIGH SCHOOL

——OPENS SEPTEMBER 1, 1913——

DENTON is situated in the Piedmont hills of Davidson County twenty miles South from Thomasville on the Carolina and Yadkin River Rail Road. This Railroad connects us with the Southern at Thomasville and High Point on the north and with the Southbound at High Rock on the South. About 350 yards west from the depot on Salisbury Street, nestling among a beautiful grove of oaks, is the home of Denton High School.

OUR COURSE OF STUDY prepares for any College, also for our State University. We give each student personal atention and do everything necessary for their comfort and advancement. A thoroughly competent teacher has been employed for the Music Department, and those who take this course will receive special attention. A High School Business Course will be taught free of charge as to tuition. Special work in Pedagogy for those who intend to teach.

FREE TUITION to ministerial students and children of the ministers of the North Carolina Conference. Cost of all necessary expenses for a year ranges from $115 to $145. We board students in good private homes. Indigent young men can get rooms and board themselves at actual cost. If any one wishes to pay a part or even all expenses by work, write the Principal for particulars. The school uses water from deep drilled wells with pumps, which eliminates all danger from germs in the water. Pure air, pure water, plenty of work; if these do not give health to the student, he will never have it. Write the Principal at Denton, N. C., for any further information.

—Some people lose their legitimate influence by trying to exercise an illegitimate control.

—We publish elsewhere the action of the meeting of members of the Maryland Conference rgarding the proposed union.

—There was great anxiety at the Children's Home last week. The good old horse was gone and could not be found. Had somebody stolen him? It looked that way. But no, he had only strolled away, not meaning to be naughty, but only to nibble the grass here and there. He was found near Jamestown after hours of search, and led back and then there was rejoicing in the Home.

—Rev. J. H. Lucas was elected president of the Pittsburgh Conference last week. He will continue as pastor of Squirrel Hill M. P. Church. The president of the Pittsburgh Conference does not now travel the district. Rev. C. F. Swift, of that Conference, is acting Field Secretary of the Pennsylvania Anti-Saloon League. He was elected to the legislature by the anti-liquor forces.

—President Davis makes the following statement as to the vote on the union question:

"Eleven conferences have reported their vote as follows: The Iowa, Indiana, West Virginia, Michigan, Ohio, Kansas, Pittsburgh, Muskingum, Onondaga, Kentucky and Missouri. All these have voted for the basis of union, and not by the mere majorities which would leave a shadow of doubt as to the wisdom of the movement, but by a vote which is practically unanimous. Six of the eleven voted unanimously, while the others recorded so few in the negative as to lead to the belief that all opposition passed away with the balloting."

—More and more science is coming to the support of the Bible. Many historical portions of the Bible have been confirmed by discoveries in Bible lands. Now the predictions of the Bible are finding support in the conclusions of scientists. The Bible teaches that death does not end man's existence, and recently Sir Oliver Lodge, president of the British Society for the Advancement of Science, declared that "facts examined by the methods of science indicate that personality persists beyond bodily death."

—Mr. Carl R. Riddle, a ministerial student in Elon College, depending on his own efforts to pay expenses, is collecting one hundred articles written by one hundred young men, each telling "Why and How I am Making My Own Way Through College." These articles will be published serially in the "Raleigh Times", and then in book form. We congratulate Mr. Riddle on his happy thought. The articles will not only be of interest to the general reader, but they must prove inspiring and suggestive to a large class of young people who would like to go to college, but don't see how they can.

THE BLUES.

Did you ever have them? I suspect so. You felt bad, sad, despondent.

The blues, like headache and tooth-ache and other maladies, are unpleasant in themselves, but they are really friendly warnings meant to teach us that something is wrong which should be righted. People do not always give wise heed to the warning. Sometimes they increase the real trouble by trying to get rid of the warning symptom. If head-ache come, instead of seeking out and removing the cause, they hasten to take some powder or pill that may destroy the head-ache by deadening the nervous sensibilities, but will almost surely leave the person in worse general condition. For tooth-ache, they hasten to the wasteful remedy of extraction instead of the economical one of having the tooth treated and filled.

The same thing is true of the "blues". This malady indicates that something is wrong, but does not plainly show what. There are many causes of the blues. Loss of sleep is a common cause. Indigestion is another. Poisons in the system, alcoholic or others, will bring out the feeling. When the malady comes, a person should look for the cause and avoid it. How foolish it is to repeat the experiences that have resulted in the miserable indigo feeling.

SPREADING THE NET OF THE LAW.

Our criminal laws are meant to catch evil doers, but sometimes they are so framed as to allow some of the guilty accomplices to escape. In the case of houses used for immoral purposes, the owner is as guilty as the keeper of the house if he knows how his property is being used and can prevent improper use of it by ejecting tenants or other lawful measures. But heretofore our legislators have not so viewed the matter. At the last session of our legislature, however, a law was framed for Guilford County which makes it possible to prosecute the owner of the house in such a case, and in the Superior Court sitting here now a conviction has been reached under this law in the case of D. Stadiem. He besides being subject to heavy penalties must now give bond that his house will not be used for such purposes within a year. If he fails in this, the house will be placarded and must remain vacant for a year.

This Guilford law, or one like it, should be extended to the whole State. Society has the right to protect itself against abominations tolerated by greed for the sake of gain. We hope our lawmakers will see the matter in this light and make a law as extensive in its application as is the need.

Mr. Clarence Poe, editor of the Progressive Farmer, has a plan to prevent race troubles which seems practicable and which he says good lawyers declare not unconstitutional. The gist of the plan is "a simple law which shall say that wherever the greater part of the land acreage in any given district that may be laid off is owned by one race, a majority of the voters in such a district may say (if they wish) that in future no land shall be sold to a person of a different race. Provided such action is approved or allowed (as being justified by consideration of the peace, protection, and social life of the community), by a reviewing judge or board of county commissioners."

OUR SUPERANNUATES.

Has the church in the N. C. District got the welfare of our superannuates at heart as it should? I fear not. Of course we do not mean to neglect them, but it seems ment for superannuates is pitifully inadecence, that should not exist. Our assessment for superannuate is pitifully inadequate, when collected; and if I mistake not, it is seldom collected in full. This ought not to be so. This should be collected by all means—and can be—even if some others are lacking. This is not a matter of gift, or of charity, but a matter of simple justice a debt we owe. We can't afford not to pay it. Our conscience needs to be stirred over this matter. One of our sister conferences pays its superannuates $400, or more, per year. We have not the figures at hand, but are sure it is that much, and we are of the impression that in some cases it is more, while we pay $120, and less. We ought to do bet ter much better—and could, if we only felt the obligation as we should. Yes, our conscience needs to be awakened. The very fact of working men, 20, 25, 30, and more years, in the best part of their lives, on salaries of which it is impossible to lay up anything in many cases, and in others the saving is wholly inadequate for the needs of declining years, or old age, and then set them adrift to weather the storm of life in old age as best they can is unjust to the last degree. Even the godless (?) corporations of the world do better, for a number of the railroads pension their employees who have served them 20 to 25 years, and more. The government pensions its old soldiers, railroads their employees, and can the church of Jesus Christ afford to do less? Besides the corporations and the government pay better salaries when one is in active service than the church many times does. Pray, what is a man to do when he has spent the prime of his life on a salary just about sufficient "to make both ends meet", and sometimes not sufficient to do that, to be dropped without home, without capital, without income, with broken health—too late to start over? Pray, what is he to do? Have you ever thought of this seriously? If not, stop and think. It's a serious matter. Does it mean suffering, want, privation, or the poor house? It looks much that way. Some who are in the active work have to live a life of self-denial that the rest of the world knows not of, nor even dreams of. It would be a revelation if some preachers were to lift the veil and give the public a peep into their homes. And thus to live year after year, knowing that the fatal time is just ahead, every year bringing it nearer, when their service will be no longer wanted—then to be dropped like the "old grey horse, turned out to die." This is no Arabian Nights' tale, no overdrawn picture, but a sad and serious situation that confronts some good men, as matters now stand. But we can change the situation if we will. If we can but be awakened from our lethargy and indifference. Use every legitimate effort to collect the full assessment of $800, and also increase our permanent fund at least $10,000 additional. Two or three times that amount would be better. If we were as much in earnest about our superannuates as we were a few years ago about a college, or have been and are about our orphanage, the $10,000 proposed by some, and more, could be easily raised. Let's try. Who will start it? Who'll cause the thing to materialize?

This article is quite unsatisfactory to the writer, but he hopes that it may stimulate thought, and help to awaken our sleepy consciences on the subject. So please think and pray over this most important matter. In Earnest.

AN APPEAL TO THE GIRLS.

Our corerspondent, in his appeal to ten boys, wrote on a subject a thousand fold more important than the work of building battleships, and enrolling soldiers, if the protection of this grand commonwealth is the object in view. Now it is a well known fact that boys cannot go right while they live in the same world with careless, reckless, lawless, godless girls.

Tell us what kind of girls are in the majority in any community, and we all know the moral status of the boys.

Now there comes a buzzing about our ears:—"When we have the ballot we will reform the world in short order." Nay, verily, children, the ballot will give us more power for evil, but not not one particle more for good, because God gave us every bit of power for good that He could bestow on mortals in the beginning and there is no more to gain. When women use the means they have possessed since the creation to build up Christ's kingdom the world will be like unto the abode of the blessed.

If you girls, just stepping out into young womanhood, could lift the veil of years, and see how the matter will appear to you when three score years have passed I am sure not one of you would think for a moment of spending the best years of your life in building a character not in accordance with the divine plan, but just as the Prince of Darkness in his zeal for your eternal ruin would dictate.

Divine Love created every human being to be happy in youth and He has given us a law that will insure peace, and joy and blessedness in old age, but with all God's power, and love for mankind He cannot make an old person happy that has refused His guidance in youth. When we were created, God implanted in every human being a spark of divinity—a part of Himself—that is forever reaching up to things pure, and true, and holy. Men call it conscience, and firmly believe they can destroy it, but it is as indestructible as God Himself. One can abuse it till it raises only a feeble protest at some stupendous outrage, but when the mists of youth have cleared away it will come forth to wreak eternal vengeance on its possessor. Young ladies, the things you now call small sins will just as surely lead you to large ones as the acorn slip will grow into a gigantic oak. It is the "style" in this grand age for young girls to be coarse and rough and boisterous. To be pert and discourteous—to dress themselves in a manner that would do honor to a Hottentot—to ignore every responsibility if it interferes in the least with their "good time". A large number positively repudiate all parental law as nothing but an old fogy notion, and hence, not worthy of the least consideration.

Again, many girls do and say things that for the world they would not have others to know. Child, if you know yourself that your conduct or speech is unworthy of a refined, intelligent woman, the knowledge will sting you till life's latest day. You need to be watchful every moment of your waking existence so that you may be able to throttle evil thoughts, and tendencies at their birth. If one never has a bad thought, one will never commit an unworthy act. Do you think it is a hard task? It is really impossible in your own strength; but what hinders you from going in partnership with God? Some writer has said, "No mortal has yet measured his full force. It is a river rising in God's thought and emptying in the soul of man. Go back to the source and find divinity. Forget the narrow borders and ignore the rocks and chasms that obstruct the way. Remember the beginning. We may be and do the thing we wish if we keep that one thought dominant through night and day, and know our strength is limitless because its fountain head is God. That mighty stream shall bear upon its breast our hopes, our efforts, and our purposes to anchor in the harbor of success."

How are you to get in partnership with God, do you ask? In olden times we were taught that the way into Christ's kingdom was to be washed in the cleansing blood of a crucified Savior and it was called the new birth. That we rarely ever hear of such a thing from the pulpit now is no reason why it is not the only way to successfully fight sin.

Now you need not think you need a whole lot of other people's prayers, or must wait for a special meeting to take God into your life. You can thresh the matter out much better alone with Him, and then you will know of a certainty where you stand. If you could only understand how anxious He is to guide you to all joy, and peace, and purity, you would surely open the door to let Him in.

Now, girls, if you want to be happy, and useful you do not need any of these little old popular sins to make you so.

Every temptation you overcome makes it easier to overcome others. When you go down before one, it is well nigh impossible to overcome one in future. Let me plead with you to start today to be pure and true, polite and courteous, kind and loving, refined and discreet, industrious and helpful, for this is the only way to learn the true joy of living.

You are not required by divine Love to give up a single pleasure except those which drown our souls in destruction, and perdition. When we have a nation of pure women we will have one of pure men.

Ruth Fletcher.

ACTION OF MARYLAND MINISTERS AND LAYMEN ON THE BASIS OF UNION.

We, the ministers and lay representatives belonging to the Methodist Protestant Church in the Maryland District, assembled to consider the Basis of Union proposed between the United Brethren and the Methodist Protestant Churches, do hereby express our conclusions upon this vital matter.

1. In recording our objections to the Basis of Union, as we feel compelled to do, we wish to be understood as in full sympathy with the spirit of Christian Union. We are not opposed to the resolution of the General Conference of 1912 declaring its belief that a union with the United Brethren Church was possible and practical. But we protest against the assumption that the resolution of the General Conference settled the matter beyond criticism, or that it meant anything more than a sincere desire to negotiate with a view to learning if practicable and honorable arrangements could be made for a union. Now that the report of the Commission is before the Church we feel that it is proper for any member of the Church or for any number of members of the Church to express, both officially and unofficially, praise or censure of what has been presented.

2. The name which the Basis of Union proposes for the new Church eliminates us from the ecclesiastical family to which we have always belonged and gives us nothing in its place of historic or ecclesiastical value. We must expect to make concessions in the matter of name as in other matters, if any union is to be formed; but surely it is not necessary to make such a violent break with our entire past when nothing is gained but a new name, which is not accurate, so far as Protestantism is concerned, nor distinctive so far as we are concerned. Surely it is possible to combine elements of both names in such a way as to preserve the heritage of both churches and declare the fact of their union. Names are sometimes of slight worth, and yet to relinquish our name may sometimes mean to be recreant to the thing for which the name stands.

3. The declaration of Faith embodied in the Basis of Union was written for the Commissioners negotiating for a union between our two churches and the Congregationalists. As a compromise between a church without a creed and those who had always had established Articles it was unobjectionable, particularly as that union contemplated the autonomy of all the churches included both in creed and in administration. But for our two churches to drop our Articles and accept this paper as our sole pronouncement of faith would leave us a Protestant Church in name only, for not one of the historic protests of Protestantism is in this paper. So that this Basis asks us to abandon the Methodist name and the Protestant creed.

4. The Constitution as written in the Basis of Union is taken substantially from the United Brethren Discipline, and considered, as it must be, as the organic instrument for the corporate basis of the Church, it must be declared wholly inadequate. It makes no attempt to provide for the administrative functions of the Church, nor does it clearly define those elements it attempts to describe. The General Conference, the Annual Conference and the Episcopacy are all that receive attention, and these are left indefinite and incomplete, so that it is impossible to say what their full powers are, or what limitations, if any, are to be placed upon them. It is manifest that the new Church could not even organize itself without more law than is provided in this constitution.

5. Bearing in mind that the adoption of this Basis of Union at once dissolves the Methodist Protestant Church, it must be important to know how the working law of the new Church is to be completed. The churches must come together in a General Conference. A General Conference acts by a majority, unless some other rule is provided. There is no such provision in this Basis of Union, and there is nothing to prevent a General Conference composed of the representatives of about 300,000 United Brethren and 185,000 Methodist Protestants from adopting the remainder of the United Brethren Discipline as the law of the new Church. The Basis of Union between two sovereign churches, but numerically unequal, should safeguard the rights of the minority by organic and irrepealable provision.

6. We believe that the defects in this Basis of Union are largely due to the haste with which this matter has been prosecuted. It has been less than a year since these negotiations began. The Commissions have had but three meetings, and have spent less than a week all told in their joint deliberations. Surely the union of two churches which for nearly a century have carried on the large and complicated operations of independent ecclesiasticisms is not so slight and simple a matter, however desirable as an abstract idea, as to be accomplished in so short a time and with so little real consideration given to difficulties which in every attempt of this sort must arise and must be overcome before permanent union is effected.

7. Finally, we love the Methodist Protestant Church. We are proud of its history and achievement. We do not despair of its future. It was born among those who said it could not live, and it has lived among those who often prophesied that it would die; but it still lives, and it has wrought splendid and enduring results. Its vigor is not spent nor was it ever larger or more popular than it is today. These are not reasons we plead to resist the growing demands for Christian Union, which we gladly recognize as providential tokens of a new era in Christian progress; but they are reasons to make us pause before any specific proposals of union, to take time for estimating their merits, for anticipating their difficulties, and for providing safeguards lest the effort for Union become the weapon of division and disintegration in the very Church we love, which so many good men gave their all to found, and which so many more are ready to perpetuate at the same cost so long as Providence shall indicate that to be their duty.

For the reasons we have given, therefore, we are compelled to record ourselves in opposition to the present Basis of Union. We do this in no hostility to the spirit of Union, nor to union with the United Brethren. If we have not already indicated the kind of Union we would vote for, we add that:

If we may have some such combination of our two names as "The United Brethren Methodist Church"; if a confession of faith may be drawn up by combining articles from both our confessions which will preserve our credal connection with Protestantism; if a constitution may be formulated covering the whole organism of the Church, with the powers of each part of the organism clearly defined and explicitly limited, with a due measure of autonomy guaranteed to the Annual Conferences, and with the Episcopacy especially confined within exact administrative bounds; in a word, if we may know before we vote to unite what we shall be organically after we are united, so that the Basis of Union becomes the permanent guarantee of the rights and liberties we now enjoy, we would confidently predict that the Methodist Protestant Church would enter into such a union with practical unanimity. It is not too late to do this, and we appeal to our brethren to pause and reconsider and work together for a new and completer and more equitable Basis of Union.

SUGGESTIONS FOR THE IMPROVEMENT OF THE ANNUAL CONFERENCE SESSIONS.

Sometimes discussions are allowed to take up several minutes of the conference's time, when finally some one will cite the conference to certain measures passed by the last, or some preceding conference, which covered the matter in question entirely.

This shows that we are not posted as we should be and I would suggest that all members of the conference be asked to review the minutes of last conference some time during the thirty days preceding the next session, and also bring a copy of the minutes to conference with them.

I notice that a number of the preachers and laymen are inclined to stand outside the church and talk rather than attend promptly the sessions of the conference. Then, too, a number of the strongest men are out on committee work while the conference is considering important questions, and I have heard that some questions have been called for reconsideration at the same session of conference on account of having been settled by a minority in a way unsatisfactory to the majority. We need our strongest men on the floor when conference is in session, and I would suggest that we do not have such long hours set for conference to be in session. Last year conference met at 9 A. M., 2 P. M., 7:30 P. M. The committee work must be done, and I believe that conference should not be called until, say 10 A. M., so as to have about two hours' session in the forenoon, and the same in the afternoon, and evening. Then let all committee work cease and call the roll and require them to come in. If the roll is published in the minutes showing who answered and who did not, I think all would take a pride in making a good record.

The Pastor's Financial Report blanks used last year were confusing and can be greatly improved by having a double column, one for claims and one for amounts received. In this way each column can be added separately and the footings will show amount assessed, and amount paid. A few explanatory notes on these blanks would be a help, but better still it seems to me would be to have an auditing committee to receive these reports and go over them with the pastor the day he arrives at conference. Any confusion in the reports or lack of information could probably be adjusted in this way. The pastor's statistical reports could be handled in the same way by another committee.

These are a few things I have thought of, and I really feel that some changes should be made. I think a great deal depends on how we conduct our church business as well as any other business, and there are always spectators at our Annual Conference on whom we make some sort of an impression, and let us try to make it the best. Layman.

AN APPEAL FOR PRAYER FOR THE UNITED MISSIONARY CAMPAIGN.

The Home and Foreign Missionary leaders of the United States and Canada have decided to engage this winter in the most extensive and important piece of co-operative work which which they have ever under taken. The object in view is to enlist a far larger number of church members as intelligent missionary workers, supporters and intercessors. Of the more than twenty millions of Protestant church members in North America, less than one-half of them are doing anything or giving anything to meet the missionary needs either at home or abroad.

In addition to aggressive educational plans to be carried forward within the various denominations, there will be several hundred two-day Missionary Conferences held throughout the United States and Canada. More than twenty teams of experienced speakers are already organized for the efficient conduct of these Conferences.

This extensive campaign is planned to lead up to a simultaneous personal canvass in March, 1914, for all missionary purposes, on the part of all the churches of all denominations, so far as they will undertake it. More than two hundred speakers will participate in the Conferences. Probably hundreds of thousands of men will assist in the simultaneous canvass for missionary subscriptions. The entire effort should mean a marked quickening of the spiritual life of many thousands of churches, resulting in greatly increased Christian activity and liberality.

In view of the vast issues involved, the Executive Committee of the United Missionary Campaign appeals to Christian people everywhere to join in frequent prayer for God's clear guidance and manifested presence and power in connection with this entire undertaking. In private prayer, at the family altars, in the stated church services, and in many other meetings called especially for the purpose, it is most earnestly urged that unceasing prayer be offered for a mighty spiritual quickening that will enable the church to strengthen and enlarge its work so as to meet worthily the present critical and stupendous opportunities both at home and abroad. Nothing less than a general and profound spiritual quickening among the churches will meet the present emergency. This quickening will come, and can only come, when fervent prayer is offered unceasingly to God, to this end. "In any land a revival will come when enough people desire it enough—that is, above everything."

"Ye have not because ye ask not."

"The harvest is great,—therefore pray ye."

"Concerning the work of my hands, command ye me."

A BAPTIST PREACHER ON CHURCH UNITY.

All who love what God loves and hate what God hates are coming closer and closer together. Disputes are dying away and heresy trials are past. Christian liberty has at last come, and men are more generous. Your children and mine will see the great Union Church. All families will yet go up to the temple of God together. The wisest teachers will plead the cause of Right, Justice and Love.

With one arm and one heart, the people will assault ugliness, ignorance, crime and sin together.

The kings of genius will disrown themselves to serve. All class churches will die away because they cumber the ground. Every church will be a miniature world, including the high and low, rich and poor, the taught and untaught. The church will become the preacher's force and not merely his field.

It isn't essential that the communion be outward or that there be traditional succession in the office of the ministry, but it is essential that we have the succession which the Holy Spirit imparts through the Divine word.

It isn't essential that we keep the seventh day, or Jewish Sabbath, but it is essential that we worship God and not despise His Word.

It isn't essential whether we are baptized by sprinkling, pouring or immersion, but it is essential that we receive through faith, in baptism, God's grace.

It isn't essential that the communion bread be round or square, broken or unbroken, nor whether the cup be common or individual, or the wine red or white, nor whether we stand or sit, or recline; but it is essential that we believe Christ's word: "This is my blood—this is my body."

It isn't essential that we believe men's dogmas and imaginings about the second coming of Christ, but it is essential that we believe the revealed fact that Christ will come again to judge the living and the dead.

It isn't essential that we have hierarchical, Episcopal, Presbyterial, or Congregational form of government, but it is essential that Christ be recognized as the Head of the Church.

In fact the non-essentials, which men have embodied in their creeds as essentials are numerous, and have wrought great injury, dividing the Christians and hindering the spread of the gospel. It is a fact that they who are most steadfast in the essentials, are most tolerant in the non-essentials.

And in conclusion, I believe that we could make greater progress toward this more perfect Union by re-christening the denominations; for some of the existing names are memorials of strife, or they indicate methods that challenge opposition. Why should one care to label himself Methodist, Presbyterian, or Congregationalist, as though his most notable features of religion was attachment to a certain kind of church government. Why does one wish to write the name Baptist, or Episcopal, on his church house when the name does not stand for a ceremony that is saving rite. Most of these names recall bitter fights that are no longer waged with any vigor, and none of these names can be said to foster the spirit of unity. Why not go back and call themselves Christians or Disciples, or some other significant name? May we all try to get more and more together if by so doing we can meet our Armageddon the better.—Amen.—From a sermon by Rev. L. W. Swope, Shelby, N. C.

THE GOODNES OF THE LORD

Can we see the goodness of the Lord, or must we simply believe him? Is there any tangible evidence of it, or is it merely a comfortable theory to make life tolerable and its ills in some fashion supportable?

It is too much to ask or expect of men that they should believe in a goodness of which there is no present sign. It is too much to demand of men that they shall postpone all values of living for the deferred dividends of the life to come. Beautiful as heaven may be, we want something of heaven now. It is a comfort to believe, and we have a right to believe in a world God's plans will be more perfectly understood, but both we and the Psalmist would have fainted if we had not believed to see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living.

We have seen it. The world has been standing long enough and has kept a sufficiently accurate record of its own history to enable us to discover something of the plan of God for human life. Small as is our knowledge of astronomy, we have watched the stars long enough to know that the planets which seem to us to be moving first east and then west, and with a motion now rapid, now slow, are keeping straight on in their majestic curves, and their aparent forward and retrograde motion is caused by the earth now moving from them, now overtaking and passing the. There is no chaos about perfectly balanced order; there is an unerring adjustment of force; there is a rhythmic action that is timed to the fraction of a second. The plan of God is failing nowhere in the movements of the stars.

We have seen something of the same in human history. We know that even Gethsemane had its meaning in the godnes of God. We know that even Christ almost fainted under the cross, but that that cross which lifted him high above the earth drew all men closer to the heart of God. We can understand that some of the saddest disapointments of human life have overflowed with meanings of goodness and grace. Both we and the saints of the olden time have this to comfort us: that we have seen at least this much of the goodness of God.

But some one may answer that this is not in the land of the living. The examples of God's goodness of the past are almost as elusive as our hopes of God's goodness in the future. The future and the past are both dead, and we want to see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living.

In some measure we are able to discern that we are coming to see that what we call the laws of nature must be either all bad or all good. Diverse as they seem, they are too consistent to proceed from conflicting authorities. We are either in a hopelessly bad world or in a world with no moral order, or else we are in a growingly good world. We are not in a world where the mixed plans of warring gods or tangled fates are working out the destinies of man.

There is

"One God, one law, one element,
And one far-off divine event
To which the whole creation moves."

But we are not confined to the world of nature for our observations. Increasingly the sphere of human activity discloses itself as the field of divine providence. What men are doing to make the world better is a part of the workmanship of God. The growing life in the soul of man becomes evident to any but the most purblind beholder. The public is demanding of its officials and of its men of wealth a measure of responsibility and a standard of personal and corporate righteousness which the world never has known before. Even the disclosures of evil in high places show little that is peculiar to our modern times, excepting the fact that these evils are more certainly ferreted out and more surely punished than in any previous day of the world. The signs of the times are not wholly reassuring; but there certainly is an awakened public conscience, a demand that men shall assume the full measure of their responsibility and deal with their fellow men in high honor and righteousness. The prophet promised that the "fool shall be no more called noble, nor the churl said to be bountiful." (Isa. xxxii. 5.) That time has nearly come. There never has been a time when mere wealth or power counted for so little in the world, when that wealth or power was not guided by conscience and directed for the well-being of humanity.

The officeholder who administers his office on the theory that "to the victor belong the spoils" is now recognized as belonging to a past geological stratum. Such men exist, of course, and administer their offices on that basis, but the theory is discredited. They are survivors; they are doomed to take their place with the megatherium and the plesiosaurus. A man of large wealth living wholly to himself, even if he is not a bad man, is called by the public to stern account. It says to him: "Thou wicked and slothful servant, thou oughtest to have invested thy money for the welfare of humanity." The time is surely coming when such a man will have his talent snatched violently from him by an awakened public righteousness.—The Advance.

THE MIRACLE OF LOVE.

BY ELIZABETH KING MAURER.

"See here, Ellen True, you straighten up, breathe deeply, and stop whimpering," she said to herself. "The world and its good things haven't come to an end yet, even though your furniture has been gone three months and all that time you have been pushed from pillar to post."

The girl got up from the window-ledge, the only seat in the room, and fingered the broken window-fastener.

"Yes, that's where they came in and got every jot and tittle while I was down town giving lessons in the studio. All the time those two lawyers assured me that the loan sharks had no legal right to take anything. It looks as if they were all conniving together." Her eyelids prickled with the pain that forebode tears.

"Five dollars a month interest on $100 for six months and $40 on the principal; then they sell the note to another man and he comes and offers to settle for $89. When my lawyers say I needn't, and that they will fix it, the justice of the peace out here gives the loan men the right to remove the furniture. But there, you baby, don't nurse your grievances. Go out into the open air and think of your blessings." Away she went to her favorite bench in the park. The warm spring sunshine brought peace into her heart.

"My Dorothy's eyes are well and she's stronger every day. What if the operation did take all my money and more, too! Think of what my precious sister has undergone, and here I am ready to complain at a few inconveniences! Why, that's really nothing but a cinder in my eye."

Yet the crisis had now come in her affairs. When the furniture was removed from her flat in the suburbs the usual gossips had "wondered," "heard" and "supposed" until one by one her pupils had left her. Several friends had asked her to stay with them indefinitely, but in a few days there had been those subtle indications that the guest had outworn her welcome. Her lessons downtown now scarcely more than paid rental of flat and studio. She never confessed to herself this critical situation.

"I will admit it's a bit inconvenient to have only thirty-seven cents left. In fact, it's quite an annoyance to be as hungry as I am. But the Lord carried my glorious Dorothy through until she's back in college, and I am going to trust Him to the end."

What step could she take now? For now she seemed checkmated at every turn. An idea came to her.

"I am no object of charity, but I am going to the Legal Aid Society." Up she jumped so quickly that her one remaining bun rolled off into the water. In half an hour she was there, explaining her case rather breathlessly. There was Miss Gates, a good lawyer, they suggested. In another hour she was telling the whole story to a bright-eyed, earnest woman. Miss Gates had released many a victim from the entangling meshes of the loan sharks' webs. Her rapid fire of questions, therefore, quickly made her acquainted with the illegal usury, the seizure of a piano not named in the mortgage but added afterward in the remaining blank space, the false representations of the loan agents to the justice of the peace and his ignorance of his own duties, the damage in the moving of the furniture and the taking of silverware and books not belonging to Miss True.

Miss Gates explained carefully and simply to her client the legal technicalities involved in the case and the necesary steps to be taken. Within three days the furniture was brought back to the flat in the suburbs and suit had been begun against both loan men.

Ellen's affairs had indeed taken a turn for the better. But so great had been the complication of evils that even her dauntless heart still beat with fear. She was penniless; her rent was due; her clothes were shabby and too worn for the rapidly advancing spring; she had no food; only a few pupils remained.

In the solitude of her studio she could think, hope, pray. "How weak my faith is now when nothing but my own prosperity is threatened! So foolishly do I worry! Do I not know that in God's world things do not happen?" Her mind was ever reverting to her sister, saved and happy.

"Why are Dorothy's eyes cured? Because I couldn't have the operation earlier, for that wasn't the Lord's time; so Dr. Emmel, the only man in the world who could do the work, was here from Vienna just at the time when I could have the operation. I just am going to be brave," she said sturdily.

It was a supreme effort. Her head sank wearily on the desk. She tried to think, but there remained only courage enough to make herself feel cast under the protecting care of a beneficent God.

She must have slept, but as one through dreams living in another world. She started up and went into the hall to look for her mail. On the bench was a purse. Mechanically she picked it up and took it into the studio. In it were a few dollars and two checks, signed, but with the amount not written in. Could she——?

In that one instant of time Ellen True, worn out with the trials and tragedies of life, penniless, in debt, livelihood threatened, friends fleeing away, rose and went forward into a new sphere of life. For in the possible temptation there flashed into her soul the realization of the soul-struggle of the criminal. Like Emerson, she felt herself bound in one great human chain with all her fellow-beings, good or bad.

Weakened by the very force of the terrible soul-flash of light, she hurriedly took the purse down to the office. The owner had not inquired, they said, but they would attned to the matter. On her return to the studio she again sank into a lethargy, oblivious to all trouble. A tap on the door aroused her and there entered a well-dressed woman. Ellen hoped to herself that the newcomer had half-a-dozen musically inclined children.

"You are Miss True?"

"Yes."

"I am Mrs. Marshall. I have to thank you most heartily for finding my purse. I am sometimes very careless."

"Won't you sit down?" Ellen was very glad to have this friendly woman to talk and listen to. They spoke of a recent series of concerts, of the taste of the public in opera, of all sorts of musical matters.

"Miss True, began Mrs. Marshall abruptly, "isn't there anything I can do for you?"

"No, thank you."

"Really?"

"No."

Mrs. Marshall's eyes were searching sympathetically through to the soul of the girl sitting opposite. She hesitated a moment, then said quietly, "Can I not lend you some money?"

Unkindness or additional ill-luck would have left Ellen, accustomed as she was to it, stoically cold. The magic of sympathy did what all women will understand. She began weeping piteously. And Mrs. Marshall, with that gentle wisdom of the heart, said never a word, but Ellen felt the warm friendly arms about her. The story came out, Mrs. Marshall was the wife of a millionaire. She was offering to lend Ellen all the money she needed.

Over Ellen's face there came joy, peace, reverence. Because she could await her trial, when her name would be cleared? No.

Because she could regain her pupils and start work again? No.

No, these factors all made for tangible happiness and prosperity; but far deeper and holier was the joy in her heart that faith was a living force; that she was part of a great whole; that being put here on this earth to fulfill her highest powers, she was under the protection of the Great Omniscience.

"This," said Ellen prayerfully, "is my miracle."—Advocate and Guardian.

FROM OUR PASTORS

Halifax Circuit.

It has been so long since I wrote anything for the Herald some things which I will mention may seem a little out of date. So far we have held four revival meetings with reasonably good results. We began the revival at Eden first Sunday in August with a large crowd in attendance. On Monday morning Rev. G. L. Curry came and did the preaching until the meeting closed Thursday afternoon. Bro. Curry's preaching was highly enjoyed by everybody who attended the meeting. There were about eight conversions and several reclamations. Four joined the church the day the meeting closed and one has joined since then.

Second Sunday in August we began the revival at Bethesda with Rev. A. G. Dixon as pulpit help. It is needless to say the people enjoyed Brother Dixon's preaching for it was with unusual force and earnestness. There was one conversion and one accession with a real good revival among the church members.

Third Sunday we began at Lee's Chapel. Rev. C. L. Whitaker came on Monday and did all the preaching thereafter. Here the Spirit was present from the very beginning and great good was accomplished. There were six conversions and five accessions. Bro. Whitaker preached the word with great zeal and the people were highly pleased. In this meeting one man 64 years old, a justice of the peace and said to be the largest man physically in the county, was converted and he and his wife and daughter united with the church.

The fourth Sunday in August we found ourselves at Ringwood with Bro. R. C. Stubbins as pulpit help. The day was somewhat rainy and the congregation somewhat small but as the weather got better the congregations increased. The meeting closed on Thursday night. Bro. Stubbins preached the word very acceptably. In fact he was not a stranger here, having helped here five years ago. Our sincere thanks to all these brethren for their help.

Our third quarterly conference convened some time ago. Bro. J. W. Hardee was declared elected delegate to Conference and Bro. N. M. Harrison, Sr., alternate. Since my last report two children's day services have been held. One at the McDonald schoolhouse, run by members of Eden church, and the other by Bro. H. C. Neal's S. S. at the Weeks' schoolhouse. The offering at the former was $11.05, while at the latter it was $25.00. The latter was 38 cents per member, and comes next to Bethesda, which made an offering of 43 cents per member. The children's day offering for the circuit this year amounted to $74.88 as against $25.00 a year ago.

Our Teachers' Training class at Bethesda is still progressing nicely. A large class has been organized at Eden and will meet twice a month—first Sunday night and Wednesday night after third Sunday.

Extensive improvements have been made at Eden, and at Union the new church will soon be begun. A nice sum has also been raised to repair Ringwood church. Also the long wished-for windows have been put in recess of pulpit at Lee's Chapel.

Miss Annie Louise Wills has gone to teach in the graded schools at Winston-Salem; Miss Agnes Wills is teaching music near Red Springs; N. M. Harrison, Jr., and sister, Miss Frances, will return to Western Md. College next week and Miss Emma Lewis Vinson will go to the Louisburg College.

The pastor's wife, who has been in Randolph and Chatham counties a month, for her health, is expected home next week.

Our young friend, N. M. Harrison, Jr., will preach at Bethesda tomorrow. Since leaving college in June he has been traveling in N. Y. and made a trip into Canada. J. E. Pritchard.

Spring Church and Greenville Cts.

We began our special meetings the 4th Sunday in July at Matthews Chapel. A good meeting in some respects: good in the church; unsaved would not come in the house, or would leave as soon as invitation was given. One conversion. Some to join church next Sunday.

First Sunday in August at Hobbs' Chapel. A good meting from start to finish. Many conversions and reclamations. Bro. Troxler was my help. Preaching earnest and inspiring. Six joined the church, others to join yet.

Second Sunday in August, Ebenezer. No pulpit help, but a good meeting. Six conversions, two united with the church. This church for years has been very weak, but is now taking on to the work in an inspiring way. It has already paid the pastor's salary in full. We are expecting others to join yet there this year.

Third Sunday in August, at Wesley's Chapel. Meeting not what we had expected, but probably we expect too great things. Some conversions, no accessions as yet. This church is also growing in power and influence in the community. Congregations were large all the time.

Fourth Sunday in August, Spring Church. Bro. Cecil and Bro. Hutton with us. Bro. Hutton was sick part of the time but gave some timely aid. Six conversions and reclamations, one accession.

Fifth Sunday in August, Philadelphia. Bro. Hutton, pulpit help. Large congregations, good attention. Everybody just delighted with Bro. Hutton's preaching. More than twenty conversions, nine united with our church. Three go to M. E. S. Church, and there are others that are to join later. We are expecting to make some improvements on this church that will add greatly to its appearance.

First Sunday in September at Lebanon, Bro. O'Bryant as help. Another good meeting. "The people had a mind to work." And they did effective work, too. Fifteen or more conversions, eight joined our church, one goes to the Baptist church. Our meetings have resulted in more than fifty conversions, twenty-six accessions so far, with several others yet to join. Several that were converted in our meetings have already joined other churches. In all it has been a good year so far. We have confined ourselves strictly to the Bible and Bible methods in all our revival work. Have used no "cut and dried" plans. Results have justified us. J. A. Ledbetter.

La Grange.

Our meeting at Harrie Chapel began the 6th Sunday in August and closed the first Sunday in September. Rev. W. C. Lassiter was with us from Sunday till Friday and did the preaching. We had services at 11 A. M. and 8 P. M. every day except Wednesday, Sept. third when we had the terrible storm that swept over eastern Carolina. Bro. Lassiter did some good, safe and plain preaching which was enjoyed by the congregations. We were glad he came and hope he can come again to see and preach to our people down here. Several manifested an interest in their salvation. Mr. M. B. Holland joined the church.

Yesterday we held regular services at Hickory Grove. Our revival will begin there next Sunday and continue through the following Sunday. Rev. W. M. Pike is to do the preaching.

NOTICE.

Rev. Chas. J. Edwards will assist me in two meetings. The first one at Rehoboth church the fourth week in September beginning at eleven o'clock on Sunday. The other meeting at Mt. Hermon the first Sunday in October, beginning at eleven o'clock. Those who see this notice will please let it be known as widely as possible. Also, begin praying now for the meetings.

Yours in service.

Linley W. Gerringer, Pastor.

Asheville.

Yesterday was the time appointed for turning in the talents which were given out six weeks ago to the members of the Sunday school. The day was stormy, so only half of those who took the talents were present to report. The fifteen who reported had increased the dollar and a half that was given to them to the splendid total of $23.77. One little girl, Ethel, the daughter of our good brother J. M. Blackwelder, had increased her talent (ten cents) sixty-five times. We expect the other talent holders to report next Sunday, and are looking for them to double the amount already reported. It was certainly a thing to make a preacher's heart glad to see the folks work their schemes. We expect to give the talents out again next Sunday. The results were so good, and came so easily, that the talent holders do not want to quit with this one effort.

The architect has finished the plans and specifications, they have been advertised, and the contractors are preparing their estimates. The sealed bids are to be in the hands of the building committee this coming Monday. We are expecting to let the contract the next day.

The members in of this church is very grateful indeed to the architect, Mr. T. E. Davis, for his exceeding kindness. He has prepared the plans and specifications and placed himself at our disposal for any service he can render, with the intention of supervising the work, as far as his limited time will permit, until the building is completed. And the only charge he is making is for the cost of the materials that he has used in making the plans, which, he tells us, will not exceed three dollars. This means a clear saving to us of not less than forty or fifty ollars.

The membership has raised in the last two weeks for the church building fund the sum of one hundred and thirty-seven dollars. We shall make no appeal for assistance from our friends throughout the conference until the work actually starts. But in the meantime, we want to serve notice to those who made pledges to Miss Jessie Williams two years ago, that we will need the money they pledged and will expect it to begin to come in, according to agreement, as soon as the contract is let. It will save an infinite amount of extra work by one who already has his hands full if this notice is regarded as sufficient. You will make all drafts, money-orders or checks payable to J. E. Swain, Treas. Asheville, N. C. is the post office.

Be assured that the membership here is aroused to the work of building as it never was before, and that it is putting forth every effort to advance the work. And do not forget, as you pray, that this is the greatest church enterprise that the North Carolina conference has undertaken in many years: big, not in the amount of money that is to be invested in it (there are other churches in the conference costing considerably more money than we expect to put into this), but in its influence upon the conference, and upon this western country. C. W. B.

MONROE CIRCUIT.

Our first special meeting was held at Rose Hill beginning July 20th. Rev. D. A. Braswell our pulpit help; good results. Second meeting began Aug. 2d at New Hope, Rev. J. W. Quick and Bro. A. D. Haywood as help, with good results.

Our third special meeting began Aug. 9th at Mt. Moriah, Rev. A. B. Haywood as help; results 10 conversions and church greatly revived.

Our fourth began at New Salem, near Marshville, Sunday, Aug. 17th, without any ministerial help, but yet the Lord blessed the church and saved sinners.

Our third quarterly conference was held with Bethesda church on Saturday evening, Aug. 23. Bro. W. L. Marze was elected delegate to Annual Conference. Rev. D. A. Braswell preached for us at night and during the week. Results: 49 conversions, 10 accessions to the church. Our sixth and last special meeting began at Bear Creek Saturday night, Aug. 30th, Rev. D. A. Braswell our help; 22 conversions. We told our people that if they did not repent by the preaching of Bro. Braswell, they will not repent though one rose from the dead. The number of the reclaimed and converted on the charge, 110, and 22 accessions to the church.

Yours fraternally. O. D. Stacy.

THE CHILDREN'S HOME AND THE MAN IN IT.

Our Children's Home enterprise from its very inception over at Denton until the present has been handled by the best of management. The good management has inspired confidence; the worthy cause has appealed strongly to our people and they have responded liberally. Both facts—the good management and the liberal response—are evidenced by the splendid building in which the Home is now quartered and operating.

Not only has the good management inspired confidence on the part of the people to respond liberally; but the liberal response has inspired the management to believe that the people will stand by, and under, and behind the enterprise and see to it that it shall not suffer for lack of funds.

Hence an appeal has been issued that this month be made "Children's Home month" in all the churches. It is confidently believed that this appeal will bring a liberal response to this worthy cause, now so big in the hearts of the people.

The Man and the Woman in the Home.

But to my thinking no part of the management has excelled the selection of superintendent. I have known him since he was just "Lendo" (Arlendo) Garrett, a boy inthe "old field" school and a boy on the farm. For kindness of disposition, firmness of character, for sterling worth no boy excelled him. The fact is he had a grown up disposition and character when he was a boy. Having brought these principles from boyhood up to manhood, and having lived by them and acted upon them all the time, we have as superintendent of the Home that kind of man you can trust and he will not betray your trust. And his wife—she is another of the same kind of person. Whatever you may say as to disposition, or character, or trustworthiness of the superintendent or of his wife you may put ditto marks under it for the other. T. M. Johnsonn.

FROM LOCAL REPORTERS

Thomasville.

Our services at this place are well attended, and we are well paid for going to church.

Bro. Williams preaches some strong, helpful sermons, which give us much encouragement in our work.

Our Sunday school is steadily growing under the management of our superintendent, Bro. D. R. Connell, who is constantly on the job, not being absent a single time during this year.

Attendance on last Sunday, the 7th, was as follows:

Present	214
On roll	384
Offering	$5.41

Attendance a year ago:

Present	99
On roll	197
Offering	$1.97

This indicates our growth for the year, which is about 100 per cent. We think that we are well rewarded for our constant work in bringing so many boys and girls (both large and small) to the front.

The young men seem to be more enthusiastic in the work than they have ever shown themselves at this place.

We had 105 present in the Baraca Class on the date above mentioned, which we think is a good record for a class only organized about a year ago. This class is composed of boys, young men and the middle aged (mostly young men).

It does us good to see how punctual they are in reporting each Sabbath morning.

We hope that this institution may be the starting point for those that haven't found Christ, that they may become consecrated Christian men and be shining lights in this forward movement of Christianity.

Our series of meetings will begin on the first Sunday in October. Our pastor will be assisted by Bro. D. R. Williams of High Point.

Let us look forward with prayerful hearts for a great outpouring of the Holy Spirit at this place.

We are in need of a great revival here. Too many souls are adrift that should be rescued and to succeed means much work and earnest prayer.

Success to the Herald.

G. H. White, Sec. S. S.

Moriah, Tabernacle Ct.

Bro. Johnson met with us as usual last Sunday afternoon and delivered a very practical sermon. If we would try as hard to live right as Bro. Johnson tries to teach us, I feel sure we would enjoy life more, or at least we would get more out of it. Right after preaching the members discussed the question of building a new church for the last time, and it was decided in favor of it. We are going to save our old church for S. S. rooms; another thought that we are proud of: over three-fourths of the money has been subscribed and seven men stood for the rest. The work will not begin till after Thanksgiving. It makes us feel good to think of our new church and we know it is pleasing in God's sight.

The third quarterly conference met at Moriah Aug. 26th. Business was transacted in harmony. Mr. Peter Hardin was elected delegate to our Annual Conference.

We are glad to report that our sick ones are all still improving. We hope they will soon be able to meet with us real soon.

With love to readers of Herald,

Lillie Sharpe, Reporter.

HALIFAX CIRCUIT.

Eden S. S. No. 3.

Our school has been moving along very nicely; have had good attendance every Sunday, even better than we expected, as August is generally a month for revivals in our neighborhood. We held our children's day service first Sunday in this month at Eden. Had all day service, children's service in the morning and preaching in the afternoon by our pastor. Each child deserves special praise. Every one rendered their part well. We are very much indebted to Mrs. Eugene Hamill for help in training the children. Also to Mr. Dozier, Mr. Minshaw and Mrs. H. C. Alston for their help in singing. Our collection for foreign missions was $25.00. Our school is about four months old, with 64 on roll. Since it was organized we have bought twenty song books, raised $5.00 for the Orphans Home at High Point, N. C., and have some money in treasury.

Sincerely, Lessie Parks.

UNION CHAPEL, MOCKSVILLE CIRCUIT.

We have been silent for a while, but not idle. Our special meeting at Union Chapel church commenced the first Sunday in August and continued until Friday, with Bro. T. E. Davis as pulpit help. Don't think our pastor could have wished for any better. They did some good preaching and some very effective work. There were some conversions and some reclaimed, but not the result we hoped to see, although there were obstacles in the way; but they were gotten out Wednesday at 11 A. M. We had a good meeting almost every service, but it was a hard pull; had it not been for such effective preaching the result could not have been what it was. We are getting on very well with C. E. Society. We are now to have a prayer meeting service at our church once a week. It begins Wednesday eve, the 10th. Our Sabbath school is quite small at present, on account of the special meetings at other churches; but they will soon be over. The collection in our Sunday school September 14 is for the Children's Home. We have just been anxious about this. Seemed our collections have had to go to other places, but hope from this on we can do better.

Greetings to the Herald.

Mrs. J. B. Robertson, Rep.

Sept. 9, 1913.

Burlington.

Our Sunday school attendance was 174 Sunday morning, a decrease of 13 as compared with the preceding Sunday. Our attendance during the summer months has fallen below the average, but now that the summer is gone and the dawn of the autumn season is smiling upon us, we shall expect a large increase in our attendance during the next few weeks.

Owing to the fact that the committee, appointed to arrange for a series of special metings, has been unable to secure pulpit help, our special meetings will not begin next Sunday, as was previously announced. We hope to be able to announce next week the date on which the meeting will begin.

Mrs. Annie Kinney, probably the oldest members of our church, died last Friday and was buried the following day. Funeral service was conducted at the church by our pastor. Mrs. Kinney was about 81 years of age, and leaves several sons and daughters, one of whom is Rev. James Kinney, a Baptist minister, who resides in South Carolina. For several years Mrs. Kinney lived with her daughter, Mrs. Amelia Steward. She united with the church in early life, and was a woman of excellent Christian character. For many years she had been in poor health, and continued to grow worse until the end came. We feel sure that the church extends sympathy to the bereaved relatives and friends of the departed sister.

Rev. R. M. Andrews, our former Sunday school superintendent, was in our town last Friday. He is a frequent visitor here and always gives us a word of good cheer and encouragement.

Rev. L. W. Gerringer, who is pastor of a charge in the eastern part of the State, spent a few days last week here

A STORY OF LONG-AGO CHINA.

Long ago in the land of China there lived a mandarin who was ruler of a city and the country and villages round about. Every mandarin is called "the father and the mother of his people," and this one really loved his people. He had a good friend, too, with whom he used to talk over plans for helping the people. This friend was second in power to the mandarin, and he wished he could know the hearts of the people. So one day he dressed himself in rags and changed the look of his face so that he seemed to be very old. He wrote on his back the Chinese words that mean: "I am old and poor. My cup contains no water and my bowl no rice." Then he walked through the city, not asking for help, but hoping always that some one would show kindness to him.

But everywhere people laughed at him. Day after day he walked, and day after day he was laughed at. But at last a man and woman in whose home there was no a-kong (grandfather) said to him, "Will you not come and live with us and be the a-kong of our home?"

Very gladly he accepted. Day after day they cared for him; day by day the neighbors laughed at them for befriending an old man who could not help them work in their fields, but who only ate their food. But they answered: "He is old and cannot work, and has no one to care for him."

The official, after many days, thought he would test them still more to see if their love and respect for him were sincere. So as he was carrying their child, which he liked to do, he purposely fell, and of course the child fell, too. The young people hurried to them and began to help the a-kong from the ground.

"Help the child," he said. "I am an old man; help him"

But they said: "He is young, and you are old. No harm will come to him. We will help you."

Then he was sure that their love for him was sincere. He wrote a letter and told the young man to carry it to the magistrate. "I am afraid to go," the man said. "I do not dare."

"No, don't be afraid. Go," said the a-kong.

When the magistrate received the letter that told of his friend's experience and asked him to send back a package, he called in the young man and gave him the bundle to cary back to the a-kong. He carried it back to his home; and when it was opened, beautiful jackets and suits were taken out for the family as well as the clothes of the official himself. The mark of honor, a hat with a button on the top that meant that the wearer was of high rank, was given to the young man who had brought it from the mandarin's house.

The man and his wife were astonished and delighted, too, as the a-kong told that, though they had thought he was a poor man, he was really a great official.

"You have been very kind to me," he said. "I cannot forget it."

He went back to his own home, but he did not forget them. He sent the child to the best schools until he was well educated and at last became a magistrate. And so they have all lived and died a happy family.—Edith G. Travers, in World Wide.

THE ROD OF GOLD.

Once upon a time an old woman, who had been walking through a wood, came at last to the open country beyond. Just before her flowed a stream which she must cross on her way.

She seemed feeble, and, when the bank of the river was reached, she stopped in dread, for the current was swift and the stones were slippery and unsafe.

She glanced about her at the trees for she must have help. A great oak stood near with its beautiful leaves and many acorns. "Kind Oak," said the old woman, "May I have part of one of your branches to make a rod to help me over the stream?"

"Indeed no," cried the oak, "I can not spare a single branch: my acorns are far too beautiful to give away."

Then the old woman went to a red maple standing near the oak and said, "Will you be kind to me and spare a branch from which I may make a staff to carry me over the river?"

"Of course not, " said the maple. "Could you imagine I would spare any of my beautiful red leaves?"

The old woman turned sadly away. A chestnut tree stood near and she appealed to it. "Good Chestnut, may I have one of your branches?" she asked. But the chestnut tree could not spare a single nut and so refused.

The sycamore thought her balls too pretty to part with, and the poplar stood tall and disagreable and would not help her.

The elm drooped languidly and told her she might ask the walnut. And so it went: hickory, ash, horsechestnut, and birch tree all said "no," till the poor woman, quite discouraged and tired out, sank on a great stone, to rest, and decide what was best to be done.

At her feet lay a stick, old and discolored, but straight and strong.

It spoke to the old woman and said, "I'm sorry the beautiful trees have been so unkind to you, and I will help you gladly if I may. You see I have no beauty, I do not even know to what tree I belong, I have no acorns, nor nuts, nor leaves, and even my bark is gone, but I am strong and will gladly take you over the stream."

The old woman picked up the poor rod at her feet, and, leaning heavily upon it, started on her journey across the river. The water roared about them, but the rod bore her in safety to the other side.

When the farther bank was reached, a wonderful thing happened. The long cloak worn by the old woman fell away, and there she stood—not really an old woman at all but a beautiful fairy. "I am the fairy of the woods, kind Rod," she said, "I came to see if my trees were kind as well as beautiful. You have done all in your power for a feeble old woman, now what can I do for you?"

The rod replied: "I should like to be beautiful, but most of all I want to be loved, especially by the children."

"You shall have your wish," said the fairy. "You are worth your weight in gold, but the rod of gold would not be loved by little ones. I will give to you fairy gold instead."

She planted the rod in the earth and it at once became green. From it grew beautiful little leaves and many stems, and over all the fairy scattered millions of tiny stars of fairy gold till the top of the plant looked like sunshine.

"Hereafter you shall be called 'Golden-rod,' " said the fairy, "and every one shall love you."

And what the fairy said has come to pass. The lovely golden-rod has been showing her yellow stars in our meadows ever since that day and we all love her, do we not?—Sophie Brown, in Christian Intelligencer.

WELCOMING THE TRUTH.

Let there be many windows in your soul,
That all the glory of the universe
May beautify it. Not the narrow pane
Of one poor creed can catch the radiant rays
That shine from countless sources. Tear away
The blinds of superstition: let the light
Pour through fair windows, broad as truth itself
And high as heaven. . . . Tune your ear
To all the wordless music of the stars
And to the voice of nature, and your heart
Shall turn to truth and goodness as the plant
Turns to the sun. A thousand unseen hands
Reach down to help you to their peace-crowned heights,
And all the forces of the firmament
Shall fortify your strength. Be not afraid
To thrust aside half-truths and grasp the whole.

GOD OF THE OPEN AIR.

These are the gifts I ask
Of thee, Spirit serene;
Strength for the daily task,
Courage to face the road,
Good cheer to help me bear the traveler's load,
And for the hours of rest that come between,
An inward joy in all things heard and seen.

These are the things I prize
And hold of dearest worth:
Light of the sapphire skies,
Peace of the silent hills,
Shelter of forests, comfort of the grass,
Music of birds, murmurs of little rills,
Shadows of clouds that swiftly pass,
And after showers,
The smell of flowers
And of the good brown earth,
And best of all along the way,
Friendship and mirth.

So let me keep
These treasures of the humble heart
In true possession, owning them by love.

SELF-HELP.

"After I had been in the hospital for a while I was completely spoiled. I was so used to being waited on that I resented it as an injury when the nurse made me wash my own face. If she hadn't insisted on my getting out of bed I should have been there yet."

Very probably the experience is not uncommon. It is so easy to be an invalid and to be waited upon that those whose vitality has fallen below the normal may readily drift into that condition, and this is true not only of bodily weakness. We are accustomed to a certain manner of life, and we resent it if God asks us to do for ourselves something that He has hitherto done for us. Yet He knows that the only way to save us from being weaklings all our lives is to throw us on our own resources. We shall find that we have unsuspected reservoirs of strength within us if we once try to do the thing we have always supposed we could not do, but which God seems plainly to ask of us. He is not treating us unjustly. His former favors give us no right to claim that He continue them forever. He knows that we are strong enough to walk alone now, and He wants us to exercise that strength in order that it may grow. Let us be glad that we have the opportunity, and pray Kipling's prayer, which gives the true motive for self-reliance:

Help me to need no help of men,
That I may help such men as need.

A VISIT TO THE CHILDREN'S HOME.

On my way to enter school at Elon College I spetn a night with my sister, Mrs. J. W. Austin, and went out to view the Children's Home, also to see the children to whom I had become very much attached during a few weeks' stay in the Home at Denton two years ago.

I noticed marked change in the children and it indeed makes your heart glad to see their bright happy faces; but why should they not be happy in such a beautiful and comfortable home and under the care of such noble Christian people as Mr. and Mrs. Garrett and Miss Redding?

I think Mr. Garrett is the right man in the right place. As he showed me the building from basement to garret and spoke of the different things they hope to do as the days go by, I thought that he had no other interest but to the upbuilding of the Children's Home and the training of the boys and girls in his care to noble manhood and womanhood.

When I think of the wonderful progress that has been made in the work of the Children's Home in the three years, I wonder what our church can do along other lines if only we would make a united effort. Let us each one remember Mr. Garrett and his co-workers, not only with our means but with our prayers. May God's blesings rest upon the Home.

CLASS REUNION.

Dear Comrades and Sunday-School Workers: I am requested to announce that Brother A. J. Luck, a S. S. teacher at Giles Chapel 37 years ago (1876) desires to meet his old class in Sunday school at Giles Chapel next Sunday, the 21st, at 10 o'clock, that hour being set apart for a reunion of all that belonged to his class 37 years ago. He says they are all living. (Something very remarkable indeed). I cordially invite all who attended the S. S. many years ago, that we that are still living may have an opportunity to meet again at the old home church before we pass over on the other side.

Many of our Sunday school comrades have passed away, and those that remain are certainly living monuments of God's love and mercy. Again, I cordially invite you one and all, and our old superintendent, Rev. J. L. Giles, in particular. Remember the hour, 10 o'clock, third Sunday, September 21st.

Fraternally,

J. C. Allred, Supt.

POPULAR TALKS ON LAW.

What Nature Adds to the Land.

By Walter K. Towers, A. B., J. D., of the Michigan Bar.

John Goddard was the owner of an Iowa farm which he leased to James Elickson for the year of 1890. On the second day of May in this year an aerolite passed over Northern Iowa. Peter Hoagland lived on a farm adjoining the Goddard property and it chanced that a member of his family watched the meteor and saw it plunge to earth on the adjoining property. Being told of this and directed to the spot where it seemed to fall Hoagland went onto the Goddard farm the next day and discovered the meteorite buried in the groud to a depth of three feet. Elickson the tenant was present, but offered no objection, and Hoagland dug up the visitor from the heavens and transported it to his house, claiming it for his own—probably believing in the doctrine of "finders keepers."

Three days later as opportunity offered Hoagland sold the meteorite to H. V. Winchell, then Professor of Geology at the University of Wisconsin. When John Goddard heard of this he immediately felt that as the aerolite had fallen on his property it had become his and that Hoagland had no rights therein. He decided to enforce his rights against Professor Winchell. Winchell having purchased from Hoagland had no better rights than the man from whom he bought. If Hoagland had no rights to the meteorite Winchell could not retain it against the claims of the rightful owner.

The court which tried the case ruled that the finder had no rights in the fallen mass, but that it became the property of the person who owned the land upon which it fell. Thus when it fell upon Goddard's farm it became part of that farm, real property belonging to Goddard. The court viewed it as much a part of the farm as the stones that might be upon it. They insisted it was not lost matter with no owner to which any finder might lay claim.

In deciding the case the judge said:

"Through the action of the elements, wind and water, the soil of one man is taken and deposited in the field of another; and thus all over the country, we may say, changes are constantly going on. By these natural causes the owners of the soil are giving and taking as the wisdom of the controlling forces shall determine. By these operations one may be affected wtih a substantial gain, and another by a similar loss. These gains are of accretion, and the deposit becomes the property of the owner of the soil on which it is made."

Thus we notice the rule of law that changes made by natural forces must be allowed to stand. If a river washes away a portion of a person's land, that soil cannot be pursued and brought back. An owner may keep it at home, but once gone his title has vanished. If by the action of the waters, or the winds, or any other natural forces additions are made to the body of a person's land the additions become part and parcel of the land and the property of the owner of that land. These additions are what the law terms accretions.

John Deerfield owned a tract of land through which ran Buck Creek. He sold to Alson Arms a farm of about sixty acres, one boundary being Buck Creek. Buck Creek gradually shifted its course, year by year, depositing soil against Arms' land. In the course of a few years several acres had thus been added. Deerfield claimed that this property had not been transferred to Arms but that he still owned it and could use or transfer it. He contended this the more strongly as he still owned the property on the other side of the stream upon which the stream had encroached thus leaving additional land upon the other side. He insisted that the property lines should remain as they were when he granted the land and that the soil left by the stream when shifting across properly belonged to him. The court refused to adopt his view and ruled that the added soil which had come to Arms gradually, year by year, was his, and that Deerfield could not follow what had been lost to him by the forces of nature.

John Halsey and Warren McCormick owned farms on opposite sides of Mad River, the stream forming the boundary between them. One Spring day when the water was running at flood tide the river broke through onto some low land on Halsey's property cutting its way across a neck of land and eventually establishing a new channel within Halsey's boundaries leaving several acres on the other side of the stream. McCormick claimed that as the river was the boundary between their properties he now held title to the new channel, just as though the stream had shifted gradually cutting away ground from the inside of the bend on Halsey's land and depositing the soil on the outside of the bend on his land. The differences between the men were taken to court and it was ruled that the boundaries of he farms remained those of the original channel, the sudden change not affecting the title of either party. They had formerly held to the thread of the old stream and now their boundary was the line that had marked the thread of the old channel.

Thus a distinction is drawn between gradual and sudden changes. Sudden shifting of streams does not work changes in the boundaries of property, whereas the gradual shifting means a shifting of boundaries. Thus to amount to accretion which will give title to the owner against whose property the new soil is deposited the process must be imperceptible. The rule laid down by the law to determine whether a change has been imperceptible is that to be imperceptible it must be so gradual that observers cannot see the process going on, and if they cannot it is imperceptible even though observations at considerable intervale disclose that a change has taken place.

In the case of property bordering on a non-navigable stream or small lake the owner takes title to the center of the body of water. In the case of a stream the thread of the stream—the center of the main channel—is the boundary of a tract granted with the stream as a boundary. In such cases the owner of land adjoining the water owns land under the water as well. Of course, land may be granted merely to the high water mark, the rights to the land under water being reserved, but this is unusual. The owner of land bordering on a stream who also owns the land under water my extend his property by filling in so long as he does not interfere with the course of the stream, or interfere with any rights of the public or of private parties. If an island appears in a body of water it becomes the property of the person who owned the land under water upon which it was formed. If the owner of the land adjoining a stream owns to the center of the stream, islands forming on his side of the stream become his property. Islands forming in the center of the stream are divided according to the old boundary line.

Cases have arisen where islands and other lands have been submerged and have subsequently reappeared. In such instances the former owner regains his possession and title.

It is stated above that land owners own to the center of non-navigable waters. In the case of navigable water the public, generally speaking, holds the title to the bed. Thus islands forming in navigable streams would belong to the state and the state may resist all extensions of the property adjoining the navigable water past the normal edge of the stream or lake.

The courts have no little difficulty in determining whether waters are navigable or not and the various states are in conflict. The old English rule was that waters in which the tide ebbed and flowed were navigable, whether they were used by large boats for purposes of commerce or not. This rule has been adopted in many of the American states. In England where the large rivers are affected by the tides the rule fitted fairly well with the facts, but in some states which follow the rules, there are no tidal waters and so all waters in the state are ruled as non-navigable in law though they are navigable in fact. Many states rule all rivers navigable in law which are navigable in fact.

But in the great majority of cases the owner of property adjoining a stream of ordinary size, or a small lake, has title of all the land under the water to the thread of the stream or the center of the lake.

THE MISTAKES OF THE YOUNG PREACHER.

1. Sometimes he gets married too soon. Very seldom does he get a woman unworthy of him. My observation is that preachers usually outmarry themselves.

2. A very common mistake of young preachers is their habit of living from hand to mouth in their intellectual life. Many of them have no general plan for the complete development of all their powers. They do not decide questions of their life work as a probable whole. They become opportunists and take education if it is thrust upon them. A better plan would be to organize a campaign for the fullest fullest and highest development of one's intellectual powers. In our day, college and seminary training is essential to the highest success in the ministry. The world can afford to wait on the young preacher until he has disciplined his mind and heart and mastered the great message he is to deliver to men. In his patience let him possess his soul. He may well take for his motto: "Fear God and work."

There are many other mistakes that might be pointed out, such as failure to buy and study the very best books, the neglect of the prayer life, looseness in financial matters, etc., but let these few hints suffice for the present.

If you have not already entered college, young brother, plan to do so in the near future. If you are already in college, fasten your eye on the seminary and keep plugging ahead until you shall have gotten your degree from the best seminary you know of.—Baptist and Reflector.

PREACHERS IN THE MAKING.

The Christian Church must have preachers. We are not in sympathy with the sentiment a certain writer recently expressed to the effect that the Church would probably survive and prosper without preachers. It is manifestly a prominent and vital part of God's plan to carry forward his work among the nations of the earth through the preaching of his word by his own chosen servants whom he ordains and empowers to that end. The growth of the kingdom hitherto has been determined largely by the power and efficiency of the gospel ministry.

After all these centuries, what would the Church be or do without her preachers?

The Church must have a faithful, capable Spirit-filled ministry. And every Church must produce and train her own preacher material. Common sense and experience are teaching that lesson continually. All Churches recognize the necessity of providing for the training and equipment of their own ministerial recruits. The size of a denomination does not affect the situation.

It is just as necessary for the smaller Churches to produce and train their own preacher material as for the larger branches of the Christian Church to do so.

To say that a Methodist preacher in the making should be trained in Methodist schools or a Presbyterian in Presbyterian schools and an Evangelical in Evangelical schools cannot be charged to narrowness or a sectarian spirit. It is simply the natural order of things that one in preparing for the ministry should keep in closest touch with the genius, fellowship, and polity of the Church in whose ranks he expects to serve.. That is the rule, and the exceptions thereto should be "few and far between."

The Church should give more careful attention to her task of producing and discovering her preacher material. The importance attaching thereto is reason enough for that plea. In nothing else of like importance have we been so derelict as in this matter of seeking and preparing prospective candidates for the gospel ministry. We have been just drifting in this respect instead of earnestly praying the Lord to send forth laborers into his vineyard.

When the Church once seriously takes it upon herself to discover and properly encourage the called of the Lord, we shall have both more and better candidates for the ministry than can be expected under the haphazard way of the past. The cause and the times demand the best, the strongest young men for the pulpit and the manifold other duties of the preacher and pastor in these days. The community demands on the preacher were never so strenuous and exacting as now. There never was a time when it seemed more necessary to place increasing emphasis on Christian manliness on the part of the preacher. He is a poor preacher, an unpromising so-called servant of God and the Church, who is not first of all a man—a manly man, a Christian gentleman. Pulpit eloquence is worse than sounding brass and tinkling cymbals except the preacher be known as being every inch a man under all circumstances

The Church should put herself more earnestly to the task of building up a strong and increasingly capable ministry. This is one of our greatest tasks both as to the difficulties relating thereto and the importance thereof. The conditions under which the preacher must labor in these days call for the strongest and the best talent that can be found and trained for the work.

First of all, give us men, manly men for the ministry. Then let these clean, manly men get all the culture and training that it is possible for them to acquire; then, Spirit-filled and Spirit-guided, then let them go forth as heralds of the Cross to preach Christ crucified as the world's only hope in the best way that they can do that service for God and humanity.

A Scotchman once closed the ordination of a young preacher with these words: "In conclusion, you ha' need of three things my young brother. You ha' need o' Bible; you will ha' to study for that. You ha' 'need of grace; you will ha' to pray for that. And you ha' need o' common sense, and if you ha' no got that you ha' to go back where you came from. And one thing more, my brother. When it rains, just let it rain."—Evangelical Messenger.

DENTON HIGH SCHOOL

——OPENS SEPTEMBER 1, 1913——

DENTON is situated in the Piedmont hills of Davidson County twenty miles South from Thomasville on the Carolina and Yadkin River Rail Road. This Railroad connects us with the Southern at Thomasville and High Point on the north and with the Southbound at High Rock on the South. About 350 yards west from the depot on Salisbury Street, nestling among a beautiful grove of oaks, is the home of Denton High School.

OUR COURSE OF STUDY prepares for any College, also for our State University. We give each student personal atention and do everything necessary for their comfort and advancement. A thoroughly competent teacher has been employed for the Music Department, and those who take this course will receive special attention. A High School Business Course will be taught free of charge as to tuition. Special work in Pedagogy for those who intend to teach.

FREE TUITION to ministerial students and children of the ministers of the North Carolina Conference. Cost of all necessary expenses for a year ranges from $115 to $145. We board students in good private homes. Indigent young men can get rooms and board themselves at actual cost. If any one wishes to pay a part or even all expenses by work, write the Principal for particulars. The school uses water from deep drilled wells with pumps, which eliminates all danger from germs in the water. Pure air, pure water, plenty of work; if these do not give health to the student, he will never have it. Write the Principal at Denton, N. C., for any further information.

DIED.

Evans.

Eliza Evans was born Sept. 22, 1838; died Sept. 10, 1913. She leaves to mourn their loss a husband, eight children, twenty-five grand-children, and six great grandchildren. She joined Bethesda Methodist Protestant church when quite young, being one of the charter members. Aunt Liza, as she was often called, was always at church unless providentially hindered.

Although for the past 12 months she had been kept away, she often expressed a wish to be able to attend church again.

During these months of her illness she had suffered much, but with patience and trusting all to Him whom she has so long loved and served.

All was done that loving hands could do for her recovery, but He who knoweth and doeth all things well, willed it otherwise.

Mother is gone, but she is waiting on the other side for husband and children whom she loved so much. She asked them so many times to meet her in Heaven.

Gill.

Pattie Jones Hight, born Sept. 15, 1853, died September 6, 1913. When quite a girl she professed faith in Christ and united with the church at Plank Chapel M. E. Church, South. At the age of nineteen she was married to David H. Gill and to this happy union were born ten children, four of which died in infancy, the fifth one dying at the age of eighteen. Four daughters, one son, and several grandchildren together with the husband survive her.

Fourteen years ago with her husband she united with Union Chapel Methodist Protestant church of which she remained a faithful and active member till God called her higher. Bro. C. L. Whitaker was pastor of this charge at that time and I have heard him speak of her kindness to him while he was her pastor a number of times. She was a great friend to her pastor and seemed as if she could not show favors enough when in her home. It seemed to me that she was more active in the last few months of her life than when I first knew her; and she seemed to be more cheerful and full of life. In our last meeting at Union Chapel she seemed to show unusual interest as was manifested by the bountiful spread of good things and her presence in the services. Many have been the good things that her neighbors have said about her. She delighted to take flowers to the sick and to make the sick room more cheerful.

But the grim monster death came suddenly and she was relieved of the cross to take up the crown. Her husband said to the writer at the funeral, "If I was as good as I know her to be I would not mind going suddenly as she did." She died of heart failure, after being sick in a noticeable way only about one hour. We shall miss her at church, in the neighborhood, but most of all in the home where she reigned as mother, the one to make home happy and a comfort to her loved ones, and a delightful place to visit for her friends.

We pray that our loving heavenly Father will bless the children and bind up their broken hearts; that the husband may in his loneliness find comfort in fleeing to Jesus for consolation; and that the vacancy made by his providence may be filled by his Holy Spirit.

One of the largest gatherings of people we have seen in this country attended the funeral services held Sunday afternoon, Sept. 7, at Plank Chapel by the writer; and many were the floral offerings upon her grave emblematic of the flowers she had strewn upon the pathway of many while she lived here in the world.

N. G. Bethea.

Isabella Jane Crews Hicks.

Her father was James Crews. Her mother was Sarah Earl Crews. She was born August 24, 1829. Her brothers and sisters were Mary, who married William Wright and removed to Tennessee; Rebecca, who married James Cheatham, Martha, who married Joseph Penn Hunt, James A. Crews, Elijah Thomas Crews, Edward H. Crews, Susan, the only survivor, who married George W. Hunt, and Melissa, who married Rev. William S. Hester. Isabella married Benjamin W. Hicks.

All these except Mary lived, married and died near the place where they were born. They were an honor to their ancestors and to their descendants.

Isabella departed this life Sept. 5th, 1913, at the age of eighty-four years. She was married in October, 1854. She saw her husband depart for the war leaving her and three infant children to the tender mercies of slaves. Her happiest day was when he returned in June, 1865, while the slaves were still at work harvesting wheat.

She burned the midnight candle prepared by her own hands, making clothes for her family. Her husband on the other side of the candle made their shoes. Together they toiled for a generation, providing means for the education of their children. She saw her husband die after forty-five years of happy married life. She saw one of her sons and two of her daughters pass away in the maturity of their lives and faculties. Four children, with grand--children and great-grand-children survive her.

All these eighty-four years she saw and did the right and duty as clearly as is given to mortals to see and do them. She had an abiding faith in a future life of happiness.

Her earthly light went out as quietly and gently as it had burned and shined.

She was closely connected, related and allied with a great multitude of good people who have thought and will think and say: "It was very good to have lived such a life."

Her husband praised her. Her children loved and honored her. Her kindred are glad that they are such.

We dwell with sweet satisfaction upon the thought that she still lives, with the good and the happy.

The above, written by one of her own boys, shows something of the way her own appreciated her, and those who knew her best had the same high regard for her. Since it has been my honor to be her pastor she has not been able to attend the church at Rehoboth regularly. But when the weather was so she could be there, she was always in her place listening attentively to the word. At the time of her death she was the oldest member of Rehoboth, and always showed an active interest in its services. She always welcomed her pastor and it was always a pleasure to me to talk to her about the church and matters pertaining to the kingdom. After she began to lose interest in other things she would often remind the home folks that it was the first Sunday, the day for services at her church. This to my mind showed that the last things of which she was conscious here in the world was the fact that she was a member of God's family which fact she prized highly as was attested by her interest in things heavenly. At one time we had a service at Rehoboth for the old people especially, and we dispensed with the organ and used the old fashioned hymns; and she seemed to enjoy that so much that I made the remark afterward that that service was worth more to me than the effort cost to look at Grandma Hicks as she sang "Amazing Grace". Her face was always bright, but it seemed to me brighter that day than usual.

She was proud of her children. She had a right to be. They are only reflecting that for which she lived and prayed. May their lives continue to give out the teaching and example of the one who toiled and overcame that she might give to the world high ideals of service and piety.

None else like mother, children, you will find in the world but with what joy you may look forward to the meeting over yonder when free from earth's toil and care.

"Tell mother I'll be there,
Heaven's joys with her to share,
Yes, tell my darling mother, I'll be there."

—Bro. Hicks' letter to ten boys is one that we hope all our boys will read. No young man who values his own happiness and well-being can afford to trifle away his time or his God-given energy. Butterflies may flit about, for that is what they were made to do; but life for men is a thing requiring sober thought and earnest, persistent endeavor. There is success in store for every one who will work faithfully for it, but success comes to no one who is unwilling to pay the price. Think, young men, of the greatness of your opportunity and of how quickly it will be gone if not seized and well used. It is sad to think of a young man of good family letting himself down by his own lack of care and effort. But no one can inherit success. If it comes, it must be one's own achievement.

—The September number of The Constructive Quarterly maintains the high level of the preceding numbers. The men who write for this journal are among the foremost and most liberal thinkers of the various churches of Christendom, and few journals are so thought-provoking. The purpose of the Quarterly is to promote Christian unity. Archbishop Platon declares that "its merit is exceedingly great, since it has succeeded in gathering together before the same speaking tube, as it were, Roman Catholics, Orthodox and Protestants, and has also succeeded in persuading them to speak through this tube." He expresses the belief that unity is possible, yet appreciates the difficulties in the way, illustrating by Kriloff's fable of "The Swan, the Crayfish and the Pike".

"A crayfish, pike and swan agreed one day
To pull a carload all together,
So, harnessed each to his own tether,
They pull with might and main!
Alas! 'Tis all in vain!
The load seemed light enough; but in the sky
The swan soared high;
The crayfish always backward ran,
And in the pond, the pike to pull began.
Which was to blame? Which, right? We cannot say.
But still the carload stays there, to this day."

The Archbishop suggests that the only way to make the Quarterly really "constructive" is to induce all to write of the one theme on which the Apostles preached, faith in the Son of God. The attack upon our faith in the anti-Christian literature of the time ought to unite us into one family, says the Archbishop.

The Bishop of Cremona, Italy, Geremia Bonomelli, a Roman Catholic, writes a loving appeal for unity, but he sees no way of uniting save in the Roman Church, since this church with its definitions, its repeated affirmation of its divine character, has cut every bridge behind it. We quote from him:

"We have the definition behind us, we have the impassable abyss, you have it not. Come over the gulf to us: we will forthwith throw our arms about your neck, we shall be sons of the same Mother, and of the same Father who is in heaven; and quickly the earth shall be changed, and the great ship of the united Church will sail in safety upon the troubled waters, and gather in the millions of scattered sons throughout all the coasts. What joy! What an event for the Church of Christ! There will be neither winners nor losers; neither humbled nor those who humble; we shall all be brothers. Meanwhile, let us be united, if not in the same faith, in the same charity, and prostrate before our common Saviour, Jesus Christ, let us pray that His will be done—His will that all be saved."

There are several other notable articles in this number.

—The editor spent last Sunday in Randleman, attending services at Mt. Lebanon Church, where the Annual Conference was held in 1909. Concrete walks have been laid since then. Other improvements in the grounds, including the enclosing of the cemetery with a wire fence, are in contemplation. One good sister offers $50 for the last named improvement. We dropped into the Baraca Class and found a number of young men interested in the lesson. Bro. Hinshaw is teacher, but Bro. Wm. Lamb taught last Sunday very successfully. At the close of the Sunday school, the superintendent, Bro. L. R. Hughes, referred to their recent visit to the Children's Home, and asked the boys what they thought of it. The boys agreed that it is a fine home, and said they would like to live in such a place themselves. The Sunday school impressed us as an unusually live one. The congregation included besides our people a number from St. Paul M. E. Church. We were pleased to meet Bro. Matthews, a druggist, who is a brother of Bro. Matthews, of Siler City; also Mr. Augustus Kennett and his wife from Concord, on a visit to his father and mother, Bro. J. F. Kennett and wife, who are growing old and feeble, but whom we were glad to see out at church. We met two daughters and a grand-daughter of the late Scott Turner, who lived so long in total blindness, and whose grateful piety was an inspiration to those that visited him. We were pleasantly entertained in the homes of Bros. L. R. Hughes, Robert Lineberry, and Arrington Barker. Bro. Hughes has an interesting collection of gems—a Ruby, Pearl, an Opal, and a Jewel, four bright daughters. Also a son bearing the Bible name Samuel. Bro. Lineberry is a son of Rev. Zachary Lineberry and a nephew of Dr. A. W. Lineberry. He said Bro. Hughes asked him out at the Children's Home if he were ashamed that he was a Methodist Protestant. He replied that he was not and never had been. Bro. Barker is a son of Isaac Barker and his wife is a sister of Rev. J. F. Dosier. We are grateful to all these people for kindnesses enjoyed while among them.

—The new tariff bill passed the Senate Tuesday P. M. by a vote of 44 to 37. La Follette, Republican, and Poindexter, Progressive, voted for it, while Ransdell and Thornton, Democrats, voted against it. Gallinger's motion to defer action on the tariff till Dec., 1914, and submit the bill to popular vote, was defeated by 63 to 16. The bill now goes to a conference with members of the House of Representatives.

—Rev. Chas. M. Sheldon, author of In His Steps and other books, has written a new book soon to be published which will have for its theme the second coming of Christ and for its title Jesus Is Here.

I CAN, I WILL.

BY VICTOR P. HAMMER.

Sailing on life's restless ocean,
Rolling waves break high and white;
Ships are here and ships are yonder,
Pasing on by day and night.
Some have met with stormy weather,
Some have anchored for repair,
Some have lost their course in steering,
Some have sunk in deep despair;
Yet, they all have chart and compass,
Stores to last and force to man,
Which insures their onward going,
When the captain says, "I can!"

Ships, therefore, like these are symbols
Of the many lives at sea;
You and I and every other
Must pass to eternity—
Sail across these unknown waters,
On and on, to yonder land,
And the mysteries encountered
Only then we'll understand.
Suns will warm and stars will brighten,
Rains will come and winds will chill;
But the captain, true to conscience,
Hoists his sails and says, "I will!"

Deep within each lonely bosom
Is a heart of calm or strife,
Beating, one by one, the moments
That mete out the span of life.
"On!" the conscious heart's repeating;
All is well with such a guide;
But the captain, pausing, doubting,
Will his ship soon drift aside.
Hark! then, to the voice of wisdom,
Let each life-ship sail with skill,
Sail ahead in light and darkness,
And proclaim, "I can, I will!"
August 16, 1913.

DO THE WILL OF YOUR FATHER WHICH IS IN HEAVEN.

I hope we will all profit by Bro. Taylor's good address on "Saving Souls." What is the use of their preparing and delivering those addresses unless we are going to let them help us in doing the work of the Lord? It would be well for us to examine ourselves to see if we are doing the will of our Father in heaven. Are we the salt of the earth, saving some souls, or are we like the salt that has lost his savour, good for nothing but to be cast out and trodden under foot of men? Are we letting our light shine before men that they may glorify our Father in heaven? When I read our church papers and see so few conversions and read the pastor's reports to the Conference and so many report but few additions and consider we have about 20,000 members, it looks like the most of us are saving no souls and are like the salt that has lost his savour, and is good for nothing but to be cast out. It is high time to awake out of sleep. I have always heard the best preaching was that that saved the most souls, but we have several men and considered good preachers, but I never hear of their having but few conversions and few additions to the church and I am sorry for them and do wish they would study to be approved of God so that they might see the work of the Lord prosper in their hands. I think they could profit by Bro. Taylor's address, although he is much younger than they are, but I am sure if they would do more personal work in getting the members to work and talking to sinners personally instead of depending on those big sermons, they would have much greater success; but if they can't have conversions and additions my advice is for them to do as the local preachers did many years ago: work all the week at other callings and preach Sundays. In my younger days I worked in the Sunday schools, prayer and protracted meetings and always believed in singing the gospel, and many times after a long sermon no one would move, but soon after you began to sing the dear old songs some would seek the great salvation, but I think the mistake with most of us is we do not do enough personal work, and I think if I had done more personal work I would have saved more souls. I have saved several persons from being drowned in my life and would I know I had saved as many souls. Allow me to impress it upon you what Bro. Grabs wrote when his mother died. Over fifty years ago she went many miles a cold day to see a sick baby and when she got there they said it would die, but she said No, and she went to work on it and it soon got better and got well and raised a family many years after that. She went eight miles to see a girl that was badly burned and the doctor said she would die and they were making her shroud, but she called for oil and went to work on her and she got well and raised a family. Let us do, as Sister Grabs, all we can for the afflicted, also never give up trying to save sinners as long as this life lasts. Another reason for not having revivals is we have so many members that have never been born again and so few that have the joy of His salvation and our worship is so formal and the most of us are thinking more about the music than the gospel in the words. I have heard a good deal of shouting while they were singing and some during prayers, but only remember twice during preaching. At a Conference at Moriah Rev. J. S. Whitfield preached a great sermon on Sunday and just as he was concluding Bro. Lewallyn, a tall preacher, stood up and reached his hands as high as he could and then shouted and then commenced singing and at a Conference here during Dr. L. W. Bates's great sermon Sunday a sister made one loud shout and some were frightened. We seem to have forgotten that Christ told the woman of Samaria we must worship the Father in spirit and in truth, and we don't often hear the old songs they used to sing. How happy every child of grace who knows his sins forgiven. How happy are they who their Savior obey. Father, I stretch my hands to thee, and others.

Bro. Cecil called to see me and I wish he could have stayed longer. He is doing what a president ought to do, trying to get the pastor and official members to do their duty and a minister ought not to take a circuit unless he is going to try to get the members to hold class or prayer meeting according to the discipline. Let us all pray for pure hearts and the joy of his salvation; then will we teach transgressors His ways and sinners shall be converted. Amen. T. L. Whitaker.

A CRISIS AND AN OPPORTUNITY.

The church, according to scriptural definition, is the body of Christ, and He is the head. Therefore, He must direct in all things. If my head wills one thing and my body wills another, there is confusion and misdirected effort.

The church is also composed of a "called out" people, which certainly implies that they who comprise its membership, while "in the world," must not be "of the world". The line between the church and the world must be sharp and distinct—not in the sense of being out of sympathy with suffering and sinning people, but rather being consistent, sincere, devoted followers of Christ in all things—in other words, to be like Him in spirit and in service. To be indifferent to those about us in need of help is to misrepresent Him, while to be unwilling to follow His direction is nothing less than disloyalty.

The church is made up of witnesses to Christ. A witness is one who tells what he knows to be true.

The plain teaching of the Bible indicates the following to be the line of obligation for the church, if she is loyal to Him:

1. To witness to Him and be loyal to Him.
2. To make Him known to others.
3. To reflect His spirit in all things.
4. To await His return from heaven when, because of faithfulness, "we may have confidence and not be ashamed before Him at His coming."

I have been out of the United States for seventeen months, having observed closely as I have traveled, and now that I am home again I am impressed with the fact that conditions throughout the world are very much the same. Certainly we are in this country in no worse spiritual condition than others, while in some ways we have very much more for which we should be grateful to God.

I am quite sure, however, that no well-informed Christian could say that the progress of the church is commensurate with the effort put forth, the money invested, or the cause represented.

I notice on both sides of the world a distinct sag along spiritual lines,, and if there is no cause for discouragement, certainly there is an imperative call to careful and prayerful thought.

Whether this spiritual depression is due to worldliness in the church, or a failure to properly appreciate and fulfill her mission, or the spirit of criticism if not disloyal note which is, alas, sounded in so many pulpits, let him say who will—certainly this is a time of crisis.

The case is by no means hopeless, nor are the conditions new. They have been faced and overcome in the past, and they will be again. There have been too many glorious victories in the past to permit us now hanging our harps on the willows.

There are individual needs, which every thoughtful Christian should carefuly consider, such as habits of Bible study. No follower of Christ can keep himself in harmony with God's will if the careful, habitual study of the Word of God be neglected. And again, habits of prayer. How we shrink from sin, and seek to free ourselves from its blighting touch! Yet how few are distressed because of the "sin of a prayerless life!"

Then, too, personal disloyalty to our Lord in these days weakens the testimony or blinds the vision. In many cases such disloyalty is unintentional. It is, however, none the less harmful. No individual can permanently harm the church, but in so far as the church as a whole is concerned, what is seriously needed is a positive declaration concerning our Lord. If the word is spoken from the pulpit, let the message be positive; if the testimony is personal, let it be equally so.

There are certain things we may know about Christ: He is the Son of God, He died upon the cross, the just for the unjust, He rose from among the dead, ascended to the right hand of God, and is one day coming back again, He has power on earth to forgive sins, to give strength for weakness and life for death. If we know these things, then let us declare them; if we do not know them, then our testimony is without value, and we have no message for a sin-smitten world.

I question if anything more serious confronts the church today than the fact that so many have been practicaly faithless in the matter of presenting Christ to others—parents failing to speak to their children regarding their personal aceptance of Christ, friends silent with those whom they love, Christians in business saying no word to those over whom they are set in authority, or for whom and with whom they toil.

To fail here is to miss joy in Christian living, and the highest privilege in Christian service. A cotton merchant in Liverpool, England, makes it a practice to speak personally each day with some one about Christ. He had, at last accounts, won one hundred for the Master.

A father went home from one of our mission services, called all his household about him, and won all his children for Jesus. In connection with our Australian mission, one man spoke to more than one hundred people in a day, and had the joy of seeing thirteen definitely accept the Saviour. Such service keeps one from drifting spiritually, is a sure remedy for doubt, and a never failing means of growth in grace.

A church on fire with such service, led by the pastor, who should always guide and direct, would mean a revival worth while.

I am persuaded that the note of social service must be sounded if the church is to fulfill her mision—not that sort of social service which discounts or neglects personal regeneration, which is apparently indifferent to the cross and its message, but such social service as recognizes the importance and necessity for giving every aid to the needy and rebuking every wrong, which makes suffering possible and still insists on bringing the suffering ones into personal relationship with God through Jesus Christ. To sing songs and not listen to the cry of the helpless, to pray prayers and not turn aside with help to those in despair, to preach sermons and not attack wrong wherever it lifts its head, is not Christian, whatever men may call it.

I am sure a better day will dawn. I am not sure but that light in certain quarters is breaking now. Surely it is necessary for us, while we wait and work and testify as to His power, to look for His return.

The prophets in the Old Testament said He was coming, the New Testament writers take up their cry. Jesus himself declared it. Hosts of His followers have most surely believed it—Wesley, Spurgeon, Moody, and multitudes besides.

If He somes soon, would He not find some denying the Lord that bought them, some preaching another gospel, which is not a gospel, some faithless, and many indifferent? This is a day of crisis. How shall we meet it?

Let us fairly present the plan of God for the living of men. Let us keep ourselves unspotted from the world. Let us seek to be like Him. Let us pray without ceasing. Let us work with zeal. Let us preach with a passion. Let us give God a fair chance in our lives. Let us count no service too difficult, no burden too heavy, no journey too long, to undertake for Him. Then a mighty blessing will be upon us, and then the church will be "fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners."—Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D. D., in Zion's Herald.

CONSULT THE PASTOR.

Your pastor is the expert in religious work to whom you should turn in all your Christian Endeavor perplexities. He is there to give you advice; that is his business. He has probably met in the older church work just the perplexity that confronts you. He will give you just the bit of encouragement that will push you up over the Hill Difficulty. You may think that he will not sympathize with you or be interested in the affairs of the society. Try him and see. Often the minister holds aloof only because he feels that he is not wanted.

AN ENDEAVOR PRAYER MEETING.

What constitutes a prayer meeting of the Christian Endeavor type?

The endeavor on the part of every one present to make the meeting a success by contributing what each is able to contribute.

A warm spiritual atmosphere, manifesting the love of Christ in all hearts.

Short testimonies and prayers, and many of them.

No pauses, except those that signify thoughtfulnes and prayer.

Bright and hearty singing.

The spirit of humility and simplicity and sincere desire to be of service.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR COVENANTERS

Arrangement has been made to enroll those who wish to be enrolled, after taking the following covenant: "Feeling myself called by the Holy Spirit, and trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, I promise Him that I will from this day forth strive to shape the plans of my life so that I may give myself wholly to the service of Christ and the church."

Hundreds have already been enrolled. It is a good covenant to take, but every church member takes such a covenant when he joins the church. Not all seem to be aware of it.

—Rev. W. C. Lassiter came up on Monday with his daughter on the way to Guilford College.

—Prof. Cleveland Sharpe recently brought home a new wife, formerly Miss Lewis, of Stoneville. A formal reception was given at the home of his father, Bro. J. C. Sharpe.

CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP CONFERENCE AT WINONA.

The speakers at Winona Lake in the recent Christian Citizenship Conference were all mustered from the ranks of those who addressed the recent World-Conference at Portland, Oregon. But the meeting at Winona was something vastly more than a mere echo-meeting or aftermath. The program for this year, whether we speak of the scope and vision of the subjects introduced or of the responsive interest awakened in the public mind as evidenced by the increased attendance, was the most successful ever offered by the National Reform Association on these Assembly grounds.

Dr. Charles Merle-d'Aubigne favored his ever-increasing audiences with a vivid and comprehensive description of the social and religious conditions in France. A son of the famous historian of the Reformation, and himself a noted pastor, scholar and man-of-letters, Dr. d'Aubigne is a man whose coming to America is a genuine advent and his message at Winona was a veritable deliverance. The singular warmth and purity of his English is a balm to Anglo-Saxon ears; and the sympathetic study with which he goes to the depths of every subject he essays, makes his utterance a ready and thorough medium of rare instruction. Indeed it is not too much to say that as Dr. d'Aubigne crosses the continent from Portland to Winona and from Winona to Pittsburgh and New York, his every audience, attracted at once by his greatness of heart and his richness of learning, regards him with affectionate admiration.

If the outlook in Paris and throughout the French Republic was made clear by the coming of d'Aubigne, what shall we say of the unthinkable Ng Poon Chew, who was the Chinese orator both at Portland and Winona? It may almost be said of Ng Poon Chew that he is even more American than America's themselves! At any event, he is something more than a mere orator of the New Chinese Republic; something more than the herald of new-born liberty in the Orient. Ng Poon Chew is the Chinese Republic! That is to say, he is so imbued with the spirit of the present age and with the hope and prophecy of the future of the Far East, that he embodies to America the very spirit of the Chinese Republic and the very genius of the Chinese character,—Chinese character as awakened and interpreted by the love of liberty and progress. All this was made very plain in the four addresses of this noted Oriental at Winona; in every one of which he grasped the hearts and sounded the message of Christian citizenship.

Another event of outstanding importance was the coming to America of Rev. Robert J. Patterson of Ireland, who is now better known by the sobriquet of "Catch-my-Pal" Patterson. He also knows how to catch his audiences! That was proven both at Portland and at Winona; and the message he brought, enforced as it is by the phenomenal success which has attended his temperance movement, will certainly contribute very greatly to temperance enthusiasm in America.

Dr. James S. Martin, of Pittsburgh, the General Superintendent of the National Reform Association, introduced this year a new series of lectures on the subject of the Bible in the Public Schools. He made very clear and forcible the argument for Christian education as a preparation for American citizenship; and that the moral content of Christianity, as revealed in the Bible, is the one ethical standard recognized by the American conscience. He analyzed the forces opposed to Christian teaching in the schools, enumerated the evils which result from surrender to these forces, and then developed a plan of moral warfare against these organized influences. He also explained the attitude of the National Reform Association, declaring that the Association does not attack any race, nor any creed nor any organization; but that this Association is simply the defender of the Christian institutions of America, and that, as a consequence, it is at war with whatsoever race or creed presumes to attack these sacred institutions of liberty. The general line of argument pursued by Dr. Martin found instant verification in the testimony of Dr. d'Aubigne as to the national results of the purely secular education in France.

Dr. Lyman Edwyn Davis, managing editor of the Christian Statesman, introduced a new series of lectures this year under the general title of "Literary Forces in Social Progress", the specific subjects including "The Ethical Mission of the Drama", "The Moral Opportunity of the Daily Newspaper", "The Moral Achievements of the Great Novels", and "The Bible as the Oracle of the Great Books". He also delivered in the Assembly Auditorium his well-known lectures on "The Kingdom of Common Sense" and "The City and the Man".

A new speaker was introduced to Winona this year in the person of Rev. Grant W. Stover, Ohio State Secretary, who gave an instructive series of lectures on the subject of "Social Uplift", delivering also his popular lectures entitled "Abraham Lincoln, the Liberator" and "The March of the Centuries".

The attendance at the meetings this year exceeded that of any of the eight previous successive institutes held at this popular summer assembly.

POPULAR TALKS ON LAW.

When the Squatter Gets the Land.

By Walter K. Towers, A. B., J. D., of the Michigan Bar.

James Randall was the owner of a wilderness tract of thousands of acres. The country was new and undeveloped and Randall paid but slight attention to his holdings. He and his family lived many miles away and carelessly paid slight attention to their large holdings. Verne Fox moved into the region with his family seeking a new home in 1870. He had a little money and desired to buy a tract of land which he could develop into a productive farm. He met two men who said that they had such a farm for sale. It was upon a back road, a mere wilderness trail, but the land promised well to Fox and he paid $800 for eighty acres, receiving a deed from his new acquaintances and taking possession of the vacant property without making any further inquiries. Fox built a home and year by year cleared and developed his fields. He heard that the road on which he faced was reputed to be the boundary of Randall's tract, and that he was therefore within it, but as no one interfered with him, he troubled not.

It was 1892 before the Randall family went into the region to care for their holdings in person and see to their development. They found that Fox's farm was within the boundaries of their tract and that he had paid his money and received his deed from men having no rights whatever in the property. At this time Fox had put about sixty acres under actual cultivation, or within fences as pasture for his stock. He had made little use of the back twenty acres and had not developed it in any way. The Randalls took immediate legal steps to oust For from his holdings and recover the property, but were defeated.

Although Fox had secured no good title when he took the deed and entered into possession of the property, his continued and open use and possession of it as actual owner for a period of over twenty years gave to him complete rights in it. This right was based on what is known as the statute of limitations. There is such a statute in every state and they are generally much alike, usually providing that such use and possession for a period of twenty years give good title to the property even as against the rightful owner. The failure of the rightful owner to assert his rights for a period of twenty years costs him his title to the property. This it what is legally termed "title by adverse possession."

Fox retained his control of the entire eighty acres described under the original, worthless deed under which he had entered. He had entered in good faith under the deed, believing that deed to be good and expecting to possess the entire eighty acres. The court enforced his claim, as his possession applied to all of the property described in the deed, he having taken general possession and occupied it for twenty years.

Alex Phelps settled on the same road at about the same time as Fox. He verbally laid claim to an eighty-acre farm which he had roughly described on several occasions. He made no purchase from any one, however, had no deed, or any other regular means of acquiring ownership. He simply squatted on what he viewed as a "no man's land". In the terminology of the law he had no "color of title," as had Fox. Phelps, too, cleared and cultivated a part of the tract he claimed, but had actually made use of but about sixty acres. In this case the court allowed Phelps to retain the sixty acres he had actually cleared, fenced and cultivated, because of his possession for twenty years, but as to the rest he secured no rights. As Phelps had taken under no "color of title" his rights rested solely on occupation and he could make no claim as to parts of a tract which he did not actually occupy. Merely marking out the boundaries of eighty acres and occasionally walking over them without making continued use was ruled as not sufficient where Phelps had had absolutely no color of right to the land upon which he originally settled.

More frequently cases involving the doctrine of adverse possession involve but a portion of a tract of land and the difficulty is a line fence that has been located in the wrong place. Springer and Carr owned adjoining places. An old rail fence separated their fields. Springer secured his farm first and located his fence by guess work from an old survey. Carr raised some question as to whether the boundary was right, but Springer insisted that it was correct, and right or wrong it was the boundary between their farms and the one upon which he would always insist. Knowing little either of the true state of the boundary or his rights, Carr let the matter drift along and the families recognized the old fence line for over twenty years. Then the younger Carr inherited the place on his father's death. He had a survey made and discovered that the old fence line was well within his true boundary and that it gave several acres of valuable land to Springer. Carr started immediate legal action, but discovered that his rights had lapsed, the court ruling that the land had become Springer's by virtue of an adverse possession extending over a period of twenty years.

If Springer, being in ignorance of the true location of the line, had had no intention of insisting upon it if it proved not correct upon a survey but merely intended to occupy it if it was only his the court would not have viewed the possession as adverse; that is, not hostile to the true owner, the land would not have been lost to the Carrs. But Springer having declared an intention to insist upon his right or wrong and having maintained it and held the ground up to the fence for twenty years took good title to it by adverse possession. The court takes the requirement that the possession be "adverse" possession to mean that it must be under claim of right.

As has already been stated, in order to ripen "squatter" his adverse possession must continue for twenty years. Adverse possession is defined as possession by one not the owner, inconsistent with the right of possession of the true owner. No tenant can hold adversely to his landlord, for his possession is that of a tenant, not inconsistent with the rights of the owner, and the tenant may not deny his landlord's title. Adverse possession always begins with an illegal occupation of the land by one lacking in legal rights of ownership and possession. As has been remarked, the possession must be adverse, that is, hostile to the true owner. It must be with intent to claim title as opposed to the true owner, whoever he may be. One in possession of lands who claims to hold only until the true owner appears is not holding adversely. There must be a continuous and absolute claim of ownership. That the possession must be actual, or constructive under a color of title we have noticed. Further the possession must be open and notorious, must be of such a nature that it will call the attention of any who may pass that way of the presence and possession of the "squatter." A further requirement is that possession must be exclusive and continuous for the period named in the statute—usually twenty years.

If you possess a distant piece of real estate that is vacant, do not let any great period of time pass without investigating the state of your holdings. If a "squatter" is found either erect like a man from [illegible] a written statement that he is not the owner and makes no claim to it, but holds by your or the true owner's sufferance or permission that he remains on the property. If there is any doubt concerning any of the boundary lines, talk with your neighbor, get a surveyor's opinion. Do not let that be his opportunity of claiming anything by the true line, and if [illegible] lines established by [illegible] no interest, or [illegible] accept the other's opinion. If [illegible] is not possible, have a survey made [illegible] force your rights by legal proceedings under the guidance of a competent attorney.

THE PASTOR'S FIRST DUTY.

In speaking before the ministers and Christian workers of the Pittsburg churches last week, Dr. John Timothy Stone said that, in view of it, a pastor's first work is not to save souls, but to train men and women to be soul winners and soul savers. He laid the emphasis very strongly on this proposition, affirming it and reiterating it in the course of his two or three addresses. The statement is worthy of more careful reflection.

Dr. John Timothy Stone is a man of action. He is an organizer. He is full of energy and enthusiasm. He is a sort of human dynamo. He does things. He has made his church in Chicago a mighty saving force. He is reaching and winning large numbers of young men and women every week.

He has put the principle he advocated so strongly in Pittsburg into actual practice. He has [illegible] groups of young men and women in his church do the personal work, extend the invitation, and bring individuals and bring them to the church. Then they press upon them the claims of Jesus Christ and the privilege of the Christian service. And the results have been most gratifying.

It is true that many ministers are making the mistake of trying to do all the work themselves. Are many of them finding it easier to go after individuals themselves than to train others to do it, and are many ministers simply following the line of least resistance? We believe many of our pastors have deliberately set themselves to secure a band of trained and dependable workers through whom they may touch individual lives.

We are convinced that the latter things [illegible] to Jesus Christ [illegible] and for [illegible] will be realized [illegible] evangelism. It is a physical impossibility for ministers personally [illegible] are waiting for a [illegible] Only as [illegible] result by a band of [illegible] and [illegible] lives [illegible] is responsible [illegible] parish.

[illegible] move toward a great [illegible] evangelism be [illegible] sessions? And [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] sermon.

will gather in his agents and carefully train them in the art of approaching men and winning them? It is in such methods as these that John Timothy Stone has had his phenomenal success in Chicago. His words and his methods are worthy of careful consideration.—United Presbyterian.

THE SMALLEST THING IN THE UNIVERSE.

We know that the big telescopes, aided by the photographic plate, reveal stars to the number of at least one hundred millions lying utterly beyond the confines of unaided vision. Now it appears that a pinch of salt which one could hold on the point of a pen-knife is made up of atoms numbering not hundreds of millions merely, but billions of bilions. The population of atoms in the smallest particle of matter visible under the microscope is greater by far than the total human population of the globe since the race developed. And a little instrument composed of two fragments of gold-leaf makes it possible to perform the miracles of counting these denizens of the realm of infinite littleness.

Within the smallest atom there is a something almost two thousand times smaller than the atom itself—a something that is detachable from the atom, and susceptible of being measured as to its mass and tested as to its electric charge with the aid of apparatus actually in use in the laboratory. This ultimate particle of matter is called the electric corpuscle or electron. We owe knowledge of it chiefly to Sir Joseph Thomson. It is the smallest thing in the world; and it is probably the basal substance out of which all matter of whatever character is built.

As regards bulk, the electron is, according to the French physicist Jean Becquerel, billions or billions of times smaller than the atom. To make the comparison vivid, Becquerel likens the electrons in an atom to a swarm of gnats gravitating about in the dome of a cathedral. As we penetrate thus far and farther into the realm of the infinitely little, seeing in imagination the smallest visible particle of matter resolved into myriads of molecules, each molecule into sundry atoms, and each atom into its teeming swarms of electrons, the question naturally arises, What lies beyond?—Dr. Henry Smith Williams, in Harper's Magazine for June.

Nature is God's handwriting. His autograph is upon the mountains, His name is inscribed in bright letterings upon the fields; the rain-drops are His tears; the rainbow is His smile of joyous delight in His world. Not to recognize these sublime facts is a kind of speculative illiteracy, for the man who does not thus interpret nature in theistic terms simply cannot read handwriting.—Zion's Herald.

A WORD IN SEASON.

A successful teacher says:

Teachers, study your pupils. Get into their inner life and explore their individuality. You will thus get interested and even absorbed in them and your work will become a delight. The very stupidest pupil in the class will richly repay you for your service and self-sacrifice. The dull boy's mind is always the wise teacher's problem. You will learn to love your pupils and begin to see their unique and immortal worth, the divine possibilities in them. You will look on them as Jesus looked on men with eyes of love as the children of God. Then you can teach them and have influence over them, and the vital touch of your life on their lives will be the means of imparting to them the Spirit of Christ and making them his. Then and not till then will the definite and final aim of the Sunday school teaching be accomplished.

That is exactly what the Teacher Training class aims to do. There is no better time than now to join a class and make it a great success. Start your class today. Remember the Board has an excellent book, Training the Teacher, paper 35 c and cloth 50c. Send all orders to C. H. Hubbell, Adrian, Michigan.

A MAN'S BOOK.

"When I get tired of everything else, and want something really good to read, something that is charged full of energy and human emotion, of cunning thought and everything that arrests the attention and thrills and uplifts you, according to your mood, I find it in the Bible." Thus Ex-Senator Albert J. Beveridge gave his reasons for counting the Bible a man's book. And he went on to say: "Surely the Old Testament, which is the story of the most powerful and persistent people who ever lived, cannot help overflowing with everything human. And surely, too, the New Testamnt, which is the account of the Man who dminates all Christendom today, the Man who is the most powerful influence in civilization two thousand years after he has passed from earth; surely such an account could not be without a fascination, compared with which our most thrilling novels and most passionate poems are vapid and tame."

Now is the time to start that organized class for men. No better time. Send to our Board for free helps for enlisting the men in the Sunday school.

THE SMSLL OF IMAGINATION.

At a certain northern Chautauqua gathering last summer a lecturer, at the opening of his address, came to the front of the platform and took a small vial from his pocket.

"My friends," he said, "before I begin my address, I wish to test the ventilation of this auditodrium. I am going to pour out this oil of peppermint. When the odor reaches you, raise your hands, so that I may see how rapidly it travels."

He emptied the vial, and almost instantly several hands on the front benches went up then farther back the hands began to go up by the dozens, until at last the people in the last seats caught the odor, and raised their hands.

The lecturer thanked his auditors, and went on with his address. When he had almost finished, and was speaking of the effect of the imagination on our senses, he paused, and said with a smile that it was only clear water he had poured out of his vial.

The audience had been caught so neatly that even those who had held up their hands joined in the laugh. But one illiterate fellow, whose hand had gone up more promptly and emphatically than any other, did not quite understand.

"What they laughin' at?" he asked audibly, of the man sitting beside him.

"Why," explained the man, "you did not smell peppermint at all; it was only imagination."

"Well," said the other, "I knowed it was somethin' that smelled mighty strong."—Youth's Companion.

FROM A VISITOR TO THE CHILDREN'S HOME.

Sept. 8, 1913.

Mr. J. M. Millikan, Greensboro, N. C.

Dear Sir: Yesterday we had a special offering for the building fund on the Children's Home at High Point, and am enclosing check for the amount, which was $6.25.

I visited the Home last week, and it certainly is nice. I wish every member of our Church in North Carolina could see it, and I am sure each one would be willing to give something every month to help support it. We take an offering every first Sunday for the support of the Home, but this time we made a special one to help on the building fund.

Yours sincerely,

M. F. Vuncanon.

AN APPEAL TO TEN BOYS.

I am thinking tonight of boys fourteen, fifteen, sixteen, seventeen years old. Ten boys in particular, Herman Harris, Clyde Hight, Henry and Alley Young, Earl, Page and Lueco Harris, Jasper Hicks and my own boy, Edison Hicks.

Dear Boys: Do not think that word "Dear" is used pro forma—I mean it. There are others to whom you are dear; who rightly expect much of you. You stand at the "parting of the ways". One way leads to prosperity and happiness and on to the heights from which George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, Thomas Edison, Daniel Webster and others of the world's great stepped into eternity. The other way leads to the commonplace, to mediocrity, and on downward to shame, infamy and disgrace. It has been said that to make men of the right kind, the start must begin several generations back. In your cases that precaution was taken. Your blood has not "crept through scoundrels ever since the flood". You can not realize now what a calamity it would be and what mortification you would feel, if you should step down from the homes and the church in which you were born. An old head can not be placed on young shoulders; but a young head can contain the thought that "fire burns". Each of you is now beyond the age at which the laws of your State and town hold responsible for your conduct. In the next four years your position throughout the years of your earthly life and your eternal destiny will be determined.

Those bodies you have are sacred. They are the most delicate machines ever constructed. Think of your hands, feet, eyes, ears, noses, tongues, brains, stomachs, lungs, bowels, nerves, muscles, circulatory systems and generative organs! All built and watched momently by the Architect of the Universe to run three score years and ten at least; to give pleasure as well as be of use all the time, as well as the home of a germ destined, if properly cultivated, to live with its Creator happily forever.

A boy who has thought seriously of his Creator can not possibly take His name in vain. Every one of you knows if He were to take his mind or attention from you one minute you would be no more than a dead twig. Those bodies have been called "the Temple of God". He placed there a portion of His mind. To defile one of them with whiskey, tobacco, injurious drinks and other unmentionable vices, is in fact worse than if you were to carry and empty into my parlor a quantity of the worst kind of stinking filth. That might be cleaned out. You boys were born pure. You have been told what is right and what is wrong. The law now says you know the one from the other. Have you heard those world-old phrases: "Habit is second nature"; "Use almost can change the stamp of nature"; "Sow a thought and reap an act—sow an act, reap a habit—sow a habit, reap a character—sow a character, reap a destiny". Try to change the habit of putting your left arm in your coat sleeve first and see what a task it will be; yet it would have been easy at first. I am thinking of you boys because some of you are out from the parental roof—you are listening to other boys talk. Some of them have not been taught and trained so well as you. Have not "screwed their courage to the sticking place" of duty as well as you have. They are not fired with ambition to succeed as you all are. They will tell you of the sins of boys; of the different paths to the lower world. Refuse them once "and that shall lead a kind of easiness to the next" refusal. Remember who you are and what is expected of you. Remember the hearts that would break at your downfall and failure. Many of the premature gray hairs and early deaths of parents are because of disappointed hopes in regard to their children. You ten boys have been reared in a church, in a class. When I was a boy a whole county might have been canvassed without finding as many boys with the opportunities you all have had and are now enjoying. You no doubt see many things that fascinate and divert your attention; things that are not per se sinful. Dress, parties, autoing, time wasting, loafing on the streets etc., etc.

When you become men five or six years from now, the man without a trained mind will not be in the game at all. You may be chauffeurs or draymen. You might make a farm hand to work under orders; but not a farmer. You will be expected to handle ideas. The world needs idea handlers. Oh! they will command the salaries! We, your parents, are now furnishing you the tools to handle them—to originate them, to use those of others. You must know the English language. To know it, you must know the Greek and Latin languages from which it is derived. And you must know mathematics. Language and mathematics with history and literature for side lines of culture and information, boy, will put you on the firm hard road to success. They are the sine qua non. They and character, being worthy of trust, are the whole outfit. Three fourths of the boys in the State will not live up to this advice. Oh! that they would! They will need men to furnish them ideas. You will be expected to do it. Position, opportunity, increase obligation. Get busy, boys! Every day lost weakens your chances. Think of a little boy who just forty years ago was the son of a poor farmer in the poorest county in North Carolina. He cultivated his mind, went to school, kept at work. Last spring he was sent as ambassador to England! The battle of ideas is on, boys—you must fight in that battle. The hardest thing in the world to learn in getting an education is the English alphabet. And the more you learn the easier it is to learn. That is a law of nature. The snowball is an illustration. The more it rolls the bigger it grows. I have traveled the road. In this I am telling not only you, but the State what is expected of you, for two reasons. 1. That you may know the eyes of the State are upon you. 2. Some other boys may see and profit by it. Get busy, boys. Get the work habit. Work with character are the conquerors. A single man such as every one of you now has the opportunity to become is worth a whole county full of ordinary men.

—We are indebted to Rev. C. E. M. Raper for the cut of the Reidsville Church printed this week. Bro. Raper persisted in the face of difficulties, and through the co-operation of others, first to be named among whom are Rev. and Mrs. G. S. NON-DESCRIPT COMMUNICATION.

All Our Pastors Will Please Read.

Dear Brethren: On the fourth Sunday in August at Spring Church, Va., I completed my itinerary for 1913, and I am now at home taking a rest and reading the interesting reports from the different pastors and reporters throughout the District. Some are encouraging and some are not so much so. Am pleased to see the reports of good meetings and several conversions; but from some cause a small per cent. join our church. It is right and proper to get people converted, and I think if persons are converted at our altars, as pastors we ought not to hesitate to give them a chance and even invite them to connect themselves with our church, and not only the pastor; but the members of the church should not stand around with their mouths closed and let other denominations give the first invitation, and take them from our altars into their communion. I have seen this done more than once: just a little attention at the proper time tells, done at the right time in the right way and at the proper place. Let us be wise and harmless in the work.

From the quarterly reports that I receive I notice the majority of them show the general interest collections to be behind, and from now until Conference pastors will have to keep busy and see to it that the stewards or collectors for these interests are doing that for which they were elected, collecting the assessment for general interests. A statement by the pastor from the pulpit as to how much is collected and how much is behind will encourage the collectors, and help to stir up the membership to pay in their part; don't let any pastor have the false modesty to think, or say, I am not going to speak of it publicly, for fear some one may think he wants his salary, for because everybody knows he wants his salary and ought to have it, and this is one way he can help himself to get all that's coming to him by doing his duty in this particular way, and by filling his appointments, visiting the sick and those who need a pastoral call and give such encouragement as many people need, and get them to subscribe for the church paper and show to them he is interested in their temporal and spiritual welfare, and this cannot all be done in the pulpit.

I want to call special attention to the following collections now: Church Extension, Superannuates and the Minutes Fund. Church Extension is one of the most important parts to be considered in the N. C. Conference, and one only needs to travel over the District to be thoroughly convinced of the fact, and many know it without having done so. Several of our pastors are partially depending on this important collection; let every pastor make a special effort to collect the full amount assessed on his field.

The Superannuate assessment for this year is $800. I see from Conference Treasurer's report $540.21 was paid last year. Let us raise the full amount and make the beneficiaries feel that we do appreciate them for what they have done for the M. P. Church in North Carolina. Now the Minutes Fund. We ought to have a fund of $125 for this purpose. I see from Conference Treasurer's report only $73.36 was collected last year. Now let each pastor take this collection and put it with the amount you sold your minutes for (I mean 1912) and send it to Rev. N. G. Bethea, Sec. of the Conference at once, so we will know we have money enough in hand to publish the minutes at the opening of Conference, and not embarrass the Publishing Committee, and we can get our minutes earlier after the rise of Conference. We ought to publish and sell 1,500 or 2,000 copies next year to our people. Several failed to get last year who desired to have them.

Let all the pastors who have not done so send the names of the delegates elect and the alternates to the secretary of the Conference, Rev. N. G. Bethea, Henderson, N. C., and to me, High Point, N. C.

FROM OUR PASTORS

BUNCOMBE CIRCUIT.

Our third quarterly meeting was held August 16 at Mt. Zion. Attendance and interest good. We are glad to say our people are coming to the front with the various interests, and we hope to have a good report at end of year. The scribe has been in worse health this year than in any other year of his life. Pray for us.

On July 9 as the clock struck eight, Mr. Sam Angel and Miss Augusta Muray were standing in the parsonage taking a vow for life. They are of our best young people, and we wish for them a prosperous life.

Best wishes to the Herald's publisher and its readers. L. H. H.

SILER CITY CIRCUIT.

The third quarterly conference was held at Siler City the 30th of August. The conference was a good one. The reports were encouraging. The attendance was good. The circuit so far as the pastor is able to judge is in good shape. Splendid meetings have been held at about all the churches. Some improvements on the churches at Siler City and Hickory Grove are under way.

Dr. G. E. Matthews was elected delegate to the Annual Conference and Bro. J. M. Ray alternate. Our special meeting commenced at Piney Grove on the first Sunday in September. Children's day was observed the first service. The children did well, the service was good and reflects much credit to the children and to those that had the exercise in charge. The collection was good, the best that has been on the circuit. The special meeting closed Wednesday. The meeting was a splendid good one: the revival in the church was unusually good, there were 7 conversions and 4 joined the church. I expect to take three more in at my next round. Bro. Troxler was my much appreciated help. J. H. Bowman.

ALBEMARLE CIRCUIT.

In my last report I mentioned the fact that the material for painting the Creswell church had been ordered. Since then the church has been painted on the outside, and the pulpit and chancel have been varnished. We already had a nice little church at Creswell, but these improvements have made the place of worship much more attractive.

I wonder if the material improvement had anything to do with the good revival just closed at Creswell. Yes, a good revival! Bro. Bethea said so; and the people said they had seen nothing to equal it in Creswell for many years. The interest was so good, and congregations so large, and results so gratifying that we decided not to close the meeting on Friday night as was intended. So Bro. Bethea went back to Creswell from quarterly conference and preached Saturday night, Sunday and Sunday night, while I remained at Rehoboth to begin the meeting there as was intended. At Creswell there were nine conversions, and six of these joined our church. These were all young people ranging in age from a seven-year-old girl to a grown young man. Not only were souls saved but lives as well. Do you see what I mean? When you save an old man you save a soul; but when you save a young person, you save a soul plus a life. A vast difference. Bro. Bethea did all the preaching at Creswell except a sermon Sunday night by Dr. Plyler, Presiding Elder of M. E. S. Church, and one sermon Monday by the pastor.

The third quarterly conference met on Saturday at eleven o'clock in the Rehoboth church. Bro. Bethea, having made the thirteen mile trip from Creswell with us, in an auto, presided. The usual business was transacted. Bro. William Wiley is delegate to the Annual Conference, Bro. C. Tarkington is alternate. Sorry to say that only two of the six churches were represented in the quarterly meeting. Such ought not so to be, brethren.

As I have already said, I began the meeting at Rehoboth on Sunday, Aug. 31. Bro. Bethea same on Monday and preached until Tuesday night when the meeting was rained out. Not much visible result at Rehoboth. I am hoping to try again to have a revival the second week in October at the same place.

Both people and pastor counted themselves fortunate in having Bro. Bethea with them in the meetings. The increase of the congregation from day to day showed how his preaching was appreciated. We thank him for giving us these two weeks out of a busy summer.

Linley W. Gerringer, Pastor.

CLEVELAND CIRCUIT.

We have just closed our meetings at Pleasant Hill, Knob Creek, and Mt. Moriah. At the two places first mentioned Bro. Suits was my help, and I am sure that the people will not forget soon his clear-cut practical sermons. Few men are more gifted on this line than Bro. Suits.

Bros. Self and Martin were my help at Mt. Moriah. They both did faithful, earnest work for which we are grateful. As a result of the above meetings we had 18 accessions to our church. Pastor.

HIGH POINT.

We have recently received fifteen members into the church here by certificate. The first was Mrs. A. L. Ellison, who came to us from the Friends' Church. Then came Dr. and Mrs. J. J. Hamlin, the one from Giles' Chapel, Richland Circuit, and the other from the Lutheran Church.

And then Mr. W. F. Black from the M. E. Church, and Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Garrett, from Grace church, Greensboro, Mrs. Fannie Page, Clell Clouse, Chase Nash, Earnest Nash, Ethel Brown, Bessie Morris, Bessie Clouse, Robbie Clouse, and May Sikes, all from Denton.

We are glad to have all these associated with our church here. They will add very materially to our working force. It is a genuine pleasure to have the Children's Home so near and to have its inmates worship with us, and seem to feel so much at home among us.

We observed our fall Rally Day yesterday with good results, we believe, for the Sunday school and the church. On the last Sunday in August there were 200 in Sunday school and about 210 in the morning preaching service. Yesterday there were 250 in Sunday school, and about 225 at preaching. We are planning, working, praying, and trusting for great results in our fall campaign for the Lord. Our revival will begin October 19th, with Rev. W. F. Ashburn to do the preaching. Pray for us.

Yours for the Master, A. G. Dixon.

ASHEVILLE.

Proceeds from the Labor Day Sale continue to mount up as the stuff left over is disposed of. We will have clear something over $88.

The trustees met on last Wednesday night and unanimously accepted the architect's preliminary sketches of the church plans. He has promised to give us the blue prints by the middle of this week.

One of our members, Mrs. Robert Greenwood, was seen approaching the church lot with a colored man last Thursday morning. The man was burdened with a miscellaneous collection of axes, wedges, and so forth. Mrs. Greenwood informed the preacher that she wanted to spend the first dollar on the church lot, and forthwith ordered the man to get the trees out by the roots and cut them into cordwood. So well did Sandy work that by Saturday noon the job was done. We got about three and a half cords of wood. This will be sold and the money put into the building fund. We expect to begin the work of grading this week, preparatory to excavating for the foundation. One of the contractors here, a Missionary Baptist, came to me on Saturday and wanted to know when we were going to begin grading. He said he wanted to give us a couple of days of hauling. We are finding unexpected friends in many places, all of them eager to help now that we are actually helping ourselves. C. W. B.

CORRECTION.

In last week's paper in my writing about Macedonia church on Lincoln Circuit, I should have said that is a new church, and I think the future is bright for us there. We hope to go back there in September and run another meeting.

Since this writing we have secured Bro. D. A. Highfill to help there, beginning on Saturday before the third Sunday in September. H. E. Waldrop.

THE TIDINGS.

Since the Tidings last appeared it has been the happy privilege of the writer to visit several of our charges where revivals were conducted. And this account of the things observed and the impressions made is attempted because it is believed that by so doing profit might come at least to some.

NEW HOPE, VANCE CIRCUIT. This place was reached on July 7th. This is one of our old churches and has done a great work. Of recent years other churches have been built near it and this to some extent has limited its possibilities. But there is a faithful band at New Hope who are loyal to their church and are doing a good work. They are devoted to their pastor and are standing by him. They are continually favoring him with nice things, but they are not the kind to make a display of their good deeds or to make their pastor in any wise feel that he is an object of charity. They believe it is their duty to care for him and they do it cheerfully. The excellent preaching and a very pleasant manner of Bro. Burgess is counting for good. He is doing a good work.

STAR, WHY NOT CIRCUIT. This place was visited during the week following the fourth Sunday in July. Star, while small now, is destined to be a thriving center of commerce and industry. It is where two branches of the Norfolk and Southern R. R. cross. We do not have a church building at Star, but the good people of the M. E. Church, South, were kind to invite our people to join them in the revival work. It is to be regretted that because of a previous engagement pastor Stowe could not be present during this revival. But Mr. Ellers, pastor of the M. E. Church, was found to be a Christian gentleman and the work with him was very pleasant indeed. The imperative need of our people at Star is a church. The people know this to be their need and are considering the matter seriously. They are considering a central location which, if purchased, would be ideal. The people at Star are loyal, true and intelligent. There are most excellent possibilities for us at Star. Now is the time for us to care for these possibilities and build for the future as well as the present. We have so oft times lost by delay.

EDEN, HALIFAX CIRCUIT. Having arrived at this place on August 4, it was a great pleasure to see places and faces familiar because of a visit nearly six years ago. The changes that had taken place during this six years interval were very noticeable. Six years ago the people were very much depressed because of some discouraging conditions. The people are now very buoyant and hopeful. Six years ago it was difficult for this church to support a Sunday school, while now the membership has agreed upon a plan by which three flourishing Sunday schools are conducted within the large country depending upon this church. This arrangement puts a Sunday school within reach of all, otherwise some would not be able to attend because of distance. Recent improvements on the church building and furnishings are things to be appreciated. Eden people are among the best. The older people are true and standing by their church and pastor. The young people—a large number of them—are developing into most excellent church workers. These are evidences that the people are alive to the responsibilities and opportunities that go with a church which is the only one in a large country where there is a large number of people depending upon it for spiritual influences. There is a need of more frequent services at this church, and it is believed by both pastor and people that this can soon be arranged for. Pastor Pritchard loves his people and is alive to their needs. He is especially active in developing his people by means of training classes and by placing the Herald in the homes of his people. If all pastors would do as he is doing along these lines, it goes without saying that we would have a more developed people and stronger churches would be the result.

Hawkin's and Weaver's Chapels, Littleton Circuit. The second and third weeks of August were spent with these churches respectively. At both of these places there are wonderful possibilities and any one can see that these possibilities are being developed into realities. These churches have been great factors for good in their respective communities. And now the people of the surrounding countries are returning their compliments by standing by and supporting these churches. The older ones in the past have, of course, been the supports of these churches and now it is encouraging to see the young people falling into line and becoming great strong supports . These very encouraging things are to be seen at both these churches. There are many reasons to believe that the great possibilities of these churches will be utilized as time goes by. It is hoped that new church buildings or improvements on the present ones will be realizations at both places in the near future.

Littleton. It was indeed a pleasure to attend two services at the Littleton church. It would seem that this church was one of promise. Littleton is not over-churched and with our splendid people who are intelligent and loyal the future should bring growth and development. The need of Littleton church is for the pastor to give it at least one half of his time. It is to be hoped that in the near future this can be done. Bro. Edwards, the pastor, is doing a good work and his people appreciate his efforts. As well as other things, he is giving attention to the financial interests. If all we pastors would work the finances as Bro. Edwards does, our records would be better. Beginning in time with well laid plans and then working these plans will mean interests all paid on every charge.

At all these places visited, the people were very kind indeed and in every case impressions were made that will be lasting. And above all, the Spirit was with us in great power, the salvation of many souls being the result.

May God bless all these good people and may we all meet around God's throne is my prayer.

Geo. L. Curry.

THAT OFFERING FOR THE CHILDREN'S HOME.

According to this writer's opinion, we have done nothing in the last twenty-five years that conduced more to solidify the rank and file of our Church in North Carolina than the erection of the Children's Home has done. The beautiful site, the magnificent building, well arranged, artistically designed, with the plat of good land for farming purposes all impress one deeply at first sight and do not pall upon our judgment upon fuller acquaintance.

That we have done well in what has been done, all agree; the people who pass by, the people who stop to go through the building, the interested and disinterested all declare the building a splendid achievement for the cost. We have been told that it far exceeds anything they (the speaker) have ever seen for the money. We all can feel justly proud of what we have done. There remains for the completion of the good work, the indebtedness must be removed, this must be done by us: the Home must be supported, and this must be done by us. Chairman J. M. Millikan has called upon every Sunday school in our entire denomination to give one special offering to the Home during September; please do not forget this. What has been accomplished will be hurt unless we all rally whole heartedly to the the appeal of our brothers in this noble work. Let us all make the heart of Supt. Garrett and Chairman Millikan swell with joy by what we shall do for the Home during this month. Everybody working for a little while, everybody giving but a little sum, would pay off the last dollar of the debt, and support easily the Home. We can, if we will, and we will.

BRO. MARTIN ON THE UNION PROPOSITION.

I want to express the opinion that union with the U. B. Church on the basis proposed would be damaging to us in different ways: the people are not willing to drop the Methodist name nor have bishops, the very thing we have so strongly opposed for so long. The name United Church is misleading for the re few Protestants are going into i accept United Methodist Churc ted superintendents as we do

If we unite, we will lose the r people. It's the most unsatisfac sition I have ever known and u Our great church is big enoug possibilities before it. In my union will amount to division I said it was damaging us: we ready to build a nice church in ville, but the leader in the wo Stallings, who will put $400 church, won't go forward in v fact that if we unite on the pro is, our people will leave the chur new church will hold the propert are wanting to build in this nic lage and we are likely to lose our We just have to wait until the of this matter. If we can get trouble I hope we will stay brethren, is the time to speak or hold our peace. Let every read a matter of earnest prayer.

Mrs. J. F. Lock gave an ice-cream supper at home last Tuesday night for benefit of the church; the crowd was very small, owing to the fact that it was such a bad night; have not learned the amount collected.

We were very sorry our pastor's wife was confined to her room with malarial fever and could not be with us during the meeting.

This report is rather late owing to the fact that my mother has been real sick, but am glad to say is much better now.

FRIENDSHIP, YADKIN COLLEGE CIRCUIT.

We are still moving on, having a right good Sunday school. Much interest is being taken, especially by the children. Our pastor visits us each month and always has a splendid sermon and his presence and messages always do us good; we all love Bro. Powell. He has a warm welcome in our hearts, homes, and church and we trust that his untiring work and effort for good will not be lost. On Saturday before the third Sunday in July the third quarterly conference was held. Rev. G. E. Hunt preached a very able sermon at 11 o'clock; in the afternoon conference was held. On Sunday at 11, Mr. Hunt filled the pulpit again, our pastor being away. The fourth Sunday in August our special meeting began. Rev. W. F. Ashburn came on Sunday and did all the preaching. He preached the gospel in all its love and purity and some soul-stirring sermons. He made many warm friends while here, his visits in both home and church were much enjoyed. Bro. Ashburn was here some 25 years ago and we were very glad to hear and see him again. Come again. There were fifteen conversions and reclamations and the church greatly revived. Seven joined the church, but our hearts go out in deep sorrow for the poor lost sinner that still rejects God's saving power and the entreaty of his people. Oh! Lord,, grant that they may yet see their lost state before it is too late. Bros. Powell, Ashburn, and all the Christians labored untiringly. Meeting closed Wednesday evening.

MIZPAH, HAW RIVER CIRCUIT.

Rev. W. F. Ashburn filled his regular appointment here last Sunday. He preached an excellent sermon to an attentive congregation.

We were glad to have Rev. E. O. Pritchett preach for us the third Sunday in August.

We had our special meeting the first Sunday in August. There were three to join the church.

The ladies of the neighborhood will give a lawn party Sept. 13. The proceeds will go for the benefit of the orphanage.

PINEY GROVE, SILER CITY CIRCUIT.

On the 1fth Sunday in August our children's day was held. The children did remarkably well, reflecting much credit upon the trainer, Mrs. J. A. Cooper. The house was filled and several were outside. The collection was $8.52. Our special meeting began in the afternoon with Bro. Troxler as pulpit help. Bro. Troxler did some most forceful and helpful preaching; six professed and one was reclaimed, four joined the church. Others to join later. Owing to rain we did not have services after Tuesday. We were sorry we could not hold our meeting longer, for it seemed that those that had not come to the altar were deeply convicted. We all enjoyed Bro. Troxler's stay among us and hope he will come again. We are all hoping and praying that the good Lord and the Conference will send us back our beloved pastor, Bro. Bowman. We believe that he is the right man in this place. There is scarcely one that would not vote for Mr. Bowman to come back to this circuit. Last Sunday was our regular preaching day, but owing to the fact that our pastor was away helping Rev. H. L. Powell in a meeting his appointment was filled by his brother, Rev. W. A. Bowman, who gave us a most splendid sermon on Whom We Should Serve. His text was, "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve." We were glad to see so many out to hear him, but there were others who ought to have been there. We all hope Mr. Bowman will come again.

With all good wishes for the Herald and its readers, Fleta Kivett, Rep.

BURLINGTON.

Our Sunday school attendance last Sunday was 187, and the offering amounted to $4.60.

Over one hundred members of our school enjoyed the picnic last Saturday afternoon, which was held at the Graham Club House. It was especially enjoyed by the children, for whom the picnic outing was mainly given. Boat riding was one of the most enjoyable features of the day. Large tables were burdened with all kinds of good things to eat, and at the proper time for the picnic feast, our pastor was asked to pronounce a blessing upon the occasion, and each one present partook to their entire satisfaction.

Bro. J. G. Rogers, our genial superintendent, has introduced a system of grading the smaller classes in our school, putting all scholars in the classes according to the manner in which they are graded in our public school, thus making it much easier for the teachers to teach the lesson.

Our third quarterly conference was held on last Tuesday night, Sept. second. Bro. J. D. Payne was elected delegate to the Annual Conference, and Bro. G. L. Amick was elected alternate.

Our special meting will probably begin the third Sunday of this month. Pulpit help has not been secured yet, but correspondence is being caried on with the various pastors in nearby towns looking to that end.

Bro. Davis is assisting Rev. E. G. Lowdermilk in a revival meeting at Friendship church this week.

We were very glad to see Miss Elizabeth Bunch back in our Sunday school last Sunday. She has returned to Burlington to teach in the public school. We welcome her back.

Bro. T. T. Stafford is spending his vacation in Randolph County this week.

Bro. Paul Davis, who has been reporter for the Herald during the past year, left Monday for Chapel Hill, where he goes to enter the University of North Carolina. Paul is a young man whom we esteem very highly. We regret to lose him from our Sunday school, and we are sure he carries with him the very best of good wishes from his many friends in Burlington.

Miss Reba Tuttle, of Winston-Salem, is spending some time with Miss Margie Loy. A most delightful reception was given by Miss Loy Monday night in honor of her guest, Miss Tuttle.

Miss Margaret Davis, who has been spending her vacation in Scranton, Pa., is expected to return this week.

WELCH MEMORIAL.

The average attendance in Sunday school for the first quarter was 98; for the second quarter, 143½. For July, 146¼; for August, 115½. The largest atendance this year was 192. We are much in need of class rooms. There is an average of 50 in one of our primary classes. We believe the life of the church is found in the Sunday school.

We have good attendance at all of our services. Our regular midweek prayer meeting is fairly good. It seems we are in need of the real life that should be the dominant feature of any prayer meeting. When one brother gets up and his experience is

On Saturday, Aug. 30, our Sunday school picnic was held at the home of Mr. J. W. Hunt. The day proved one of great enjoyment to the many Sunday school pupils and others who were present.

Several of our young people have left for school. Messrs. Talton Bobbitt and Clifton Floyd have gone to Elon College. Miss Irene Watkins has entered Sarah Plunkett Hospital in Henderson to be a trained nurse. Messrs. John Hunt and Leslie Stone left today for university of North Carolina. Mr. O. E. Master Sam Bethea had the misfortune to fall from a horse and break his leg a few days ago. However, we are glad to know he is getting along nicely now.

FOUR RULES.

He was a new boy in school, and according to custom—though nobody seemed to know when or why such a custom started—the others were teasing him and trying to make him uncomfortable. They did not succeed very well, for Don did not appear to notice their efforts. When the school hours endeed, however, and the pupils scattered for the homeward walk, there was a fine chance.

"Here, you little softy-boy!" cried Archie, catching up with the newcomer, at the end of the brick wall. "what are you hurrying on so fast for? For three cents I'd throw your book so far you'd never find it, and roll you clear down that hill."

"I wouldn't pay you three cents for throwing my book where I couldn't find it," laughed Don, "and I don't mind your rolling me down hill if you want to. It looks so smooth and green I'd like to roll down it anyhow. Come on, boys! Let's see who can roll down the fastest."

And before they quite knew how it came about, Don and Archie, with the two boys who had stopped to see what would happen, were having the merriest sort of game. Of course, Don did not stay a new boy for very many days. He was so good-natured that it wasn't easy to tease him, and so full of fun that everybody liked him, but Archie—who really liked him best of all, because they went home the same way and were together so much—always noticed how Don managed to laugh himself out of quarrels, and had a suspicion that his friend was something of a coward.

"I don't believe you'd fight a rabbit," he said, tauntingly.

"Of course not. 'Twouldn't be a fair fight," laughed Don.

Archie, himself, was so fond of teasing that he often forgot to think anything about what was fair and kind. That was the way in which he was tormenting a little German girl, one day, when he met her upon the road with a kitten in her arms.

"Here, I want that cat! Give it to me," he demanded. "Hand it over right away, little girl."

"No, I—I—please, I home take it," urged the small Bertha, her blue eyes frightened and filling with tears.

"He, this isn't a Dutch cat!" declared Archie. "Here, let me have it!"

He was crowing it out of her arms, while she struggled and tried to hold it fast, when suddenly he received a push so violent and unexpected that it knocked him over. Somebody promptly sat down upon him, while Don's voice, still good-natured, said:

"Run along with your kitten, sissy. This fellow doesn't want it, and he's so tired that he's going to lie still and rest awhile."

"Aw, get off. What did you do that for?" growled Archie, wriggling to throw off his burden.

"You can have three guesses—if you need 'em," answered Don. "If that had been your sister Esther, and you had seen any boy plaguing her, what would you have done?"

"Punch him," admitted Archie, honestly.

"Well, punch yourself, then," said Don, rolling off and giving him a chance to get up.

Archie sat up, brushed the dust from his clothes, and looked with a new curiosity and respect at the other small boy.

"Say, Don, I don't believe you really are afraid, after all," he said. "What makes you always act as if—as if—"

Don's brown eyes grew bright.

"It's my grandfather," he explained. "He's the bravest man I know, and he told me. He was a soldier and an officer, and he says there are four rules for courage: 'A laugh is a better weapon than cross words or fists. Don't think it's brave to quarrel and fight. Never strike unless you have to. Don't stand by and see some one smaller and weaker than yourself abused.' "

"Humph!" answered Archie—if that could be called an answer—and he walked away thoughfully.—Kate W. Hamilton.

THE ELEPHANT EATERS.

Laura and Mary Anna are two dear little sisters who live on Euclid Avenue West, in the city of Detroit. Laura is three years old, and Mary Anna is exactly twenty months. It may be hard to believe that these two babies eat elephants and tigers and lions and bears, but it is the truth. They eat cows, too, and horses—heads, legs, tails, and all.

What may seem still more strange, their mother buys animals for them to eat: she buys Noah's arks full at a time. To be sure, these animals are not the size of circus animals, and every one who lives on Euclid Avenue West must know that there are bigger animals in the jungle than the elephants Laura and Mary Anna like to eat.

One day, when the babies' mother had purchased for them a new ark, Laura was delighted to find that it was almost full of elephants, jamming and crowding against a few thin tigers and lions. She and Mary Anna were eating those elephants a bite at a time, first a leg, then a tail, next a trunk and plump body, when the door of the ark opened and out rushed the animals. Laura and Mary Anna were in their gocart when the acident happened: and when they saw their animals tumbling out on the cement sidewalk, they began to cry. Auntie, who was pushing the gocart, felt sorry because the dear babies had lost their animals. This is what she said: "There, there, don't cry. We'll buy some more to-morrow." But the babies cried harder than ever until auntie asked, "Do you want me to tell you a story?" Laura always cheered up when auntie offered to tell a story, which is the reason she wiped her eyes and smiled. And to this day that baby likes to be told about who ate the elephants. Auntie said that before long a dog came trotting down the street, and when he saw the elephants he said, "Bow-wow, bow-wow-wow!" Straightway he tasted of one, and it was sweet, so doggie ate three. After that Mr. Simon Strong came walking along with his head in the air, and he didn't even know that he stepped on seven elephants and ground them to powder. As soon as he was gone, down from the trees came a flock of sparrows, twittering and happy—mother sparrows, father sparrows, and baby sparrows. They not only ate all the crumbs, but were pecking at whole elephants when a ragged little boy jumped off a peddler's wagon and scared them away. The little boy snatched five elephants. A wee brown mouse with beady black eyes came creeping along from under a porch and ate three elephant's legs before he had to run away and hide.

Let all who do not believe that this story is almost every word true go to a grocery store, buy a box of animal crackers, offer a few elephants to babies and boys, to English sparrows, and a wee brown mousey, and then see what will happen. Frances Margaret Fox, in the Churchman.

—The lady referred to last week as wishing to go to Heaven as a Methodist Protestant writes that we misunderstood her. She does not expect to be known as a Methodist Protestant after she enters the pearly gates, but she wishes to be in character that which the name has always stood for—holiness of heart and purity of life.

We beg our sister's pardon. We did not tell who she is and are not telling now and will not be telling. We admire her loyalty to the M. P. Church and share very largely in her intense feeling of devotion to that for which our church stands. No prospect of union has come and we do not expect any to come alluring enough to tempt us away from the ground taken by the founders of our church. But if others come to the same ground and offer in all sincerity to help us in our great problem, we cannot feel that we ought to refuse this help. But let us not lose our equanimity over church union. When it is the right thing we want it, and when it is the wrong thing, we don't want it. We may trust God to show us our duty when the time comes to act, if we are willing to know and do our duty. If we are not willing to know and do our duty, we are not and cannot be true members of any church.

DENTON HIGH SCHOOL

——OPENS SEPTEMBER 1, 1913——

DENTON is situated in the Piedmont hills of Davidson County twenty miles South from Thomasville on the Carolina and Yadkin River Rail Road. This Railroad connects us with the Southern at Thomasville and High Point on the north and with the Southbound at High Rock on the South. About 350 yards west from the depot on Salisbury Street, nestling among a beautiful grove of oaks, is the home of Denton High School.

OUR COURSE OF STUDY prepares for any College, also for our State University. We give each student personal atention and do everything necessary for their comfort and advancement. A thoroughly competent teacher has been employed for the Music Department, and those who take this course will receive special attention. A High School Business Course will be taught free of charge as to tuition. Special work in Pedagogy for those who intend to teach.

FREE TUITION to ministerial students and children of the ministers of the North Carolina Conference. Cost of all necessary expenses for a year ranges from $115 to $145. We board students in good private homes. Indigent young men can get rooms and board themselves at actual cost. If any one wishes to pay a part or even all expenses by work, write the Principal for particulars. The school uses water from deep drilled wells with pumps, which eliminates all danger from germs in the water. Pure air, pure water, plenty of work; if these do not give health to the student, he will never have it. Write the Principal at Denton, N. C., for any further information.

—"To Help Southern Producers Find Markets for the Products of the Soil" is the slogan of the market department of the Southern Railway and affiliated lines, and with this end in view, a booklet has recently been isued which should prove of great value to fruit, vegetable, and truck growers of the Southeastern territory.

This booklet contains as complete a list as could be compiled of the brokers, commission merchants, jobbers and receivers of vegetables and berries located at the principal cities of the United States and Canada east of the Rocky Mountains. The booklet gives the name of dealers, character of business, and commodities handled, in each town together with the population of the town. A copy will be furnished free of charge to any grower of vegetables or berries along the line of the Southern Railway and affiliated lines.

A BIRTHDAY CELEBRATION.

Mr. Charlie Walker, of Fort Mill, celebrated his 50th birthday Sunday, Sept. 7. He had 27 friends and relatives present. Every one present enjoyed the occasion. Dinner was at 12 o'clock; the table was beautifully decorated with flowers and was filled with all the good things to eat that any one need wish for. After noon we sang several songs and all enjoyed life. All left for home about 5 o'clock, leaving Mr. and Mrs. Walker alone, wishing them all the richest blessings of life.

A FLYLESS TOWN.

Greensboro is very nearly a flyless town. It all happened this way. Greensboro had just one man that knew about flies and that had the nerve to back up what he knew with some hard work. One day he called on a woman in the last stages of consumption. As he entered the room the neighbor lady who had been fanning flies from the sick woman got up to offer the caller a chair. Almost instantly a swarm of flies almost covered the face of the helpless consumptive. The sight of this was too much for our anti-fly friend. He left the house and looked for breeding places near the house. They were not hard to find. Dirty stables and manure piles were there in abundance. The anti-fly man called in some of the city officials and showed them the situation. Like many other Greensboro people, they felt that that was nothing new, they had seen that kind of thing before. In fact, they had always seen such things. What did they do about it? They finally agreed to give our anti-fly man the authority of a sanitary inspector without salary, and as a further compliment endorsed his enthusiasm with some ordinances about hauling out manure at frequent intervals, keeping premises clean, etc.

What was the result? The result is that after some six or eight weeks Greensboro is nearly a flyless town. Some of the most enthusiastic people are those that had to clean up. The liverymen like the new order of things because there are so few flies to bother the horses. The health department likes the new order because the record for typhoid and diarrheal diseases among babies is only a fraction of what it was during the same time last year.

Too bad there isn't just one man in each town in North Carolina with nothing else but sense and still crazy enough on flies or hookworms or mosquitoes or tuberculosis or typhoid to clean up his town and make it an example to the rest of the State. A half dozen men like this in any town would soon make it the health resort of the South. —State Board of Health.

The man referred to here is Mr. E. P. Wharton, one of the wealthiest and most public spirited citizens.

WHY NOT RAISE FIGS?

A Northerner interested in fig culture has been visiting New Bern and Washington, N. C. In both towns he was told that no fig orchards were to be found in the country round-about. That is to say, figs are virtually not grown on a commercial scale. Why are they not? Fig orchards near Charleston have just shown themselves successful in the shortest possible time; and not only the shipment of the fresh fruit in season, but the preparation of fig preserves has established itself well. In eastern Texas the same activities are now prosecuted on a considerable scale. The New Bern-Washington section, with Wilmington, have the advantage of being nearer with such highly perishable fruit to the large markets than either of the other regions. They might look into commercial fig-growing, anyway.—Charlotte Observer.

TRYING TO FIND USES FOR AILANTHUS.

Excelsior can not be made from any or all woods. According to the popular notion it is a product of wood waste, but this is not usually the case. For example, the forest service, which has been experimenting to discover uses for ailanthus, sometimes known as Paradise Tree or Tree of Heaven, finds that it probably will not make good excelsior.

There are great quantities of ailanthus in the east, and especially in the Ohio and Mississippi valleys, where it has been naturalized from specimens introduced from China until it is now more abundant than some of the native species.

Its wood has been used in small quantities for boxes and crates, but no other use has been reported. The Indiana state board of forestry and the forest service co-operated in securing a small consignment for an excelsior factory, where it was found that ailanthus does not work up into good excelsior because the product was not springy and the strands tend to break and crumble under pressure. This may have been due in some measure to the fact that the wood has been kiln dried, and further experiments will be undertaken to see whether air-dried material, after a six-months seasoning, will be more satisfactory.

REIDSVILLE METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH.

IT IS NOW FIRMLY ESTABLISHED.

As already announced to the church, the Board of Foreign Missions has received the sum of Five Thousand Dollars for its Annuity Fund.

This is by far the largest amount contributed by any member of the church for our foreign missionary enterprise for a number of years.

The generous donor does not seek the slightest publicity, and has heretofore requested that his name be withheld, but has at last consented that it be made known. It is Mr. M. L. Shields living in the bounds of our West Virginia Conference.

This large contribution, together with a former gift from Rev. S. Heininger of our Michigan Conference, establishes our Annuity Fund on a substantial and permanent basis, and ought to appeal very strongly to our people who have money they wish to invest now with a view of having it applied to our foreign work.

By this plan the Board pays interest on the money given while the donor lives, and at his or her death it is immediately used in the foreign missionary work of our church.

Brother Shields is exceedingly anxious that others join him in building up this Annuity Fund to large proportions so as to insure the permanency and enlargement of our activities for the heathen world.

Full particulars of the plan, a sample of the Annuity Bond which is given to donors, and any needed information will be cheerfully given to any one. Write to me today while it is on your mind.

And This, Too, of Course.

There are quite a number of Sunday schools that have not yet sent me their Children's Day offering. This should not be, because the Board needs the money today, and cannot meet some of its obligations simply because our friends are holding the offering instead of sending it to me.

We are delayed in awarding the two Japanese silk embroidered banners by this delay also, as we wish to be just to all the schools in this matter. One banner will be awarded to the school giving the largest Children's Day offering, and the other to the school giving the largest offering in proportion to membership.

Remember, please, that you greatly embarrass your overworked and anxious Corresponding Secretary-Treasurer when you do not promptly send on this offering, and any other money intended for the Board of Foreign Missions. Come now, send me the offering without any delay.

Fred C. Klein, Cor. Sec.-Treas.

New York, Sept. 9.—A workingman employed on a new building on Sixth avenue, New Rochelle, dropped the end of a plank across a feed wire of the New Haven railroad's electric power system yesterday.

Instantly the entire steel frame of the building was charged with 11,000 volts of electricity. Sparks were thrown 50 feet from the contact points at the ends of the plank and 60 laborers and mechanics working on the building were knocked down.

The floor of the scaffolding with which the plank came into contact caught fire. Firemen who turned streams of water on the building were shocked. The current had to be turned off before anyone could reenter the building.—Daily News.

DR. JENNINGS DEAD.

Our people in Pittsburgh, Pa., were startled last Sunday by the announcement that Dr. M. L. Jennings, editor of the Methodist Recorder, had passed away on Saturday night. He has occupied the important position of editor of our Pittsburgh general organ for seventeen years, being elected by our last General Conference for the fifth term. He was when we first knew him professor of ancient languages in Adrian College. Later he served in the ministry several years in Iowa and Ohio, being president of the Muskingum Conference for a time. He has been in feeble health for a year or two, but somewhat recovered his former strength.

We are sorry to hear of his death. We numbered him among our nearest friends as many others did, for he was a man that showed himself friendly. He leaves a daughter and a wife to feel most keenly the great loss.

—Only a little over two months to Conference!

—The blind of the State are holding a convention here. One is surprised at the great number of these unfortunate ones, and is surprised again at the cheerfulness and self-reliance of many of this class. But they labor under a great disability, and should have the kindly consideration of those that can see. None of us would take a million dollars for our eyes.

—A lady wants to go to Heaven as a Methodist Protestant. Is not that impossible? Can any one enter Heaven as a Methodist or a Baptist or a Presbyterian or a Roman Catholic? Must not all go as sinners saved by the grace of Jesus Christ? Paul said: "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." It is a good prayer for us. If we succeed in getting to Heaven, I expect that we will look back on church names and church divisions as signs of narrowness and imperfection. It is necessary now to assume names to distinguish us from others we would not like to be identified with, but this necessity grows out of present human imperfection; and the mutual exclusiveness of the present will not carry over into the blessed and perfect society of Heaven.

A QUESTION.

In regard to the Union question. Will you please explain in the Methodist Protestant Herald whether the matter will be settled by the committee of the Annual and General Conference, or will the different churches be allowed to vote on it?

H. S. Fleming.

[The United Brethren have decided to refer the question to their Annual Conferences and then to the churches. We do not think our denomination should undertake to settle the question without referring it to the individual churches, and doubt whether it could be legally settled in any other way.—Editor.]

"FLOUTING."

Mr. Editor: When I used the word "flouting" in a former article, I was trying to express the truth as correctly as possible; nor do I think I missed the mark very much. When the M. P. Commissioners went to the General Conference of the U. B. Church at Canton, we made an address as fraternal, and as hopeful for union as the united efforts of the commissioners could make. We studied the matter carefully, and read and criticized it until we thought it entirely proper and fraternal.

After reading our address at 4 o'clock in the afternoon a learned bishop replied to it. In his reply he said that our commissioners reminded him of a man who moved out West—into a country infested with bears. He built a house and surrounded it with a high wall to prevent plundering by wild beasts. One day when he came home at noon he found that the bears had come in and turned over his bee hives and committed other depredations, whereat he was mad; so he told Sallie, his wife, that he was going to load his gun for bear and was going to the woods and clean them all out. So he loaded for bear and started out. He had gone but a little way when he met three bears coming towards him with their mouths stretched open ready for business. Such a sight made him a little shaky about the heart; so he turned and ran towards home. As he approached his enclosure he saw the gate shut, so he called to his wife, "Sallie! Oh Sallie! Open the gate. I am bringing them home to kill 'em."

This address elicited much laughter, during its recital and at its close, which caused me to think it met the aproval of the Conference.

Now, Mr. Editor, that did not sound like silence to me. He may have spoken "evasively" or he may have been "offensive to another denomination. I suppose each one must interpret for himself.

S. R. Harris.

[We presume the Conference did approve the bishop's story, the moral of which we take to be that the M. E. Church was trying to bring the M. P. Church and the U. B. Church home to kill them! But if the Conference passed any resolutions on the subject, I have not heard of them.—Editor.]

AN OPEN LETTER.

My dear Dr. Tagg:

What I wrote was unfortunate and what makes it more so is the fact that there is so much truth behind it. "He stayed away from the last meeting" sounds grave; and yet our commissioners voted that we could not attend another meeting of the joint commission until after the twentieth of June. An effort was made by the joint commission to set aside that action; but it was not done. The meeting was finally called in the face of that vote. I had given notice that I could not be there as a majority had done. Besides this, at the previous meeting a resolution was passed asking the secretaries to furnish copies of the reports of the committees and of the suggestions already received, so that we might be able to discuss them in all their bearings at the next meeting. I had not received those papers at the time of that meeting and so was not prepared nor even supposed to be prepared to act. No reason was given for such hasty action; except that the U. B. General Conference was to meet early in May and therefore we must do, in a month or less, what would require

WORLD'S SUNDAY SCHOOL COMMISSION.—XI.

BY C. E. WILBUR.

Across Siberia.

The commission finished its work in the Orient June 2, at Moukden, and on the evening of that day took the Japanese railroad for the long trip of ten days across Siberia and Russia. On every side were evidences of the tremendous struggle that took place in Manchuria in 1904-05 between Japan and Russia; and everywhere, also, are evidences that the same struggle will begin again. The antagonists have only paused for breath; or rather, they have not paused, they have only changed the form of the conflict from the boom of the cannon to the click of the shovel and pick. Having once fixed upon a plan of action Russia holds to it, though centuries may come and go before her goal is reached. Romanoffs may die by the bomb of the anarchist, and ministries my rise and fall at the word of the despotic czar, but the Russian policy of aggression goes on. She will have an ice-free port on the Pacific. This persistent pursuit of an end, though a difficult one to attain, will go far toward reaching it. Japan, on the other hand, believing that her safety and natural expansion demand that no other nation shall possess either of the two peninsulas that jut down from Manchuria towards her island empire, is using all her resources to tighten her hold upon them. Count Teruchi, governor-general of Korea, at a lucheon given the business men of the commission, was asked the purpose of the roads that were being built through Korea; with a magnificent smile he said, "For the convenience of American tourists, of course." But even unsophisticated American tourists could see that roads that connected no cities were rather for military purposes. Determined not to be again put to the disadvantage of having but a single line of track over which to operate Russia is rapidly double-tracking the Trans-Siberian Railroad. This work is already finished west of Irkutz, and is being done in sections at many points east of that city. When it is finished, "we shall see what we shall see."

The Japanese sphere of influence ends at Chang Chung, and here the Russian sphere begins. The termini of the Trans-Siberian Railroad are Vladivostock and Chang Chung. The juction of the two branches was reached at Harbin, and here the real journey across Siberia began. At once, one of the great weaknesses of Russian official life revealed itself. They call it "the squeeze." Officers who handle money for the government, hold a portion for themselves. It is almost universal, and, in general, in the Orient, is not regarded as in the Occident. The servants take a little "squeeze" from the sum given to purchase supplies for the family table, and in time the masters come to expect it and to laugh over it. It has been one of the great crying evils of the Orient since the days of Warren Hastings, and has not one bit abated since, save under direct Christian influence. At Harbin it manifested itself in the offers of the railroad officials to frank excess baggage through—for a consideration—a "squeeze."

This trip of six thousand miles across Siberia reveals its vast agricultural resources. For a thousand miles at a stretch the train whirled along through land as rich as the great corn belt of Illinois and Missouri. But at Lake Baikal was also seen the reason why the agricultural products are limited to wheat and cattle. On June 6 the ice had not yet disappeared from that great lake. The season is not warm or long enough for raising corn. Two causes hold back the development of this great country—sparsity of population and insufficiency of railroads and rivers—it is rich enough to support an empire of two hundred million people.

In Russia.

The commission, twenty-eight in number, all save one, that set out from San Francisco four months before, reached Moscow in good health and spirits. The tweny-ninth returned to America from Shanghai, on account of ill health, due in no respect to the work or travel of the party. The commission was supposed to break up at Moscow, June 11, to reassemble at Zurich, July 8; but at the earnest solicitation of Dr. George A. Simons, superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal work in Finland and Russia, it continued on to St. Petersburg and held service there Sunday, June 15. Here the commission was reminded that it was in Russia, not in Japan, Korea or China. Permission could not be obtained from the authorities for holding special services. So one of the regular services of the Methodist Episcopal Church in St. Petersburg was used for the final service. "For ways that are dark and tricks that are vain," the Russians have the Orientals beaten to a "frazzle." Nor must it be forgotten that "Russia is Europe in Asia, and Asia in Europe.'" Moscow and St. Petersburg are the eyes of Russia. With the former, two-thirds Oriental, she looks out upon the Orient and tries to assimilate her methods to those of the East; with the latter, one-third Occidental, she looks out upon the Occident and tries to assimilate her methods to the West. With one hand she is civilized and with the other she is uncivilized. With these facts in mind only can she be understood; and then she can not fully, for there are twists and turns in the Russian mind peculiar to itself.

Religious Freedom in Russia.

There is no such thing. The czar, several years ago, issued an edict guaranteeing religious freedom, but it has remained a dead letter, as the laws necessary for its enforcement have never been passed, and are not likely to be soon. The same intolerance continues. Dr. Simons is conducting a splendid work in St. Petersburg and surrounding cities and villages, in which he has gathered a constituency of more than five hundred in five years, with fifteen pastors, five chapels, a deaconess work, and many other attendants of a regular mission conference; but he did not come to Russia as a misionary. He came as the superintendent of the Finnish Conference of his church, a work already recognized in that province. Forces arising from within may continue to work, but none from without can send a missionary propaganda. Even these forces are not allowed to touch the children of the families of the Greek Church.

Protestant Missions in Russia.

The Methodist Episcopal Church has been criticised for entering Russia, a Christian country, as a mission field, but only by those who do not fully understand the conditions in the Greek Church. God can be approached intelligently and acceptably only as he is worshiped along the lines laid down in his book. The Greek Church rejected the worship of idols in its early history, but it substituted the worship of pictures. The icons, seen in all the churches and in all public places, even in railroad stations and dining cars, are pictures of the saints. The church rejected the idol, but it took the very word that described the idol, "icon," and applied it to the picture. These are borne upon the person as charms, and to the average Greek worshiper religion is little more than an effort to win the favor of "St. Nicholas, the wonder-worker," by offering him devotion. The Bible is a closed book; there is no religious instruction of the masses by preaching or literature; the service is rendered in the old Slavonic, a language that is not as much understood by the Russian peasant as the Latin of the Roman Catholic service is by the Italian or Spanish peasant; icons are worshiped. Who shall say that the "Go ye" of the Savior does not include this benighted land also?

Sunday Schools in Russia.

There are none in our sense of the word, except as they are conducted by the few Protestant missions that have obtained a footing here. The Greek Church is not a teaching organization. It has no public assemblies for the teaching of the word to young or old. Some little religious instruction is given in the public schools, but not ten per cent. of the Russians attend public school, on account of the prohibitive expense; and even in it the religious instruction given is very meager. It is true that the youngest children in the great churches will be found, no more than three years of age, prostrating themselves and crossing themselves before the icons, but this is through the instruction of the home, not the church, and it is "the blind leading the blind."

These heroic Protestant workers in the Russian empire need our sympathy and help. The Russians are natively religious and respond heartily to efforts made for their religious instruction. In the service held by the commission, in which six different languages were represented, the worshipers showed the true Methodist spirit and fervor. Prayers were offered in four languages. The field is a very promising one. A large number of Germans are making their permanent home in the Russian empire. Many of these are already touched deeply with the evangelical spirit, and they afford a means of approach to the Russian proper. They are cultured, understand the Russian language, and largely make up the teaching force in the Sabbath schools. What the Methodist church needs in Russia, first of all, as it appears to a casual observer, is a great central mission house in St. Petersburg, from which, as a center, all its work for Russia may be conducted.

FROM BROTHER RAPER.

Bro. J. F. McCulloch: I feel like saying I certainly enjoy our paper, and while we are both living, let me say, I appreciate your efforts to give us the paper you do. Many things strike me with force. I want to speak of two of late. Bro. T. T. Hicks asks why people do not go to church. I see some reasons given this week, or how to get them. My opinion in a nut-shell: one of the three reasons or all three—1st, The World; 2nd, The Flesh; 3rd, The Devil. A stern fact faces us which is universal. The fact is this is not a church going age, especially in town. The above reasons might be commented upon, but I will not. Some say visit them, try it and see how you come out. Every one (except the lazy) is in a hurry, and you have to run them down, and unless you are stronger than I am he will out-wind you; if you do get him stopped, both are ready to retire. I have visited, and secured many promises. I have issued cards inviting them to come. I have tried it through our town and county papers. They have no time to read. I know of people who suffer Friday and Saturday and may be longer, to take medicine on Saturday to keep them from losing a day in the week. These are not pessimistic views, but facts. If some do come they actually time you and limit you; —in a hurry for ——— something on the Lord's day. Of course there are exceptions, praise the Lord.

The second item I was very much impressed with is from President W. A. Harper, LL. D., M. P. H., Aug. 12, 1913, third page. If it did not get your attention will you not take the time to read it? As the old darkey said to Sam Jones, "Broder Jones, dem am my sentiments." Notice what he says on "Religious Divorce Courts —Avoid Them". He says he states facts and I am not doubting him, but in the past some have misunderstood me. Notice a "Tremendous Blunder," see what he says. See third page. I know of a professor and principal of a high school, a few years ago, that occupied the above high position at least three years, and he was rarely ever seen at Sunday school, and seldom went to preaching. Several of the patrons passed their opinions of his religious views. Some infidel, some Roman Catholic, some Baptist, and I talked with him and tried to draw him out, but he would not draw out. I know some who teach school, who say they never prayed in their lives. That may be the way to bring up our children, but I claim that any education is incomplete, and fearfully deficient if the morals, manners and affections are neglected. These neglected and scorned at, better far that he be uneducated. I like the physician that prays over his patient, certainly I would love for my teacher to pray for my child.

C. E. M. Raper.

P. S. I am also like the good sister after the sermon, she said, "I am going out to do the sermon, it was good". So I call attention to the serious truths Bro. Hicks and Harper have cited us to.

SOME QUESTIONS ABOUT CHURCH UNION.

We had hoped that never again would the cup of humiliation be forced to our shrinking lips, and held until we had drained it to its last bitter lees, but it seems that the subject will not "down" as long as a few even are more ambitious for worldy honor than for the glory of God and the salvation of men.

The question we wish to ask of all whom it may concern is—Can the Methodist Protestant Church decide a matter that is of such vital importance to the laity without the co-operation of said laity? If it cannot, we will go on our way in peace. If it can settle it—a few officers, I mean—then the very name Methodist Protestant, whose entire foundation is equal rights, should perish from the earth though it forced its grey-haired members to wander, churchless, to the grave.

When we read of another proposed union we straightway wonder what we have now that the other party wants, or which men in our ranks are willing to acknowledge that our church is only half of a pair of scissors—utterly worthless until it joins some other church, for which expressed opinions they expect to receive a little worldy honor.

From Dr. Tagg's article we infer that the intensely disagreeable name "bishop" is to be changed to "General Superintendent", no difference whatever in their ruling power, only a change of name to pacify and hoodwink the part of the church who cannot forget that "One is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren."

Now we have no desire to clog the wheels of progress for what has been designated "an old fogy notion," but if such great good is to come from this union to our church people—if it will increase and facilitate the spread of the gospel, and make individual piety the rule and practice, we will be glad to relinquish our objections and we are waiting, not very patiently, for some of our members to explain how this much desired state of things is to materialize from the union of our church with another. We don't need any flatteries or evading the question; we want the plain straight truth—what good will the contemplated union do the individual membership? We can plainly see the harm that it will do. If there is any good in it, it is entirely successful in hiding itself.

The proposed new church may possess itself of our church property, but it will be utterly powerless to hold the membership. It is all the country churches can do to support their pastors now, what showing would they have when a majority have joined some other church as they will surely do should this contemplated union be consummated.

We are praying that God will protect us from the evil consequences of the proposed union, and use our affliction for his glory and our ultimate good.

Ruth Fletcher.

NOTICE.

Pastors will please not forget to send in names of delegate and alternate for your charge as they are elected so the roll may be made out and that the president may have the list with which to make out the list of committees. This is Conference requirement, you know. N. G. Bethea,

Henderson, N. C. Secretary.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

On Wednesday, the 20th, through the kindness of Sheriff Johnson, I was taken to the station at Whitakers where I took the train for Pleasant Hill to meet my next appointment. Bro. Ledbetter had made arrangements for some one to meet me and a young Bro. Moore met me and took me to Bro. G. F. Robinson's where I took dinner and a short rest. Bro. Robinson took me to my first appointment at Ebenezer on Greensville Ct. We reached there on time, and found a small attendance as there were two special meetings in progress near by. Preaching over, Bro. Robinson took me to Bro. J. B. Clement's to spend the night. Early next morning Bro. Jesse Moss came to take me to Wesley's Chapel where I met with Bro. Ledbetter engaged in a special meeting; a very good attendance and a good service, one conversion; the meeting closed, dinner on the ground. The pastor and I were soon on our way to the next appointment at Matthews Chapel where we met several young people and a few of the older ones; it's a bit strange that people will grumble and complain if the president does not go to all of the churches, and many of those same croakers do not attend the services. We spent the night with A. W. Moore. Our next serviec was at Philadelphia, where we had a very good attendance and service. Took dinner with Bro. J. A. Walton. Hobbe's Chapel was our next appointment, and here was the largest attendance I had while on the Greensville Ct. All of the churches on this field are in very good repair except painting, and I made an effort to interest the board of trustees as to the matter of caring for the church property. Spent the night with Bro. R. D. Pair. Claim over paid.

Spring Church.

We drove to Lebanon, a distance of twelve miles; preaching at 11:30, dinner on the ground. At 1:30 P. M. the third quarterly conference met, not a large attendance, but a very interesting conference. One young Bro. Jordan was licensed to preach. The conference ordered the parsonage trustees to paint the parsonage at Pleasant Hill. The church at Lebanon is not completed, but the pastor and membership ought to get busy and finish it as early as possible.

We drove to Pleasant Hill where I met Bro. Ledbetter's family. Soon the evening train was due and Bro. Ledbetter and I went down to meet Bro. Hutton, who came to help Bro. Ledbetter in his meetings at Spring Church and Philadelphia. On Sunday A. M. at 11 o'clock we were at Spring Church where a large asembly of people gathered for service. I preached in the morning and Bro. Ledbetter in the evening; Bro. Hutton was on the sick list and was not able to preach. The services over, I bade Bros. L. and H. good-bye, and Bro. R. M. Robinson took me to Bro. W. M. Grant's where I took supper, after which Bro. Grant drove me to Weldon six miles, and there I waited until 12:38 A. M. and reached Henderson at 4 A. M. When I got off the train I met Bro. Bethea on his way to assist Bro. Gerringer in his meetings. Mrs. Bethea and her son kindly drove by the Henderson parsonage where I got a short nap of sleep and my breakfast. I met Bro. Williams and family. Sorry to find Mrs. Williams unwell. Bro. Burgess came over to Bro. W.'s and reported as to the progress on his field. At 7:45 I left for Hillsboro where I spent three days, took supper with Mrs. John Laws and dinner with Mrs. John Ray, and the balance of the time with W. A. Davies. I omitted to say Bro. Ledbetter is getting along with his large field as well as could be expected and his people are pleased with his work. If we have the men the next Annual Conference ought to assign a man to each of these fields. On the Spring Church charge there are only two appointments; but there are two points where we ought to organize and build churches: at Pleasant Hill and Roanoke Rapids, and I advised the pastor to organize at Pleasant Hill at once.

Claim over paid.

Thanks to Bro. Ledbetter and all his people for the kindnesses shown me.

PINNACLE AND MT. ZION.

We will now report our special meetings. We began our special meting at Pinnacle the fourth Sunday in July. Bro. and Sister Dixon did all of the preaching to the pleasure and edification of all who attended. We also enjoyed their social talks in our homes. We had eleven conversions, four accessions and a good revival in the church.

First Sunday in August we began our meeting at Pilot Church. Bro. Austin came on Sunday night and did all of the preaching after the 11 o'clock services Sunday. He did good faithful preaching which was enjoyed by all. The church was revived, two conversions, no accessions. This church is surrounded by a certain faith which makes it hard to reach them.

Second Sunday we began at Shoals. Here we had a helpful sermon at 11 o'clock by the editor of the M. P. Herald. Bro. D. R. Williams came in on Monday and did all of the preaching from then until the close of the meeting. He gave us some of his soul-inspiring sermons, which seemed to be very much enjoyed by all, and to the joy of all we had a good revival in the church with 11 conversions and 9 accessions.

We began at Mt. Zion third Sunday in August with Bro. Needham for help. He did all the preaching which was good, and beneficial to all who attended and gave heed thereto. We had a good revival in the church, 8 conversions, and 6 accessions. We were hindered in all of these metings by the frequent thunderstorms and the very busy rush of work, but notwithstanding all this, the attendance was very good. We wish to thank all for their faithful help. We also want to express our appreciation to the good people of this charge for their kindness to us during the year. We have been the recipients of many nice favors, such as canned goods, dried vegetables, etc., in the spring and green fruit, vegetables, melons, butter, honey, etc., during the summer. We want to assure you that all is remembered and treasured in our hearts, whether we make mention of it as often as we should or not, and hope that all may be fully rewarded by one who is able to repay ten fold.

There has been a great deal of sickness and several deaths in this community in the past few months, but we are glad to note that most of the sick ones are improving. Hope that all may soon fully recover. Bro. G. N. Butner is delegate to Annual Conference and Bro. G. W. Hunt alternate.

Fraternally,

A. L. Hunter.

LIBERTY, N. C.

We commenced our special meeting at Liberty Grove last Sunday. There was a large congregation present, for the place. Good attention.

Bro. R. E. Patterson and Mrs. Patterson have recently visited relatives in Vance Co., and their son who lives in Virginia. Mrs. Patterson will remain for a few weeks, Bro. Patterson has returned.

Miss Alline Curtis, daughter of Bro. A. W. Curtis, has returned from Baltimore, where she had an operation for appendicitis; she has recovered nicely.

G. F. Millaway.

HIGH POINT.

On Tuesday evening August 19th we held our third quarterly conference. The financial condition is fine for this time in the year. Pastor's salary paid in full to date, president paid, foreign missions paid, and the greater part of church extension and home missions paid. We have already observed "Children's Home Day," but in response to the call of Bro. Millikan we are going to give "one Sunday in September" to that offering. We hope every church in the denomination will respond to this call.

Mr. J. J. Welch was declared delegate elect to the Annual Conference, and Mr. A. M. Idol alternate. We have a committee apointed to make some necessary improvements and additions to our sunday school room before Conference. The people here are already looking forward with pleasant anticipation to the coming of Conference.

Our Sunday school has held up very well through the hot vacation months of the summer. The attendance for July and August has been 180, 160, 150, 188, 123, 152, 146, and 164. We held our annual Sunday school picnic last Thursday evening. There was a splendid atendance and the children had a most delightful time. As the picnic was held close to town nearly all the children could go.

Sunday, September 7, has been set apart for our fall rally day in the Sunday school. We are already working for a large attendance. Sunday, October 19, simultaneous revival services will begin in all the evangelical churches in High Point. Rev. W. F. Ashburn will do the preaching at our church during those services. We are praying for, working for, and expecting great results. Pray for us that God will richly bless.

A. G. Dixon, Pastor.

High Point, N. C., Aug. 27, 1913.

LINCOLN CIRCUIT.

Our special meeting began at Bess Chapel on the fourth Sunday in July. Rev. W. M. Fitzwater did the preaching for us. He preached with all the earnestness of his soul. His preaching was good.

All the people seemed to take great interest in the preaching, and we had a good meeting; some of the brethren said it was the best meeting that had been at Bess Chapel in years. There were nine professions of faith and two acessions to the church. Church revived.

Revs. D. M. Loy and W. D. Reed came over and were with us on the last day of the meeting. Glad to have them.

We closed the meeting here and went to Hebron church. Commenced the meeting there Sunday, August 3rd. Rev. D. M. Loy, of Gastonia, did the preaching, and Bro. Loy looked like he was at home when he stepped into the pulpit. He did some earnest preaching, the church was revived and we had a wonderful meeting. God was there as well as at Bess Chapel. Here we had eleven professions and seven accessions to the church, among whom was Rev. P. A. Carpenter and wife. They come from the Baptist church. The other five joined by profession of faith.

We went from there to Laurel Hill church where Bro. Loy still presented the Word of God to the people and they loved to hear it. We had the best meeting her that I ever saw. After the meeting had been running from Sunday to Wednesday, on Wednesday evening the "Holy Ghost descended and filled all the house." Everybody seemed to enjoy the meeting, and those who did not shout seemed happy. We had twelve professions of faith here, five accessions.

We closed the meeting and went from there to Macedonia church; here we only ran three days. We had splendid interest, but owing to the rain and Bro. Loy and myself being worn out, we closed. We had three professions at this church. This is a new church and I think the future is bright for the people there if they had a church; hope to go back there in September and run another meeting.

Our meeting has been a great help to me, and I feel that the people have been drawn closer together in love by the meetings.

We are all thankful to Bro. Loy for his faithful preaching and his earnest efforts put forth in the three meetings. May God bless him in all his works for good.

We are also thankful to Bro. Fitzwater for the good work he did at the Bess Chapel church.

Well, perhaps it will be of interest to many of our people to mention Grandma Bess's birthday, and the nice dinner prepared her and her friends August 27. Aunt Sallie Bess was 90 years old. She is in good health for a lady of her age, is able to walk to church and back home and loves to be in company with God's people. She is standing firmly on the promises of God, and said, "It is no use to pray without you have faith." When she was called out to dinner and saw the table well laden with good things as tokens of love to her on her ninetieth birthday, she said, "Praise the Lord, O my soul." May God continually bless Aunt Sallie. She is a good woman and seems to be good for ten years yet.

H. E. Waldrop.

GASTONIA.

It is with a sad heart that I try to tell through the Herald of Bro. Harvey Mainerd's fate!

On the twenty-fifth of August, 1913, Bro. Harvey Mainerd, who was a member of the Methodist Protestant church here in Gastonia, committed suicide! He was born the 17th of October, 1894, and shot himself on the 25th of August, 1913, aged 18 years, 10 months, and 20 days.

He leaves his father and mother, five brothers and three sisters, with a number of other relatives and friends to mourn their loss of one that is near and dear to them. It was with sorrowful hearts that we had to meet with him in the Union Grove M. P. church for the last time. He was engaged to be married to Miss Elthie Padaget, of Gastonia, N. C. He went to his work on Monday morning as usual, and he and the girl to whom he was to be married, the 31st of August were seen to have a brief conversation, about seven o'clock on Monday morning. He immediately left his work and went to his home, gave his mother the money to pay his debts, and immediately killed himself.

I wish to reveal to you all at this time a secret, which was this young man's aim in life. His purpose was to go to Elon College next year, and there prepare himself for the ministry. No one knew this but him and me. He revealed this to me the latter part of last year, asked my advice, so I advised him to go this fall, but he did not have quite as much money on hand as he wanted to begin with. In fact, he had decided to go there this year, and I had sent in his name to the faculty of Elon College, but he gave out going until next year. I had implicit confidence in him, and it seemed that he had the same in me. His morals were of the highest type, his motives were pure, far above the average young man.

Religiously speaking, he was the best, kind Christian hearted young man I ever knew.

The cause of his death is not positively known. It is thought that he and the girl to whom he was to be married the 31st of August had had a split up on Monday morning. Of course, this is supposition. May our heavenly Father bless and comfort the hearts of the bereaved, is my prayer.

With best wishes to the editor, I am

Fraternally,

D. M. Loy.

REIDSVILLE.

We held devotional services the eighth day of Mey, 1912, and I placed the first brick of the church. We dedicated it the first Sunday in June, 1913; would have been done in less than a year if we could have secured the lumber.

We have a membership of 46. There are between ten and twenty Methodist Protestants living in town who have not made up their minds to leave their home church. We have twenty-two families represented in the church; several, only one and two, and we are taking thirteen papers, M. P. Herald.. Every office of the church is well filled or filled with good earnest officers.

Our Sunday school numbers seventy. We have a good choir. They have paid pastor's salary quarterly and will pay up. They paid my help well. The Sunday school keeps a surplus in the treasury. We have at Bethany church thirty-four families represented and eleven take our M. P. Herald.

Sandy Cross, seventeen families represented, several moved away. Two take M. P. Herald. Total membership in families as best I can get for the charge is sixty-three, members, 126. Total number of papers for the work, 26. I must say in closing the work I have had to do for the past four years has been too much for my strength. I went to Conference four years ago just out of an eight-weeks' spell of malarial fever. I am now under the doctor's care and fear I can not finish this year's work. If this work can secure a man for next year full of grace and work, the foundation is laid for him. We have $225.00 on interest since about the 15th of January, 1913, parsonage fund, and several are interested. Asking your prayers for wife and myself and family (wife is very feeble, too; the doctor has just now said wife had appendicitis; we are doing all we can to avoid operation),

Fraternally,

C. E. M. Raper.

THE POSTAL CARD

W. F. KENNETT, EDITOR

THE UNION QUESTION.

The question of the propsed union of the United Brethren and Methodist Protestant churches is one that is agitating the church from center to circumference at this time. I am sorry our people are not in a position to keep posted on this question—only the few who read both the Methodist Protestant and the Recorder are in a position to get the arguments on both sides of the question. Here the objection to two (general?) organs is very evident and the very fact that we have two papers has kept our own church from being as thoroughly united as it should be and may lead to a split in the church in the near future. A writer in the Methodist Protestant says:

"One of the great hindrances to the more rapid growth and development of the Methodist Protestant Church has been the lack of an effective superintendency. Another has been the lack of tangible unifying influences. Even in the matter of church papers we have had the divisive influence of two instead of the unifying influence of one."

It seems to me that all articles pro and con on the union question should for the information of our people on so important an issue, appear simultaneously in all the church papers.

Evidently the western Conferences are much more anxious for the union than are the eastern and southern Conferences. This is very naturally the case, because the United Brthren Church being strong in the West, weak in the East, and almost without membership in the South will make the western Conferences the chief beneficiaries by the union. The Maryland Conference seems to be very much divided on the question. Some of the leading members of the Conference are very strongly against the union and a Conference has been called by the president and standing district committee for the purpose, it is suggested, of influencing, by their example, the action of the many smaller Conferences which meet this fall.

Dr. Tagg, in closing an editorial in the Protestant says:

"The petition says that the Maryland Annual Conference, being the oldest and the largest of all the Conferences, should be heard before all the other Conferences have spoken. It is nobody's fault that the Maryland Conference meets in the spring, and all the other Conferences meet in the autumn months. Nor is that a good and sufficient reason for doing an unauthorized thing in calling the Conference together. It is true that the Maryland Conference is the largest, and that it has a right to be heard, but does the accident of holding its session in the spring deprive it of this or any other right? Would it not be more impressive and more dignified to wait for the proper time and declare itself in the consciousnes of its right, its strength and its influence? Does this indicate that it wants to express itself first that its action may influence the other Conferences? Does it want to defeat the union by precipitate action from an assembly with no legal authority to act?

"The Maryland Conference is entirely within its rights in opposing the union if it wants to do so and so is any Conference, but it is not within its rights by calling the Annual Conference together in a convention when no action was taken by the Conference to call such a meeting, and when there is no provision in the Discipline, nor any precedent in the past history of the church to justify the call?

"Suppose the commission had found speedy action advisable in negotiations with the Methodist Episcopal Church, which is also embraced in this resolution of the last General Conference, does anybody believe that a special convention of the Maryland Conference would then have been asked for or called?

"Brethren, it is not possible to do right by doing wrong. Union may be defeated by the majority vote of the church, and no one will concur more promptly in the church's decision than the editor of this paper.

"But to attempt to defeat it by extraordinary and unauthorized means is to take responsibilities that any Christian man ought to be slow to assume."

This editorial indicates something of the interest our people in Maryland feel in the question. There are two sides to every question and both sides should be carefully considered before a decision is made. The question to come up at our approaching Annual Conference is not whether the Union shall be effected, but whether the General Conference shall be called in extra session to further consider the question and to act on it so far as it has power to do so.

The question is a great one and should be carefully and prayerfully considered and it should be understood that the action of one Conference will in no wise relieve or lessen the responsibility that rests upon another Conference for its own action in the premises.

LOCAL CHURCH NEWS.

Our third quarterly conference was held in Palestine church Saturday, August 16. All the churches well represented. The reports showed progress along all lines. Bro. N. W. Gordon was found to be elected delegate to the Annual Conference and Bro. J. B. Ogburn was chosen as alternate.

UWHARRHIE CIRCUIT.

Dear President: We held our third quarterly conference at Canaan the twenty-fourth. All the churches represented but two; business transacted in the usual way. Finance is coming up better than any year since I have been on the work; they have paid up to date a little more than two-thirds of my general interests. That is more than has been paid in one year since I have been here. Bro. A. Ridge was declared elected delegate to Annual Conference; Bro. C. H. Hill, alternate. I feel the work is in good shape. I have held four meetings. We began at Flint Hill the fourth Sunday in July with Bro. D. A. Braswell as pulpit help. He did some good preaching and some very effective work. There were some conversions, some reclaimed, but not the result we hoped to see; but I feel sure that Bro. Braswell left some things with them that they will remember at Judgment. The next was Mt. Zion, first Sunday in August, with Bro. J. W. Hulin as help. It seems that he was at his best and did some very good practical preaching. We had a splendid meeting; about 12 conversions; only two joined our church. One great drawback to this work is after we catch the fish, some one else strings them. The next point was Cid, with Bro. Allred as help. We had a very good meeting here. Bro.

Allred did some good preaching and is a splendid revivalist. We had some 20 conversions; 6 have joined the church, and more will, I think. We were at Canaan last week with Bro. O'Briant; he did some very effective preaching for the results proved it, although there were obstacles in the way; but they were gotten out Thursday at 11 A. M. We had a good meeting almost every service, but it was a hard pull; had it not been for such effective preaching the result could not have been what it was. Bro. O'Briant had to leave us Thursday; but we had a service that night which resulted in ten conversions, so in all I think there were 18 converted and reclaimed and the church was greatly revived. The people all fell in love with Mr. and Mrs. O'Briant—they want you to come again. Mrs. O'Briant and Mrs. Trogdon seemed to fall in love with each other and enjoyed the week very much. Preachers' wives can sympathize with each other better than the women that have their husbands at home all the time to help control the children.

The meeting will begin at Piney Grove second Sunday in September, 11 A. M., only one service. Bro. Powell will be my help at this point. Pray for us.

Yours for Christ, Joel B. Trogdon.

ASHEVILLE.

The Labor Day sale at the Park yesterday was quite a success, although we did not do as well as we had hoped. When all the accounts are settled we will have cleared between $80 and $85.

We very greatly appreciate the gift of ten dollars from one of our members who is now living at Hendersonville, for the new church at Asheville. We are especially grateful because it represents a very great sacrifice on her part since she works in a laundry, and, like all laundry girls, does not receive very high wages. It, like the gift of Col. S. V. Pickens, which was noted last week, came unsolicited. These gifts show, what the preacher has been saying all along, that once the work of building assumes tangible form, the folks who are interested,—and their name is legion,—are going to help make the enterprise a success.

This report must go to press too soon to announce anything definite about the action of the committee concerning the plans for the church. A meeting will be help this Wednesday night to go over the preliminary sketch with the architect. Some of the committee have seen the plans and are delighted with them. Personally, I do not expect any likelihood of the plans' not being accepted. I am glad to tell you that the architect, Mr. T. E. Davis, who is a member of the Baptist Church, has donated his services in the making of the plans, only charging us for the cost of the materials used, which will not amount to more than three or four dollars. C. W. B.

CONCORD CHARGE.

We have been silent for some time but not idle. Our special meting at Fairview church commenced the first Sunday in August and continued until Friday night. There were about 40 conversions and reclamations, and 15 joined the church. Bro. Raper came to us on Monday and did good earnest preaching which was enjoyed by all who heard him. The people were glad to have Bro. Raper with them, and hope he will come again. Our third quarterly conference met in Concord church Saturday night before the second Sunday in August. The business was transacted in a spirit of love. Bro. P. J. Blackwelder was declared elected delegate to Annual Conference, and J. K. Foster alternate. Our work on this charge seems to be moving along nicely. Fairview church has a nice new organ. The good ladies of Concord church are planning to paint the church inside in the near future, they have most of the money in hand or pledged. We have received many tokens of kindness since our last report. We would like to mention each one who remembered us so kindly but space will not permit. May the Lord bless each one.

Fraternally,

Edw. Suits.

FROM LOCAL REPORTERS

HOBBS CHAPEL, GREENESVILLE CIRCUIT.

The appointment for the Ladies' A. I. was called in after being published and on the fourth of July I received a fifteen dollar check for mother and children. This was the largest contribution I ever had given me by one person in all my soliciting for any cause. On next day I went to the office to mail this and received another dollar from editor of our county paper for the cause who had favored me with the publication and a dollar by two persons at fifty cents each for the cause.

Surely I was made to see that my many efforts were worth while. Some time ago when I sent in my annual life pledge to the orphan's Home in addition to Mrs. Williams of 1910, the treasurer with his acknowledgement sent a card picture of this Home. I was made to feel glad as a contributor and solicitor for the grand building cause. I indeed think it a credit to the denomination and to all who took any part in the work.

Mrs. G. W. Pearson.

SILER CITY.

The third quarterly conference, Siler City Circuit, met with the church at this place Saturday, Aug. 30, with Rev. J. H. Bowman presiding, L. L. Wrenn, secretary. Good attendance, all the churches represented except Hickory Grove; sorry some of the members from there were not present. Pastor's report good and also the stewards'. The circuit is in good shape now, from all reports.

G. E. Matthews was declared elected delegate to Annual Conference, J. M. Ray alternate. G. E. M.

FLAT ROCK.

Our Pastor, Rev. W. F. Kennett, gave us a discourse of length last sabbath on "Satan". To me it was seemingly the best effort of his life. How so gentle and serene a spirit as his could know so much of his Satanic wiles is a mystery. But as no ground is too sacred for him, we are led to conjecture he encroaches on the ministerial realm too. I would I had the gift of reproduction that I might give this sermon in full, knowing that great good would come of it. He spoke of his tempting man ere the fall, on down through the centuries, of seven being cast out of one, and even trying to tempt the Son of God himself. Of his treachery, insidiousness, and the multitude of them. That he himself said we are legion, which means six thousand. If one can do so much evil what can six thousand not do? Banking up references upon references to his ungodly and defiant atrocities, deceiving us, the very elect themselves, and warning us again against his attacks. 'And Oh! he is so formidable a foe. It was indeed a grand sermon and we all need it. This sermon and one we recently heard on hell we wish might be published in every religious periodical in the United States to-day. So sorely this age needs this deep pungent preaching. Our whole ministry and the ministry of every church we are in touch with we would were empassioned and empowered as on the day of Pentecost by these thoughts Satan to resist and hell to escape. "Nothing can alter the responsibility placed on each soul."

That the dens of vice innumerable and universal might be destroyed.

But up against Satan's power and influence we place the following and bid you hope: Christ's own words, this your slogan, "Get thee behind me Satan" and he obeys. The Savior said with God's own affirmation, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth." (Referring you to first and second chapters of Hebrews to find how he obtained it.) And though he could bruise Christ's heel, Christ can bruise his head. See? "For as much then as the children are partakers of flesh and and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same. That through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil." Reporter.

CEDAR FALLS, RICHLAND CIRCUIT

Perhaps some will like to know what we are doing at Cedar Falls and I shall not hesitate in telling you that our special meeting began the third Sunday in August and continued until the Sunday following; and that we as Christian people have been laboring very earnestly in the vineyard of God trying to rescue those poor souls that knew not God in the pardon and forgiveness of their sins. And while we did not accomplish as much as we hoped for and prayed for, yet we feel that our labor was not in vain.

We had with us Bro. D. R. Williams of South High Point as pulpit help. He preached up until Thursday night and left us Friday morning, leaving Bro. J. F. Allred, of near Franklinsville, N. C., to assist our pastor, Bro. C. H. Whitaker, the remaining portion of the week.

Bro. Williams's sermons were strong and uplifting and so were Bro. Allred's. The church was greatly revived. There were seven reclamations and three accessions to the church. Still we feel sad when we look back and see so many that we labored and prayed for still in the ways of sin. May they yet see the dangers that are ahead and turn back before it is too late.

We were glad to have Bro. Williams with us and hope he will come to see us again. May God wonderfully bless him and his labor.

The new M. P. church that is about two miles south of this place is nearing completion, in which they are expecting to hold a special meeting sometime soon, probably about the first Sunday in October. In this we are very much interested and pray and look forward to a glorious revival. Christians, pray to that end.

Best wishes to the Herald.

BURLINGTON.

Our Sunday school attendance last Sunday was 186, a slight increase over the preceding Sunday.

The annual picnic for our Sunday school will be held next Saturday afternoon at the Graham Club House. The school will meet at the church at 1:30 o'clock and go in wagons and buggies, at 2:00 o'clock to the place designated. The entire school is invited to participate, and a joyful time is anticipated.

Our pastor, Bro. Davis, has resumed his work after taking a month's vacation granted him by the church. He gave us two splendid sermons Sunday

Bro. E. E. Curl, who has been an attendant of our Sunday school and church for some time, was received into the church by letter last Sunday morning. He formerly held membership with one of the churches of which Rev. G. W. Holmes is pastor. We gladly welcome Bro. Curl.

We were delighted and greatly benefited by a visit and interesting sermon from Bro. McCulloch, on Sunday, August 24th.

The writer had the pleasure of attending the protracted meeting at Glen Raven last Sunday afternoon. The pastor, Rev Geo. L. Curry, is doing the preaching. There is a great work to be done at Glen Raven, as only a very small per cent. of the people are identified with the church.

SPRING CHURCH.

Our president was with us the past fourth Sunday and delivered a splendid and delightful sermon. He is very thorough. He looks into everything connected with the work. His visit was truly a blessing. Our special meeting commenced here the fourth Sunday in August and closed on Thursday following. Rev. Mr. Hutton was pulpit help. Result, four conversions, one reclaimed and one accession. The meeting was not what it should have been. The preaching was fine. Bro. Hutton expounded God's blessed words with so much power and earnestness that we cannot help but think he is truly a man of God. His sermons were very inspiring, yet there were many sinners he could not reach. There are many around Spring church who are yet unsaved; their friends, loved ones and pastor just plead and talked to them about their own souls, but they would not yield. Nannie Massey.

MORIAH, TABERNACLE CIRCUIT.

Our special meeting began Sunday, Aug. 24th,. Bro. Taylor from Winston-Salem and Bro. Kennett were our help. Bro. Kennett preached the opening sermon Sunday morning and it was a good one. Bro. Taylor did the rest of the preaching. He preached some good and practical sermons which were helpful to all. Everyone liked Mr. Taylor and it seems that he had just what it takes to elevate the Christian people and convince non-christian people to become Christians. There were six conversions and three joined the church. Our meeting closed Thursday evening, but we hated to see Mr. Taylor leave, for we feel very much indebted to him for our good meeting and hope it will be our privilege to have him with us again real soon.

Our Sunday school is moving along nicely. The Junior Baracas entertained the Senior Baracas and Philatheas at the most beautiful home of Mr. A. L. Plunkett Saturday night. Each class had its business meeting for the first thing, after which four of the Junior Baracas had in store for us a good debate. Then the crowd was invited to a long table in the yard decorated with golden rod and fern. Cake and ice cream were served. Everything was nice and all present seemed to enjoy it.

We are sorry to mention the sickness of so many of our friends. Miss Edna Sharpe is sick with fever. Aubrey Ramseur, who has had typhoid fever for over three weeks, is getting along very slowly. Mrs. Moser has been right sick and was not able to attend meeting. Mr. Jas. Kirkman, who underwent an operation for appendicitis, is improving very slowly. We are glad Miss Herati Coe and mother are improving speedily. We hope they will soon be able to worship with us again.

With love to the Herald and readers,

Lillie Sharpe, Reporter.

Sunday school becoming alive again. Attendance and collection encouraging. The third Sunday night of August began our regular prayer services as usually precede our special meeting, which will begin second Sunday of September. Great interest, it seems, is being taken in these prayer and song services each Sunday night. Mr. Clarence Finch read Scripture Sunday night last to which place Mr. Vernon Faris volunteered for Sunday night next. The congregation seems to continue to increase. Really I believe a good meeting is expected. Pray for us.

"I am just returned from what, practically, has been a four years' absence from my native land. And out of this unique opportunity for reaching a just estimate I can say faithfully here this evening that all over the world the men who are holding the crowds, the men whose labors are being signally crowned with success, the men who above all others are listened to and followed, are the men who stand foursquare on the Bible as the authoritative Word of the Living God, and who are preaching the unimpeachable divinity of Jesus Christ as Son, Saviour and Lord."—J. a year and even more to do under other conditions.

Besides this, I stated on the floor of the General Conference in Baltimore that in my judgment our church had done all it could be expected to do until the U. B. General Conference had expressed itself; and that I would not compromise our church by any action until after the U. B. Conference had taken action of some sort. After I made the statements above mentioned our General Conference continued me on its commission to consider union; but, my dear Doctor, not to unite anyhow.

It is a fact that I saw no possibility of reaching so momentous a conclusion before the meeting of the U. B. Conference; but I did nothing to prevent it. It seemed plain to me that the thing would prevent itself.

If the U. B. Church did appoint a commission like ours to consider that subject I have not heard of it. I feel quite certain, however, that they felt sure of their ground; but the question with me was, whether the church, when it met in general council, attached enough importance to the matter to appoint a specific commission for that purpose. If they did, that part is all right; but I would like for some one to say so.

Now, Doctor, has their General Conference endorsed their action? If I had to answer that question with what light is before me, I would be compelled to say no. I see from the Methodist Protestant of June 4 that "The report of the Board of Bishops was as follows: 1. We recommend that this General Conference approve the syllabus of union—subject to amendment (the italics are mine) as it provides and commits itself unreservedly to the proposed policy of Union with the Methodist Protestant Church." I notice also after paragraph 7 in the same paper "A number spoke in opposition to the Union, and then Dr. Funk offered a motion for a test vote which seems not to have been taken."

Lastly I think I have been very fortunate in having met every minister in this part of the State and many laymen, but I cannot change my statement as yet—you know I yielded a possibility of one in a hundred, and the whole statement was one of belief. I think I know the people of our Conference pretty well and I feel sure there are no more loyal people anywhere; but I know them to be intelligent and conservative, and not to be moved by every "wind of doctrine." When they move they must be moved by reasons good and sufficient, and cannot be driven by any unseemly haste. Now as to the bishops. If I should ever belong to a church with bishops I expect to entertain them my very best as I possibly might "entertain angels unawares".

In closing I desire to express my very sincere appreciation of your friendship and to assure you that my love and esteem for you is in no whit abated and that what is written herein is intended to be for the very best interest of Christ's kingdom.

Wishing you much success, I am yours,

S. R. Harris.

QUARTERLY MEETING OF THE BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS.

The Board met in the Baltimore Book Concern Building August 19th, 1913, at 10 A. M. All members present except Dr. Davis.

Letter from Dr. C. E. Wilbur, Editor of our Sunday School Periodicals, recently returned from a tour around the world, highly commended the work of the Board in Japan which he had examined very carefully. He stated, "I wish to say in a most unqualified way that I believe we have now in Japan more property and are doing more work for the evangelization of that interesting country than any other denominational Board has or is doing for a similar expenditure. I feel justified in making this statement, because I have not only seen our special field, but also all the leading missions." He was favorably impressed with the Japan Mission Conference, commended the reorganization of the work as published last year, indicated that now as never before missionary work is needed with indications that the nation will respond, and emphasized the paramount needs of our own enterprise whose prospects are bright.

A communication from the Japanese members of the Japan Mission Conference was read, expressing their "sincere thanks to the brethren and sisters of our mother churches in America for sending for so many years a great deal of money and so many missionaries for the evangelization of Japan, and have been supporting and assisting in many a way our young and feeble churches in Japan." Reference was also made to the California anti-alien law, and its possible effects upon Christian work in Japan, and expressed the hope "that our brethren and sisters of the mother churches in America will carefully think about it, and pray for it." The corresponding secretary was authorized to make appropriate response.

The need of a suitable building in which to conduct the religious work of the Nagoya College was brought most forcibly to the Board's attention, and several propositions were submitted to the mission in the hope of speedily meeting this imperative demand. The very life and future of that College depends upon buying more ground and erecting a chapel. The College has 423 male students enrolled, more males, I believe, than are in all our Methodist Protestant Colleges in America, and we have no building suitable for their religious training. $3,000 would build it. Who will give it?

Corresponding secretary was instructed to express the gratification of the Board over the good showing made by the different work and financial reports submitted by the mission.

Letters were read relating to the bequest of the late Matthew C. Crawford of Allegheny Co., Penna., a Presbyterian who became interested in our church, and made his will so that our Board shares, with the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, in his estate.

There is no probability of a contest, and each Board will receive about four thousand dollars.

The Japan Mission Conference having requested the Board to return Rev. F. A. Perry to Japan, the Board unanimously decided to recognize the request, and to assure the Conference that it is our earnest desire to comply with their wish, and will do so just as soon as we are able.

Treasurer Klein presented his work report, which was approved, and his financial report, which was referred to the auditing committee.

This committee later reported they had found the acounts correct, and certified to by a competent accountant, and commended him for the manner in which the accounts are kept.

The Japan treasurer's quarterly report was found correct by the auditing committee.

In the educational department the Tokyo School for the Blind had an attendance of 30, many of whom attended the religious services of the church. The school shares the rented house used by the church, and larger quarters are needed for both in separate buildings.

The Yokohama School reported an enrollment of 201 with several applicants for baptism, and attendance at services better than last year.

Nagoya College reported a few changes in teaching staff, chapel services filled the house, one student baptized, and number deeply moved. Enrollment 423 male students.

In the evangelistic department a continued revival with twenty accessions, and 80 to 90 enquirers, at Isebara charge. A fruitful field.

Two Tokyo pastors opened new preaching places with interest good, and will be feeders to their churches.

A pastor with six appointments conducts a small school besides. In other parts of our territory baptisms have taken place, enquirers have increased, and prospects are brighter than ever.

I appeal to the church to pray for our workers, and give more liberally to this great work now restricted for want of funds. Fred. C. Klein, Cor. Sec.

A YOUNG DISCIPLES' CLASS.

One of the most practical and effective plans for meeting the need of the children for a practical and practiced religion is through having a class on some week-day afternoon. This should be led by the superintendent of the department, and should include all pupils ten, eleven and twelve years of age, and any under ten who earnestly desire to come. The name of the class indicates in some measure its purpose. Those who come are to be disciples or learners, and the material for study is to be the duties, pleasures, opportunities and tests of their everyday life. The great question for each child to answer is, How ought I to meet those experiences? That is, How should I do my work? What is the right way to play? What is study for? What are my home duties, and how ought I to perform them? By having the children make a list of their daily activities and, taking one of these at a time, helping them to decide for themselves the laws that should govern it, you can lead them to see the practical bearing upon life of the truths that are taught Sunday by Sunday. This method is most effective because through it the pupil is led to make his own application.

PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS FOR RALLY DAY.

Here are some helpful pointers for your Rally Day service.

The rolls of the school must be gone over to ascertain who have been absent, who have dropped out of the various classes. Invitationsshould be prepared for these various persons, and especial efforts should be put forth to bring into the school on Rally Day those who for any reasons may have dropped out of its ranks. Often personal messengers are the most effective agents in accomplishing this. In addition, those who may possibly become members of the school should be invited to be present at the services. Above all, the parents and the friends of the children whose names are on the Cradle Roll and the members of the Home Department should not be overlooked. Frequently great good is accomplished by inviting former officers, former workers and former members of the school to the Rally Day services. Loving associations are thus revived and a spirit of devotion and loyalty imparted to the school.

After the working out of the details as to who shall be invited to the services, attention should be paid to this thought; How shall we make our Rally Day services mean something to the largest posible number? There are the members of the elementary grades to be considered; the adolescent boys and girls must be thought of; the seniors and adults must receive due attention. This means earnest thought expended on groups of members of the school as well as on individuals. The result of this thought ought to be a program that is varied in its features and impressive in its aim. Stiffness and one-sidedness should be avoided.

We have just the kind of a Rally Day program that fits these sugestions. It is the best we have ever produced. Already thousands of copies have been ordered. Send for your supply today. The programs are free. Send all orders to C. H. Hubbell, Adrian, Michigan.

CHILDREN'S HOME—FURNISHINGS.

Since making my last report, Granville Circuit authorized Rev. N. G. Bethea to say to us that they will furnish one $75.00 room in the Home. Mt. Pleasant Missionary Society and the young ladies of the church send us $21.66 in cash to go towards furnishing the Home. High Point, S. S. and church, gave $55.05 to pay for furnishing the Home.

I would like to say that there are several rooms that have not been taken, also we need cash for furnishings that we were compelled to have which we went in debt for. I hope that the good people throughout the church will come to our help and help us to pay off this indebtedness.

With best wishes to you all, I remain,
Very truly,
J. R. Reitzel, Sec.-Treas.

DAY AT OUR CHILDREN'S HOME.

Saturday, August 30, Mt. Lebanon Sunday school boarded the train for High Point, bound for Our Children's Home for a picnic, and to see the Home and enjoy a few hours with Bro. and Sister Garrett and the children. We had promised to meet the train in High Point with our car, but heavy rain put us out of business and our car was at the wrong end of the road, but Capt. A. M. Rankin and Dr. J. R. Reitzel and a Mr. Robbins came to our rescue and with their cars conveyed part of our people out to the Home and back free of charge. With this assistance and some hired car service which was very reasonable in price, we reached the Home where Bro. Garrett had ready a table suitable for a picnic. Well, the ladies spread our dinner on the table and soon we were enjoying a dinner with Bro. and Sister Garrett and the children. Dinner over, we asked Bro. Garrett to state to our people some of their needs, after which our people put in a hat collection $11.30 for the Home. Mt. Lebanon Sunday school have been for some time giving the children their collection one Sunday in a month. Now they have seen the Home and the children, they came back Home feeling proud of every penny put in this investment.

Bro. and Sister Garrett deserve the support of every M. P. in the North Carolina Conference. They are taking much interest in the Home. We note marks of improvements in the grounds, yard, etc., since our summer conference met there, which shows that they have been busy.

We note, too, that the girls of the Home are taking some pride in the work assigned them. They were busy showing us through the cook room and dining hall. We could write more, but this letter might be too long, and Peter Slewfoot might say it ought to go to the waste-basket.

But before we close we wish in the name or Mt. Lebanon Sunday school to thank Bro. Garrett for his hearty reception. He met us at the train with the horse and wagon and caried our dinner and some boys out to the Home. Also Capt. Rankin, Dr. Reitzel and Mr. Robbins for the assistance. We will never forget you.

J. B. O'Briant.

REPORT OF SUPT. CHILDREN'S HOME FOR AUGUST.

My first month's work as superintendent of the Children's Home has been very pleasant and encouraging. The children are bright, industrious, and cheerful. They seem to appreciate the new Home and the support that is given to us. If you could only see these promising boys and girls and this commodious building you would be proud you had made a donation and would want to give more. I was so much encouraged when I received the first check. It was a most generous gift from our good friend and brother, S. V. Pickens, Hendersonvile, N. C. Bro. Pickens has been a close friend to our children at Denton, N. C., and now since our field has broadened he is increasing his donations. I wish the church could see as this brother does that the Home has enlarged opportunities.

I never receive a contribution from a church or Sunday school that I am not reminded that here are the gifts of the children and perhaps some father or mother has denied himself or herself something to make this gift. Parents, you are training your children well when you teach them to help care for those in need.

Saturday, August 30th, we were all made glad when Mt. Lebanon Sunday school, Randleman, N. C., came with a bounteous dinner which we enjoyed with them. They were so well pleased with the Home they made a substantial donation for it and agreed to picnic here again.

WHAT DO YOU KNOW ABOUT THE CHILDREN'S HOME?

It was one of the pleasures dropped into the writer's life (which we think so often are incidental, but in reality the same God who talked with Moses on Sinai, with Jacob, Abraham, and all of the patriarchs at other times is the giver) to be permitted to accompany the Grace M. P. Baraca Class over to the Children's Home one evening and for the first time to view the building and look the grounds over. What do I think of it? Well now, it is utterly impossible for me to express it in words, and I have made a poor effort in dollars, up to this time, but if God spares my life, I am going to keep on talking and paying dollars as much as I possibly can to this great enterprise of our Church.

Our building committee has shown fine tact and skill of judgment in the plan and arrangement of the building; I do not see how it could be improved upon. The lay of the grounds and location is one of "Old Nature's" best, for our Brother Garrett to take up and put his frugal skill to work and see that the needed shade trees and every sprig of grass is started to growing the right direction. Yes, Grace Baraca Class must go up there sometime and plant out a class tree with suitable ceremonies; pick us out a place, Brother Garrett, and reserve it.

While sitting and writing this piece I can, with very little effort, look into the front yard of more than a dozen homes, most of them blessed with little children, some of whom I can now see playing on the lawn, all happily cared for by parents now living. We have been constantly reminded in the past of the unfortunate day which has come to many in the loss of good parents, and our churches have been so long in getting far enough removed from paganism to see our duty and happy privilege to provide a place for these unfortunates, where they can be taken care of, reared and educated after the manner of our best Christian homes. God has made it possible with most of us to make enough to support ourselves and families and spare something for such noble work as this, on the outside, and may no one make the fatal mistake of not availing themselves of the opportunity.

Aside from the duty of our church taking up and doing this important work, it bids fair to do more for our church in bringing our people together and demonstrating what power there is in unity, and futile to attempt to do things of public interest if we are not united as an organization. Only a few Sundays ago in one of our villages in the State, I have been reliably informed that the Philathea Class in our church passed around a subscription paper and very soon had forty dollars subscribed for the Home, and this same class had done nobly in contributing to the purchase of comfortable seats for their church after having taken an active part in repairing and enlarging the church building. Pay it? Yes, they will, and they all are young girls who work for their living. If our whole church membership of the state of North Carolina, not saying anything about our interested people of other states, were to rise up and do as well as these girls are doing, in proportion to their strength, we could endow the Children's Home and put the financial question to rest and go on doing other great works, which we can do with ease when united and the whole church striving to do the Master's will.

We are hearing much said about church unity, and have heard it talked for a good many years. We are unable to say just how much or how little good may be accomplished by denominations uniting, but we do know if our whole church membership as it now stands will truly set themselves right with God, and be absolutely united in every noble Christian enterprise of the Church, we can do (I am afraid to say how much more for fear of saying too little) at least four hundred per cent. more than what we are doing. Yes, the fertility of the church would be so much increased, that like the progressive farmer who once could only produce eight bushels of wheat to the acre can now produce twenty-five bushels on the same acre just as easily as he could the eight.

I wonder if there is one church in the whole North Carolina Conference which has not done or promised something for our Children's Home; if any one knows of such a place, please let us know so we can confer with their pastor to arrange for a genuine revival of religion in that community.

AHEAD OF THE FLOOD.

"I have got it, mother," cried Roger Whitney as he rushed into the room where his mother was busy sewing.

"Got what, my son?"

"The position I have been looking for so long that will allow me to go on with my studies. It was just the oddest chance, too."

"Nothing is chance, son. But perhaps you had better tell me about it," she answered quietly.

"Just what I am trying to do. I was in the store this morning when Mr. Hawley came in. 'I hear Marshall is going to leave you,' said the clerk. 'Yes, he has got a good position. Of course I could not afford to keep him now that he has the business learned. I wish I could find some good, trusty schoolboy that would sleep in the office nights and help out after and before school when we are busiest. It would not be a hard place, for they are seldom called in the night excepting when some one wants the doctor.' When he went out, I followed him and asked him if he thought I would do. He seemed surprised at first and then he said he believed I would. He said I might try; and if I liked the work, he would give me a chance when I was older to learn the business, just as he had Marshall. It is a good business, mother, and good pay, and I believe I would like it. The work will not be very hard, and he will give me fair wages too, enough to help so you need not work so hard, and I could easily keep on with my schooling. I told him I must talk with you before I decided, and he said that was right. 'Always talk everything over with your mother, lad, and you will never go far wrong,' was what he said."

Mrs. Whitney gazed at the flushed face of her son, and she sighed, but smiled at the same time. The sigh was because they found it necessary for him to begin so young his struggle with the outside world. When her husband died, he left them with nothing but a thousand dollars insurance and some of that went to pay his last expenses, and she was obliged to work, although not very strong, in order that they might eat. Roger was sixteen now, though small for his age; but if he was to keep on with his schooling, he must do something to help, for expenses were growing more and power of earning less. Yet she smiled into the eager face of her boy as she said gently: "Now tell me just what would be expected of you, Roger."

"You know, being a small place, mother, they have only one girl to attend the board. During the day Marshall was helping both outside and in and slept at the office. Mr. Hawley himself helped during the busy time night and morning. I will be expected to go after school and help, with an hour for supper, and then to sleep at the office. Mr. Hawley says I can study some after eight in the evening, as they are not usually busy after that, and he usually stays until nine himself. Saturday I am to stay in the afternoon and let the girl have a half day off."

"The only part I do not like is your having to sleep at the office," answered his mother doubtfully.

"Mr. Hawley says there is no danger. When he leaves, the office is locked, and I am not to allow any one to enter after that. This is understood and the company's order."

"I suppose we must accept it and be grateful; but, remember, it is quite a responsible place, and never forget to do your whole duty, no matter how hard it is."

He laughed boyishly as he gave her a hearty hug. "I am sure not to forget my duty, mother. You tell me about that too often for me to forget."

The next week Roger took up his duties at the telephone office, and they proved to be very easy for him—in reality, not so hard even as he had anticipated. Perhaps a part of this fact was because he took to the work and liked it and never seemed to drag. When evening came, to be sure, he missed the companionship of his mother; but sometimes she came to the office to sit a while, as Mr. Hawley encouraged her to do. "I do not wish Roger to be without the influence of his mother," he said earnestly.

So the year passed and spring came, and Roger began to be Mr. Hawley's right-hand man in many things, for he found he could be trusted absolutely. Then came the great floods that every one read about, that laid waste so many homes along the Mississippi River. The people, however, in the little village of Clair did not worry very much, for they felt quite secure. It had been years since the mighty river had gone on a rampage there, and they felt sure that with all the precautions taken there was no danger for them at least. Guards walked along the levees both day and night, and every point possible had been connected by telephone.

Days passed as the water crept higher and higher. From the country north of them they began to hear of the damage that the flood was doing, but they always thought that the water would not rise high enough to harm them there. But it crept on. The guards were becoming more and more vigilant, and the people near the levees looked a trifle anxious. Of course it had been bad years before. Then it rained more, and the rain softened the embankment, and it became harder to repair a leak if one occurred. It was Saturday afternoon, and Roger was in the office alone. The girl had gone home and Mr. Hawley had ben called to a neighboring town on business.

"Sorry to leave you alone today, Roger. Still I do not think there is any danger. I will get back as soon as posible; and if you had rather, I will have Nora stay with you this afternoon."

"By no means. No use depriving her of her holiday. I will be all right," answered Roger with confidence.

He was not very busy during the afternoon, and there had been no calls for some time, when at about three o'clock a drop came in.

"Number?" asked Roger.

"This is the operator at Clair?" came a hurried voice.

"Yes."

"The levee is down seven miles above you! I must ride for my life! Warn every one!"

That was all, but it left Roger for a moment stunned and inactive. Then he sprang toward the door. He must save his mother at all costs, when just as he reached it, it seemed as if her voice spoke as clearly as though she had stood at his side: "Never forget to do your whole duty, no matter how hard it is." What was his duty? If he went, how many might lose their lives? And, besides, Mr. Hawley had left him at his post. Was it not his duty to stay there? For a minute he wavered; the next, and a white-faced boy was back at the switch-board.

Call after call went over the wires. With determination his brain seemed to clear, and he called those nearest, warning people to flee and only waiting to see that they understood before ringing another number. Never once after that first moment did he waver, as with set face he sent out the warning messages. The flood had been slow at first, but it increased rapidly; and before darkness set in it was creeping through the village streets. Darkness came, and the lonely boy, who was staying bravely at his post, could hear the rush of the waters. That was not all. As night wore on, he could hear the frightened cries of the people, and logs and other debris came sometimes with terrible force against the building. He wondered if it would stand till morning, and if this, one of the strongest buildings in the town, was so shaken, what about the frailer residences?

He did not dare think—had not dared to after the first. He simply kept feverishly on at the calls, sending the warning cry farther and farther on.

When morning broke at last and Mr.

Hawley reached the telephone office in a boat, he found a boy worn and hollow-eyed, but still at his post.

"You poor, brave boy!" he said.

But Roger, staring at him, did not understand. He uttered only one word, "Mother."

"Safe, and waiting for you. And you will never know, he added, "how many owe their lives, perhaps, and certainly such of their property as they have been able to save to your bravery."

But it was not until Roger laid his head, with a sob, of which he was not ashamed, on his mother's shoulder that the full horror of that awful night swept completely over him, and he heard her say as in a dream: "A friend had called for me just before the flood broke, and we had gone riding. So I was not in the village at the time, but the minute I heard I kept praying for my boy and that God would help him do his whole duty."

"And he kept me, mother," said Roger energetically as he remembered that one dreadful moment when he had been tempted to desert, and saw that he could not have aided his mother if he had. "He surely kept me."

"Of course he did, and he always will if we trust him," his mother answered wisely.—Irma B. Matthews, in Michigan Christian Advocate.

WHEN MARIGOLD HELPED.

"Come, Merry Gold!" called father. "Breakfast is ready."

"I don't like that name," Marigold said to herself. "I'm tired of being just a streak of sunshine, as father says. I want to be useful. And I'm going to be, too. I'll begin this very day."

As Marigold went down-stairs to breakfast, she thought, "I must begin with father before he goes to business. I'll slip his newspaper into his coat pocket. He'll like to have it rolled up neatly."

"Why, here's the morning paper," said her mother, after breakfast. "Your father has forgotten it."

"Dear me," Marigold exclaimed, "I must have given him the wrong one! This isn't a very good beginning, but I'll not give up. What shall I do next?"

She turned and caught sight of grandma knitting by the window; the bright sunlight was streaming into her eyes.

Marigold sprang forward to lower the shade.

Crash! Down came the roller, shade and all. Marigold had forgotten that this was the one that she had been told to touch gently. Mother had to use the step-ladder, the hammer, and the tacks before she could get the shade back into its place.

"I'm afraid I'm not being a help at all," Marigold sighed. "I've tried twice, and so far I've been only a bother."

She wandered up-stairs. The door of Cousin Alice's room stood ajar. On the bed lay a pretty, thin muslin dress trimmed with narrow lace. Marigold noticed that a yard or so of the lace was hanging from the flounce.

"Cousin Alice must be getting this dress ready for a party," thought Marigold. "Wouldn't she be surprised to find it all mended when she gets home from school?"

So Marigold got her work-box and set to work sewing on the lace with as fine neat stitches as she knew how to take. Cousin Alice found her there a little later.

"Why, Merry Gold, what are you doing?" she exclaimed. "I was ripping the lace off that old dress to trim something else."

Marigold rushed out of the room to hide her tears. She had sewed long and careful to please her cousin, and again she had failed.

"It's no use. I'm not going to try any more!" she sobbed. But Marigold was a determined little girl, and after a lively romp with Chum, her pet spaniel, she felt like her merry self.

"I will try again," she declared, "but this time I'll be sure to find something really useful to do."

Marigold looked into the kitchen, and saw yesterday's ironing still hanging on the rack.

"The very thing!" thought Marigold. "I've heard mother say again and again that she disliked putting the clothes away more than any other part of the housework. I can't make a mistake here."

So Marigold separated the clothes into neat piles, and carried them upstairs. All went well until she started with the last load; a little white dress of her own on top. She did not know how it happened, but at the head of the stairs she discovered that the dress was gone. She found that it had slipped off into the coal-hod, and that was quite hopelessly smudged with black.

"It will have to be done all over," said Marigold, sadly.

She was going up to her room to have a good cry over her failures, when grandma called to her, "Would a little girl who was very thoughtful of her grandmother's old eyes like to hear a story?"

Marigold's favorite story was drawing to a close when Cousin Alice came into the room and dropped something into her lap. It was an oddly shaped little needle-case that Marigold had often admired.

"Marigold takes such pretty stitches," said Cousin Alice, "she needs this more than I do."

"And so I can depend on my Merry Gold's having my paper ready every morning," father said, when he came home.

Marigold hung her head. "I'm sorry that it was the wrong one," she whispered.

"The wrong one!" father repeated, in a surprised tone. "I was too busy to open the paper at all. I only knew that little daughter put it into my pocket."

Bedtime was the first chance that Marigold had to tell mother about the soiled dress.

"But having my little girl trying to be helpful makes up for the accident," mother said, as she gave her the extra kiss.

"I thought that everything went wrong, and that I wasn't any help," Marigold murmured, "but after all, I believe I'll keep on trying."—Rebecca D. Moore.

TIT FOR TAT.

A popular and talented pen-and-ink artist received the following printed circular from an automobile firm:

"You are cordially invited to participate in our grand $100 prize-drawing contest. Each participant may submit one or more drawings advertising our automobile, and the winner will receive a grand prize of $100. Drawings must be sent prepaid, they must be original, and all unsuccessful drawings will remain the property of the undersigned."

Now the artist, who can hardly be persuaded to make drawings at $1,000 apiece, smiled over this printed circular. Then he took a sheet of note paper, and wrote to the automobile firm:

"You are cordially invited to participate in my grand $10 prize automobile contest. Each participant may submit one or more automobiles, fully equipped, of his own manufacture, and the winner will receive a grand cash prize of $10 in gold. The automobile submitted should be brand-new, and must be shipped freight prepaid to New York. The unsuccessful automobiles will remain the property of the undersigned."—New York Tribune.

DENTON HIGH SCHOOL

——OPENS SEPTEMBER 1, 1913——

DENTON is situated in the Piedmont hills of Davidson County twenty miles South from Thomasville on the Carolina and Yadkin River Rail Road. This Railroad connects us with the Southern at Thomasville and High Point on the north and with the Southbound at High Rock on the South. About 350 yards west from the depot on Salisbury Street, nestling among a beautiful grove of oaks, is the home of Denton High School.

OUR COURSE OF STUDY prepares for any College, also for our State University. We give each student personal atention and do everything necessary for their comfort and advancement. A thoroughly competent teacher has been employed for the Music Department, and those who take this course will receive special attention. A High School Business Course will be taught free of charge as to tuition. Special work in Pedagogy for those who intend to teach.

FREE TUITION to ministerial students and children of the ministers of the North Carolina Conference. Cost of all necessary expenses for a year ranges from $115 to $145. We board students in good private homes. Indigent young men can get rooms and board themselves at actual cost. If any one wishes to pay a part or even all expenses by work, write the Principal for particulars. The school uses water from deep drilled wells with pumps, which eliminates all danger from germs in the water. Pure air, pure water, plenty of work; if these do not give health to the student, he will never have it. Write the Principal at Denton, N. C., for any further information.

DIED.

Bevill.

Mrs. Jane Bevill, one of the oldest residents of Guilford County, was born May 24, 1827, died August 2, 1913. She was the widow of Spencer G. Bevill who died about tweny-five years ago. She leaves six children,—four sons and two daughters. She was a faithful member of Fair Grove M. P. church for sixty-five years, but for several years has not been able to attend church very often. Funeral by her pastor, W. F. Ashburn. May we all so live here that we may meet our loved ones who have gone before. A Friend.

Ferguson.

Martha Ferguson was born May 29, 1835, and departed this life August 2, 1913. She professed religion in early life, joined the church and lived a faithful Christian to the time of her death. She had four children in heaven. She leaves a husband, two daughters and one son to mourn their loss. She called her people and friends to her bedside and told them all to meet her in heaven and told her husband to meet her in heaven and told her husband to select a chapter and the text for her funeral and where she wanted to be buried. On the first Sunday in this month she was followed by a large crowd to Orange Chapel church and Bro. Holmes preached the funeral to a packed house and her body was laid in the grave-yard at Orange Chapel church to await that glad morn when we shall all be changed in the twinkling of an eye. She was the wife of Rev. P. A. Ferguson. May God give his grace to the bereaved family and relatives in such measure that they may humbly say, "The Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away, blessed be the name of the Lord." May they so live that they will be ready when the summons comes to them is the prayer of the writer. A Friend.

WHITNEY NEXT TO NIAGARA.

One of the greaest enterprises in our country for developing electric power from water power, if, indeed, it is not to be the very greatest thus far, next to Niagara, has been commenced on the Yadkin River, at Whitney, N. C. This historic river narrows at this point from 1,800 feet to sixty feet, where its deep torrent rushes through a gorge. Here it is to be harnessed for production of at least 150,000 horse-power. The cement alone for the dams and other features of this plant will cost over $1,000,000, being one of the largest orders following those of the New York tunnels. The power-house will be about 600 feet by 1,000 feet. The greatest portion of the power will run a vast aluminum plant which will occupy eighteen acres in the immediate vicinity, to be financed and operated by a French company with a capital of $10,000,000. There will be a surplus of power to drive shops at a distance.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

The address further stated that the 4,500,000 negroes at the beginning of the Civil War, of whom 3,600,000 were slaves, had increased to 10,000,000, that illiteracy had been reduced until now only 30 per cent. of the negroes were illiterate, and that the race owns 20,000,000 acres of land.

Elon College

For Both Men and Women

Elon College, North Carolina

For a quarter century Elon College has rendered the best families of the South a paragon service in providing young men and young women with the best mental, moral and physical training under positive Christian influences, tho entirely free from sectarianism.

Karl Lehman, of Boston, testifies that "of all the Colleges I have visited as International Field Secretary of Christian Endeavor during six years, the spirit of Elon College appeals to me as most genuinelu Christian." Elon College is situated in the delightful hill country, a section unsurpassed for beauty, with a climate far-famed for its healthfulness. There is no medical fee, for there is no necessity for it. Its campus, comprising twenty-five acres of native oak and hickory, shrubbery, winding walks and driveways, is one of the most beautiful in the South and, with its two unsurpassed gymnasia, provides abundant opportunity for recreation and relaxation.

The splendid equipment of Elon College was only made possible through liberal endowment. It maintains seven elegant new buildings, especially designed and appointed for college work. These are furnished with every known convenience; steam heat, electric lights, running water, baths and sewerage. The College plant is conservatively valued at $300,000.00.

Elon College is distinctly a high-grade institution, though its charges are moderate. Its graduates are admitted to the graduate departments of all the great universities without examination. —We would like to caution any who need it against arbitrarily taking position regarding the church union proposition. It is true we should take position some time, but it is better to give oneself all the time there is in a case of this kind. After one has announced himself in favor of one course rather than another, he is restrained by a desire for consistency from doing what he might have seen proper to do had he waited till all the evidence was in. Every one should know and be ready to say that he will not abandon his principles or do violence to his convictions, but one's convictions may be changed, and one's principles may be seen in a new light. Let us rather seek and pray for more light and more love and for the grace to endure and for the courage to do what may be required in the way of duty. Christ is the Head of the Church, not you, not I, not any other man or body of men. What Christ wills is best, and in this great and grave matter, every true disciple of Christ will wish to know and do what Christ would have him do.

—The editor went to Burlington last Sunday to preach while Bro. Davis persisted in his vacation. He had returned, and was present in the Sunday school and preaching service. We thought him an unusually good reader of hymns, and we would have preferred to hear him preach, but had to carry out the program. We have visited this church occasionally for years, and we note signs of progress nearly every time we go. Since Conference the Sunday-school rooms have been decorated, and are now among the largest and handsomest in the State. We thought the Junior Philathea room a gem. The color on the wall makes it attractive to us, but we were told the Juniors didn't like it. Too bad! The congregations improve, too, in the church service. Evidently our church in Burlington is meeting a need and filling a place. Bro. Davis said that there is harmony in the membership and that the spiritual condition is good. At the close of Sunday school, Bro. Rogers, Supt., brought up for decision the question (so momentous to the boys and girls) as to where and when the picnic should be. It was earnestly considered and decided by an almost unanimous vote. We left Burlington with a feeling of hope for the church there.

THE UNION QUESTION.

My good friend, S. R. Harris, whom I dearly love—and who is worthy to be loved, has been asked to write on the "Union" question, but says he "has little to say". What he did say was unfortunate. He was appointed a commissioner to negotiate for a union, not to defeat it. If the basis of union is wrong—he with two others stayed away from the last meeting of the commission, when the final draft of the Basis was made. Certainly he should have been there.

Is it not a fact that Bro. Harris was one who tried hard to prevent reaching any conclusion? Is it fair to continue to say that the U. B. commission was not authorized to act? Has not their General Conference since then re-affirmed their commission and endorsed their action?

Bro. Harris seems to have been unfortunate in those whom he met. Just recently I met one of the most consistent, intelligent, generous, active and useful Methodist Protestants in North Carolina who was very favorable to it, and said so without being asked to say it.

None of our conferences will ever be governed by a board of bishops. No conference in the U. B. Church has ever been so governed, and they will not begin now. When the union is completed, some of our men will be made General Superintendents, and I expect Bro. Harris to endorse that action, and take pleasure in entertaining some of the bishops at his splendid home, and I know that his wife and daughters will make them delightfully comfortable.

Bro. Harris ought to write on union, but he should write in a different spirit, and in a sweeter tone.

—We thank Bro. H. A. Garrett for fifty dollars received last week for the Endowment Building.

—Rev. S. W. Taylor is preaching for Bro. Johnson at Moriah this week. His preaching is highly spoken of. Rev. W. C. Kennett preached on Sunday morning, with a vigor uncommon in one of his years.

—The Seventh Day Adventists are holding a tent meeting here, with good speaking and good attendance. They seem to be a good people, and their earnestness should be an example to others. They lay most stress on the second coming of Christ, and on the observance of the seventh day as the sabbath. We sometimes think that men are more easily wrought up to a high pitch of enthusiasm and to greater activity about non-essentials than about essentials. If two men had migrated from Palestine to America, one traveling east and the other west, and both observing Saturday as a day of rest, when they met in America, they would have found themselves a day apart in their sabbath day, and yet both would be right in that both had kept strictly to the law of observing every seventh day.

—An effort is being made to change the name of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, but it is strongly opposed by leading members of the church, so much so as to suggest the likelihood of a division in the church. As the same time, certain members of that church are laboring to bring about a union of all churches. Thomas Nelson Page is one of the most prominent opponents of the change of name.

PROGRAM OF CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP

The object and inspiration of all effort is the establishment of the kingdom of God. In the Christian conception this kingdom may mean much more than a divine human society on earth, but it can never mean anything less. This kingdom is inclusive of all life in all of its relations and activities. Nothing that concerns man can be alien to the kingdom of God.

The complete program of the kingdom contemplates evangelism, missions, education and social service. The advance of the kingdom among men is promoted in and through all the institutions of man's life: the family, the church, and the state. We recognize fully the importance of evangelism, of missions and of education in the work of social redemption. It is our privilege and our purpose at this time to emphasize the meaning of man's civic and social obligations, to interpret the principles of Christianity in social terms, and to suggest methods whereby they may be made regnant in human society.

I. PRINCIPLES

We therefore submit the following Principles of Christian Citizenship for the consideration of all who are interested in advancing civic progress and Christianizing the social order. Included in this we also suggest some elements of the Christian Method of Political Action.

1. For the Church.

The church is here to witness for God and for his kingdom, to teach men the whole will of God, to infuse the religious spirit into all life, and to unite all the people in behalf of righteousness and peace. In the fulfillment of this mission the following things may well claim attention.

1. The witness of the church for righteousness, for justice, for equality, for brotherhood in all the relations of society.

2. Careful instruction of the people in the Christian idea of the state and their social and civic duties.

3. The co-operation of all the churches in the work of personal evangelism, social service, and civic redemption.

II. For the Family.

The family is the primary unit of human society, and an important agent in social progress. The church depends upon the family, and exerts its power through it. Civic society is grounded upon the family, and rises or falls with it. By their effect upon family life we may measure the defects in the social order and the evil of social vices. That the family may be preserved and may fulfill its function in the world, the following items are essential:

1. The training of the young in sex hygiene, and the single standard of purity for both sexes.

2. The preservation of the home against overcrowding, unsanitary and immoral conditions—thus guaranteeing health and decency.

3. The provision for each child of an adequate physical, mental and moral training to prepare it for life and citizenship.

4. The education of men and women for marriage and parenthood.

5. The adoption of uniform laws of the highest standard regulating marriage and divorce.

III. For the State.

The state, equally with the family and church, is a divine institution, and has a divine meaning and a vital function in the economy of life. It is therefore under obligation not alone to maintain justice, to safeguard human rights, and to conserve human well-being; but also to promote social welfare, to moralize human life, to fulfill the law of Christ, and thus to realize among men the righteousness of the kingdom. In the fulfillment of this mission the following are some of the aims that now claim attention:

1. The education of the youth in the principles of Christian morality and good citizenship.

2. The abolition of Child Labor and the provision for all children of adequate playgrounds.

3. The extension and improvement of juvenile courts and the reformatory system for all prisoners.

4. The proper care and treatment of the defective, the insane, the deaf, the epileptic and the feeble minded.

5. Strict regulation of the hours and conditions of labor for women to safeguard the physical and moral health of the nation.

6. The protection of workers from dangerous machinery, occupational diseases and mining disasters.

7. The duty of society to make suitable provision for the old age of workers and for those injured in industry.

8. One day's rest in seven for all workers.

9. The principle of conciliation and arbitration in industrial disputes and the creation of proper arbitration boards.

10. The adoption of such a system of taxation as shall destroy monopoly, equalize the burdens of society and secure to every person the equity of adequate advantages in life.

11. The conservation and control of all the resources of the earth in the interest of all the people.

12. Such action as will eliminate the social and moral wastes caused by alcohol, opium and other habit forming drugs.

13. The suppression of prostitution.

14. The cleansing and prevention of city slums.

15. The abatement and prevention of poverty, sickness and crime.

16. Profit-sharing and labor co-partnership leading to full industrial democracy.

IV. For International Relations.

The kingdom of God includes all people of the earth and the life of the kingdom seeks to realize itself in international relations. It is necessary therefore that Christian principles be interpreted in terms of international life, no less than in terms of church and family life, that thereby the moralization of the world may be ensured. In the application of Christian principles to international relations the following action is now required.

1. The recognition of the fact that nations are moral agents, having a moral responsibility, and should hence be guided in their political, national and international relations by the principles of Christian morality.

2. The submission of all questions of international dispute to an international court of arbitration and award, thus making possible the disarmament of all the nations.

3. The acceptance by the nations of the principle that they who are strong should bear the infirmities of weaker peoples, thus rendering the impact of Christian nations upon non-Christian nations helpful and not destructive.

4. The concerted action of all the Christian powers in the suppression of international trade in alcohol, opium, and unclean literature, and all other things that are socially and morally destructive.

II. METHODS

The principles of Christian citizenship we have stated are not merely ideals for political thought but are primarily principles of political action. The items enumerated are intended to define fundamental principles rather than constitute an explicit political program. We believe, however, that these principles if fully applied will lead to most definite and fruitful results.

In the application and realization of these principles there are some definite lines of action which are vital. Our work in behalf of the Christianization of the political and social order must move along four lines: education, agitation, legislation and law enforcement.

1. We believe that the churches in and through their various agencies and departments should seek to train the people for life and service in the state.

a. We therefore request the pulpit to instruct the people in the principles and obligations of Christian citizenship.

b. We ask that adult classes and study groups give attention to the study of the state, in its meaning, its function, the obligations of citizens, etc.

c. We most strongly recommend our colleges and theological seminaries to provide instruction in social and political science from the Christian point of view for all students, that they may be trained for effective service in the community and the state.

d. We recommend that each church form a select library of social service and political reform for the use of its people; and we further ask all citizens to co-operate with the city library in maintaining a section devoted to these important subjects.

2. We believe that in every community there should be union of all moral forces in behalf of civic and social redemption. Four things are vital:

a. The investigation of civic and community conditions.

b. The agitation of civic and social wrongs and abuses.

c. The union of all men of good will in behalf of all measures affecting the life of the people.

d. The utilization of public buildings as social centers and for the discussion of questions of citizenship and community welfare.

3. We recommend that in every state there be a conference of Christian social workers for the consideration of vital measures for agitation and legislation. This conference should include the recognized agencies for the promotion of citizenship and social reform, and should be held under the auspices of the National Reform Association, or some other association of Christian citizens, or social service commissions of the churches. This conference should consider the various subjects that are vital to the welfare of the people and should adopt such measures as are to be promoted by education, agitation, legislation, and law enforcement. Provision should also be made for bringing these measures thus approved to the attention of the people and especially to the churches. Beyond all, an effort should be made to unite every agency that is working for human betterment in any one line, that thus the conscience of the people may be massed in support of all approved measures.

4. We recommend that the various religious bodies of the world with all national and international agencies of social and political redemption, arrange for an International Conference for the consideration of questions of international reform. We request every national religious body in the world to appoint a committee on Christian Citizenship and Social Service. And we urge that an effort be made in a concerted and systematic way to enlist the governments of the earth in all righteous and necessary measures of world progress.

POPULAR TALKS ON LAW

THE RIGHT OF SELF DEFENSE

By Walter K. Towers, A. B., J. D., of the Michigan Bar

John Rice fell into a dispute with Loren Devlin which rose to a point where Rice rushed upon Devlin and struck at him, though he failed to touch him. Thus assaulted Devlin took vigorous action and proceeded to pound Rice into a state of insensibility. The public prosecutor proceeded against Devlin in a criminal action for assault and battery, and he was found guilty and fined. Rice also sued Devlin in a civil action for assault and battery and recovered damages. Devlin claimed that he had acted only in self defense.

While there is a right of self defense recognized by law it is not broad enough to cover an action such as Devlin's. One whose person is assaulted may defend himself; but in defending himself he may not use more force than is reasonably necessary under the circumstances. If you are assaulted you may strike back, but you may not strike back more vigorously than is necessary to defend your person from the threatened attack. In this case Devlin was justified in resisting Rice. Rice having been resisted, and having ceased to attack, however, Devlin was not justified in continuing further. In doing so he became the assailant, and his further action was a new assault and battery for which he was liable both in a civil suit for damages and in a criminal action. The law does not require that the vigor of the defense be absolutely adjusted to the vigor of the attack, since it recognizes that this is not always possible of accurate determination. It is required, however, that the defender do not step beyond the bounds of reason in his acts of defense.

As the New York Court has remarked:

"Self defense is a primary law of nature, and it is an excuse for breaches of the peace, and even for homicide itself. But care must be taken that the resistance does not exceed the bounds of mere defense, prevention, or recovery, so as to become vindictive; for then the defender would himself become the aggressor. The force used must not exceed the necessity of the case."

To justify the use of force on the ground that it was in self defense there must have been an actual attempt to offer bodily harm. The attack resisted must be apparently real. Self defense may not be claimed when the force was exerted after the danger of attack had passed. The threatened assault having passed, there is no longer any need for self defense.

The means that a person may take in his own defense must depend, of course, upon the particular danger which threatens. A degree of force may be used in self defense equal to the degree of force with which the defender is attacked. Killing an assailant may even become justifiable by way of self defense, especially where he attacks with a deadly weapon.

O'Malley and Grady had had many quarrels and finally one arose which was particularly bitter. Grady vigorously threatened to kill his adversary on sight. Later in the day they met and Grady at once assaulted O'Malley with a large club dealing him several serious blows about the head. Unable to ward off these blows O'Malley drew his pistol and fired, killing Grady. He was tried on a charge of manslaughter, but held not guilty, the jury finding that he had acted in reasonable self defense.

As a general rule one may kill an assailant when it is apparently necessary in order to save himself from death or great bodily harm, while in the midst of a sudden combat which he has not himself provoked. Generally speaking, the law requires that the person attacked retreat, if possible, before he may kill an assailant and claim self defense as a justification. The person attacked need not retreat if to do so would place him in a more precarious position, but he must retreat even though to do so would not apparently improve his position. There are some states in which the courts hold that a person attacked may stand his ground under practically all circumstances, but such a rule is rather exceptional.

It is probably a familiar rule that a person attacked need not retreat farther than his own premises. One attacked in his own home, or in his own office is under no obligation to retreat, but may stand his ground, no matter how threatening the attack, and while so standing his ground may kill his assailant if necessary to save his own life or to avoid great bodily harm, or the commission of a felon within his premises.

One may not only defend his own person with the degree of force necessary to resist the attack, but he may defend the persons of the members of his family as well. Thus a father may defend a son, and a son his father. A master may also defend his servant, and vice versa the servant his master.

The right of defense extends to property as well. One may defend the property which he lawfully has in his possession. The property need not be his own, it is enough that it is rightfully within his custody. Jenkins rented a horse from Dale's livery. While riding on the horse Jewett stopped him and demanded the horse. Jewett was a creditor of Dale's and said that the debt being long overdue he intended to enforce his rights. He endeavored to take the horse away from Jenkins by force. Jenkins resisted with force and succeeded in retaining possession of the horse. Jewett sued Jenkins for assault and battery for his use of force in resisting the effort to secure the horse. The court ruled that Jenkins was justified in defending the property rightfully within his possession and having used no greater force than necessary in its defense was not liable to Jewett, whom he had in no way wronged.

In defending one's own premises from invasion there are certain requirements if the right of self defense is to be exercised. One may not forcibly eject another from his premises merely because he is a trespasser. The trespasser must first be ordered to depart, and only in the event that he refuses may force be used to eject him. The trespasser must first be given the opportunity to depart peaceably. If the trespasser has come upon the premises violently or contrary to express command of the owner he may be resisted and ejected without a demand that he depart. In neither case, however, may more force than is necessary be used for the removal of the trespasser, else the right of defense will be exceeded.

There are certain other legal justifications for the application of force in a manner that would otherwise amount to assault and battery. Certain individuals have authority over others of a nature which permits the use of force as a means of punishment or coercion. The parent has the right to give moderate chastisement to a minor child without being guilty of assault and battery. So, too, a guardian standing in the place of a parent, may punish a child in his care. An official in charge of a public institution usually has the right to enforce his authority by moderate chastisement. Generally a master has no right to chastise his servant, but the master of a ship, being in an unusual position, may enforce his authority by the use of force on the persons of his subordinates.

One is justified in applying force to one who is engaged in criminal conduct, for the purpose of deterring him. One who notices another who is unconsciously in an exposed or dangerous position, and who applies force to that person to rescue him is justified. The collisions and conflicts which occur between participants in the course of various games are not generally viewed as assaults and batteries. If a player goes beyond the rules of the game and checks or strikes another, violently and in a manner not permitted by the rules, it amounts to an assault and battery. Prize fights are viewed as somewhat exceptional and participants are held guilty of assault and battery though both consented.

Some peculiar defenses have been raised in assault and battery cases. One is disclosed by the following quotation from the opinion of a California judge: "If a strong man has a weak one in his power, and gives his victim the choice of being kicked or cuffed, he cannot defend the battery on the ground that the injured man consented."

The average person, of peaceable inclinations, will not go far wrong in the daily affairs of life if he remembers that force is not to be exerted against another even by way of defense except in circumstances of obvious necessity.

WHY DID THEY GO IN DEBT?

This may be the first question which occurred to many who read the appeal of Chairman Millikan in the Herald of last week. We have been taught to fear debt, —to fear it as a dreaded task-master, that, once it gets us within its grasp, will harrass us night and day, and finallly claim body and almost soul as its toll.

Without doubt debt is to be shunned,— that is, most debt. For a person to live beyond his means, going in debt for luxuries, or even what may appear to be necessities, is, under ordinary circumstances, foolish, unjust, dishonest. There may be circumstances which render such going into debt unavoidable. Even then, though the victim may be excused, he is, nevertheless, to be pitied.

But there is one reason for going into debt that I regard, not only as justifiable, but commendable, especially in a young man. That is, to make a safe investment, free from speculative features, borrowing whatever my be necessary in excess of what he may have saved, and paying on the debt each month until he owns the property. But he should be very sure as to the nature of the investment.

I regard church debts as in a class to themselves. As a rule, they are in the nature of an investment. Sometimes they may be unwise,—a church may be moved by a desire to make a show, to spend more money than it should. Again, it may be that loyalty to the Master's cause demands that His followers pledge their credit in order to erect a house or an institution for the extension of His kingdom, or the carrying on of the work committed to them. I think our Greensboro church illustrates this. We had the opportunity to buy, for $12,500, property which, after an expenditure of $2,500, is worth, for our use, at least $25,000, though it was not worth that to the denomination from which we bought it. This wise investment would have been impossible, had not certain members of the church felt willing to go in debt. Yet this debt, though fully justified, is proving an inconvenient one,—very. It is causing those who feel the responsibility for it some embarrassment. Church debts are rarely a blessing, in themselves.

But about the Children's Home. Many of the pledges were taken on long time. The Committee either had to trust the members of the Methodist Protestant Church in North Carolina, or delay, for several years, the building of the home, leaving the children housed in an uncomfortable building in Denton, and leaving many others who sought admission out "in the cold."

But even after these deferred pledges are taken into consideration, there is a balance unprovided for. The Committee decided to add electric lights, being able to purchase the current at ridiculously low price, by paying for the equipment; to put in steam heat, as any other method of providing for heating the building would have been unsafe and unsatisfactory; and to connect with the High Point water supply, thus insuring a permanent supply which would admit of the the most improved sanitary arrangements, and would provide protection against fire. Will the church approve?

The Committtee has built for the future, as well as for the present. No matter to what extent the institution may grow, the present building will not need to be remodeled, in order that it may be adapted to the needs of a larger institution than present requirements contemplate. The cost of doing it right at the beginning is far less than the cost of doing it over would be, some time in the future.

We have accustomed ourselves to the idea that, as members of a small (comparatively) church, we must make out with makeshifts which larger denominations would not consider. We made a departure from this idea when we built the Publishing House. The success of this enterprise should encourage us to approve the same policy in the erection of the Children's Home.

I should like to add a word of congratulation to the church upon having secured, as Superintendent, a man who feels that he was led of the Spirit of God into the work, and was not afraid to make a financial sacrifice, that he might heed the call.

You can trust him to give the church an administration that is economical; to train the children to become useful men and women, by inculcating sound moral and religious principles, as well as to be industrious and thrifty. He has the efficient help of a wife who is in thorough sympathy with him, and I feel sure that the church will be gratified at his conduct of the Home.

Let us pay the debt, thus avoiding having to pay out money for interest, and add to the record of the church what we may regard as an achievement worth while,—a success. Then we shall be encouraged to try something else for the glory of the Master.

"Lovest thou me?" "Feed my lambs."

THE CHURCH UNION QUESTION.

To all whom it may concern, let me say, there have been many times in my life when I was afraid to express my honest convictions, and I held my mouth shut, lest I should do more harm than good; and that has been the case with me ever since this question of church union has been under discussion. But now I am somewhat like a negro said he was , who was accustomed to shout nearly every time I preached at one of my churches; and he annoyed some of the whites and they told him he must not shout while I was preaching. So the next time I preached at that church, I saw my colored brother was terribly wrought upon, but that he was evidently trying to obey orders; but finally he exclaimed in a loud voice, "Brethren, this nigger is bound to shout." And at it he went, as if trying to make up for lost time!

So, brethren, I have stood it about as long as I can! I am bound to say something! And first let me say, I have belonged to the M. P. Church for 58 years, and hence am well acquainted with the results of every discussion of church union that has come up; for we were too small to court 58 years ago; as we had not put on long dresses, up to 1855. But we soon began to grow and develop and soon thereafter the courting commenced and every time there were some among us extremely anxious to be courted. Why, I cannot see, when they had a good home in the M. P. Church and were doing well! As for my part, I have been satisfied with my home in the M. P. Church, and am now! I wish in my very heart that all who are not satisfied in the M. P. Church, and are so very anxious to be courted, would just tumble right over into the arms of those trying to court them, and not try to pull the rest of us with them, when we are well satisfied with our home in the M. P. Church. With one exception, and that was a very modest courtship, between the Christian Church and the M. P. Church, every courtship looking to a union with any other denomination has resulted in great damage to us. If we had never listened to any proposition of union with any denomination, we would today have been much stronger than we are, as a denomination! Such things are demoralizing and disheartening, to say the least of it!

In all sincerity, I ask, has any denomination under the sun ever offered you anything better, or even as good, as you have in the M. P. Church? In my opinion they have not, and cannot! We have as good if not the best church government in the world! Then why this unrest on the part of some persons? Is it to belong to a church of great numbers? If that is what you want, why not unite with the Catholic Church, the most corrupt church in the world? Yet they are in numbers, I suppose, the strongest church in the world. To be over anxious for gain, is very dangerous indeed. And for us to become so anxious for union with any other denomination, that we can endorse bishops, that we have denounced for over fifty years, is something beyond my comprehension! I wonder if our commissioners were too modest to tell the United Brethren that we as a church had been denouncing bishops, as an order in the ministry, ever since before our organization, and that we could not indorse them now, without stultifying ourselves and becoming a laughing stock to the world!

Brethren, I have doubtless said more than many wish to hear; but in conclusion let me say, let us look well to what we do; for there is an awful precipice just ahead! God help us to watch and pray.

Geo. E. Hunt.

IT IS WORTH WHILE.

Sir Robert Laidlow well said, "The missionary motive is the highest that can animate the church's activities", for it appeals to the best in us to do the best we can for others less favored than ourselves.

It is evident, however, that the attitude of many in the churches to the most beneficent and unselfish work (foreign missions) needs to be changed, and that advance steps ought to be taken.

Most commendable is the purpose of the World's Sunday School Association "To focus the attention of the Christian Church upon the Sunday school as its most valuable asset, and to promote a deeper interest in the work of foreign missions on the part of Sunday schools in the home field."

This surely calls for "a vision of the needs of the children in all lands overwhelming in urgency and magnitude, yet thrilling with the possibilities of a world-victory for Christ."

By greatly increasing interest in foreign missions in our churches, we will not discourage or weaken our people, but it will inevitably react upon local church life and affairs by rekindling hope and zeal, and leading to larger gifts by a law of the kingdom abundantly verified by many churches in America.

What we give in Christ's name for others is returned a hundred fold in wide spiritual blessings. "Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days."

Many are awakening to the fact that the more time we devote to the young the more effective is our general work for the development and prosperity of the church, because right training now means a more vigorous and progressive membership later on.

What interest can be awakened in foreign missions in a Sunday school which, among other things, does not hold a children's day service, and how can our own denominational work appeal when the special Service prepared annually by the Board with its illustrations, information, etc. of our Japan enteerprise is not used, although sent free to our schools?

How can a church or a Sunday school grow, do effective work when the missionary education of the young is neglected, when the proper training of future teachers, leaders, members is not imparted, and when the true misison of the school and church is not adequately emphasized?

A very grave responsibility rests upon our Sunday school superintendents and teachers, for they are moulding character, shaping lives, as they work for Him who, through the prayers, gifts and laborers of His followers, would have all peoples of earth know "the sufficient message of their Father's love".

INTERNATIONAL PEACE PROPOSITION.

The peace proposal submitted by Mr. Bryan to the thirty-nine nations has already been answered favorably by twenty of them. This leads the Secretary of State to believe that the plan will be a success. The nations that have given favorable answers are Italy, Austria, Brazil, Sweden, Norway, Peru, Great Britain, Holland, Russia, France, Germany, Bolivia, Argentine, China, The Dominican Republic, Denmark Hayti, Spain, Belgium, and Portugal. Mexico, owing to her present unsettled condition, was omitted from the list of those invited.

The proposal provides that should a nation be threatened with war, the countries involved shall await the investigation of the questions in dispute by a committee specially appointed for that purpose. It is suggested that the commission be composed as follows; "One member from each of the contracting countries, to be chosen by the government; one member to be chosen by each of the contracting countries from some other country; and the fifth member for the commision to be agreed upon by the two governments." Thus the commission would be composed of three men from neutral countries and one from each of the contending countries, a combination which would insure an impartial investigation and report.

The memorandum submitted to the different countries also contained the declaration that the United States is willing to consider seriously the question of limiting armaments. It reads as follows:

"This government is prepared to consider the question of maintaining the status quo as to military and naval preparation during the period of investigation, if the contracting nation desires to include this, and this government suggests tentatively that the parties agree that there shall be no changes in the military and naval program during the period of investigation unless danger to one of the contracting parties from a third power compels a change in said program, in which case the party feeling itself menaced by a third power shall confidentially communicate the matter in writing to the other contracting party, and it shall thereupon be released from the obligation not to change its military or naval program, and this release will at the same time operate as a release of the other contracting party. This protects each party from the other in ordinary cases, and yet provides freedom of action in emergencies."

This proposal, if accepted, will be at least one practical step towards the anxiously hoped-for suppression of increasing armaments.—The Gospel Trumpet.

BE TRUE.

Men have ever loved the man with the clear eye and the straight tongue, the man who never hedged and never equivocated, who never fawned nor flattered, and who could never be taught to lie. Amid the unstable crowd such a man is conspicuous by his unswerving loyalty to his ideals, and this steadiness of his onward course resembles that of the planets. Such a man sometimes fails in finesse, he sometimes fails to hold his friends, and he sometimes gains a crown of thorns and possibly a cross, but the crown cannot dishonor and the cross cannot terrify him. When God made man he put iron into him, and this man but reveals to others what God meant men to be. There is a world of human weakness round about us, and weak men and women are proving false to themselves, their friends, their God; but this is not of necessity. A man may not be able to avoid disaster, but he can escape dishonor; he may not be able to avoid insult and injustice, and persecution, but he can manage to retain his honesty, and if he die he can at least die at peace with God. But to do so he must be true to himself, his friend and his God. The price may at times seem great, but the reward is inestimable.—Christian Guardian.

WATCH THAT TONGUE.

It is your tongue it belongs to you, and is the only one for which you are responsible. Your neighbors' tongues may need care also, but that is their business; this is yours. See that it is properly attended to. Watch that tongue.

It needs watching. It "is an unruly evil"—watch it. It "is a fire"—watch it. It is a helm, which guides the vessel; let the helmsman keep wide awake. It can bless or it can curse; it can poison or heal; it can pierce hearts and blight hopes; it can sow discord and separate chief friends. Watch that tongue!

No one but you can take care of that tongue. You are its only ruler. Your neighbors may hate it, or fear it, or wish that they could bridle it, but they cannot do it; you have the power, watch that tongue.

That tongue has already got you into trouble; it may do it again. It is "set on fire of hell." It burns up peace, blessing, reputation, and hope. It causes sad days, weary nights, tearful eyes, and heavy hearts. "If a man will love life and see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they speak no guile." Watch that tongue!

It is the "glory" of man. It distinguishes him from brutes. It was bought with blood, by the Son ofGod. He claims it as His. It should speak His praise; misemployed, it may degrade yourself and those around you. You are charged to attend to it. Watch that tongue!

The Lord watches that tongue. "There is not a word in my tongue, but lo, O Lord,, thou knowest it altogether." For every idle word we must give account in the day of judgment. What will be the record of that tongue then? Watch that tongue!

That tongue shall sing God's praises forever in glory, or beg for a cooling drop of water in the devouring flames; watch that tongue!—Methodist Protestant.

THE TRUE MINISTER.

The famous picture, "The Doctor," in the Tate Gallery in London, is the true mirror of the optimistic ministry. Upon the pillow lies the sick and helpless child —the child of a humble home. Evidences of many efforts to help are all about. In the dim background, the mother has surrendered to her strain and grief and prostrates herself on a table with her face buried in her arms while she weeps out her soul. Standing near, with his strong hand resting on her shoulder, is the husband and father, helpless and worn in the presence of a Providence he cannot change. Bending over the child is the doctor, strong, skillful, faithful, hopeful, watching every move, believing in the laws of life, unbaffled by the nearness of death, the one hope of the father, the one co-operator with the struggling life of the child.

This is the picture of the true minister. Unbaffled by the selfish rejections of society, unmoved by the cynicisms of a cruel world, unshocked by the sins of God's children, looking deep for the sparks of life, believing in the unfailing cures of the love and truth of God, untouched by the pessimisms of doubt, he, the supreme optimist, loves and watches, works and watches, waits and watches till souls come back to life.—Rev. Allen A. Stockdale, D. D.

—Minnesota is to try an unusual experiment in connection with the time-honored rule of requiring a unanimous jury verdict. Hereafter in civil cases, after twelve hours of deliberation, a verdict can be brought in by five-sixths of the jurors. In a twelve man jury this will mean that ten will be required to be in agreement. The motive that actuated the passing of this law is in order to make it more difficult for persons to "fix the jury." The law which requires that the deliberation shall take place for twelve hours will guard, it is thought, against hasty conclusions.

tin," she cried. "I've been looking all over the house for you. Margaret is ever so good to let you make her cookies, but I shall have to take you away now."

"Where?" queried Martin.

"To Aunt Janey's. They're all there—Mary and Paul and Bobby—and—"

"I can't go," said Martin, his lip quivering. "Grandmother doesn't want me."

"Yes, she does. She sent me for you. Come on, deary. Let's wash your face and hands. The auto is waiting."

Waiting! Martin looked out. The little auto was thumping in the most inviting way, and George Risley sat smiling in front. He forgot all his tribulation, and the thought of his grandmother's broken word troubled him not one whit. He bade good-bye to Margaret and the cookies. He flew upstairs with Julia, who carefully scrubbed his face and hands.

"Now, if we can find a clean collar," said she.

"Here's one," cried Martin, snatching one from the drawer. "Put it on, quick."

"Stand still, then," laughed Julia. "I'd as lief try to dress an eel." And with some difficulty, she made the little boy presentable. Such a little wriggling, flying bit of humanity!

"Good-bye, Margaret," he called, "I'm going."

"And I'm glad," said Margaret, heartily. "It'll be a dale better than fussin' wid cakes, or goin to see poor old Miss Carson. Now be a good boy, an' "—but the auto was gone.

What a ride that was! The keen, fresh air, the bright sunshine, and the houses, flying by in quick succession. As they neared Aunt Janey's, the door flew open, and a trop of cousins ran out to meet him.

Martin looked anxiously. Grandmother Benson wasn't there. Oh, yes, she was, at the window, and her face was smiling. Martin rushed up the steps and into her outstretched arms.

The dinner was perfect. Everything was perfect. Such merry, noisy games! such laughter and jollity! and none of the children could play harder or laugh louder than Martin. When, near the close of the day, flushed and happy, he was hiding behind grandmother's chair, she put out a loving arm, and drew him into her lap.

Aunt Jane came in soon. "Why, Martin!" said she. "Aren't you rather too big a boy to be siting in grandma's lap?"

"I took him up," said grandmother. "I want him."

"Grandmother likes me," exclaimed Martin.

"So she does, Martin," emphatically.

"She likes me, and I like her," repeated Martin, proudly.

"Yes," answered Grandmother Benson. "We love each other."

And Martin answered, "Yes."—Christian Register.

SAN: A PAPUAN STORY.

Not many years ago the people who lived on the islands of Badu and Moa, in the Torres Straits Group, spent a good deal of their time thinking how they could best kill one another. Then the missionaries came and taught them they ought to love one another; and if any of you children go to visit the people there mind you put on your very best behavior, as I am afraid sometimes boys and girls in England, who ought to know better, do and say things which would very much shock the Christian natives.

Some one visiting Badu gave a native school teacher some sweets to scramble amongst the school children, and one little maid of seven summers, who was named San, was very fond of peppermint "lollies" (as all sweets are called in those parts), and she would have got one if another little maid from the island of Moa had not been a bit too quick for her. San got very cross and said "My dog got that!" meaning that the girl who got the sweets was no better than a dog.

Now of course we all know that was wrong, but what should we in England think if a policeman came along and took little boys or girls up before the court for things like that? Well, that is what happened to San, and she was fined one shilling.

There was a young sinner named San,
For a peppermint lollie she ran,
But a small maid from Moa,
Who got there before her,
Was the cause of the downfall of San.

For San got so cross, she was heard to say pat,
Without the least shame, "My dog hos got that!"
A policeman said "Come," and though most unwilling,
San was taken to court, and there fined a shilling,
And that was the downfall of San.

"JUST A LITTLE (?) SIN."

Everybody considered him to be a good man. He paid his debts. He was clean in his life and in his speech. He was an officer in the church. No one would have thought of calling him a dishonest man.

But this man yielded to the tempter one day, committing what would ordinarily be regarded by many as a very slight or trivial offense. His horse ran away and bent the axle of the cart to which he was hitched, breaking it about half in two at the base of the right hub. The man straightened the axle and hammered the broken part until the break could not be easily detected. This, together with a new coat of paint and the oil working out at the base of the hub, entirely concealed the break.

The man went over across the mountains to the county seat, about thirty miles away, and traded the cart for a horse, paying the difference. Of course he said nothing about the broken axle. The gentleman with whom he traded, a very large man, got into the cart and started down the mountain to his home. In going around a bend in the road the injured axle broke off, and the rider rolled down the mountain some two hundred yards, struck his head against a tree, and died.

The original owner of the cart was indicted for manslaughter and brought to trial. He employed a number of able lawyers to defend him, paying them two thousand dollars for their services; but the sentence was: "Guilty; twenty years in the pen."

Then the widow of the dead man brought suit and got a judgment for ten thousand dollars against this man for the loss to her and her children in the death of her husband. It took nearly all of his property to pay off the judgment, leaving his own wife and children without means for their support and without a husband and father to provide for them; to say nothing about the stigma upon them, the wrong to the other family, and the ushering into eternity of the soul of a man who was not prepared to die—all because of one man's "little (?) sin."—Rev. R. S. Sutterfield, in Nashville Christian Advocate.

A clean community will be a healthy community. Also, property values will be higher than in a locality where dirt, filth and unsightliness abound. And one dirty spot in an otherwise clean town is a reflection on the entire town. Unfortunately, in this State no one knows a healthy community from an unhealthy one. There are no vital statistics kept. In states having a vital statistics law people look into the healthfuness of various communities before they move their families there. There, health is a great factor in the price of real estate. That will be the case here too, some day, as soon as we get a good vital statistics law into operation.

When your burden is heaviest, you can always lighten a little some other burden. At the times when you cannot see God, there is still open to you this sacred possibility—to show God.—George S. Merriam.

vices of a local architect to draw the plans and specifications for us. He went with a committee to the lot this morning, and got his surveys. He is to submit a sketch this week, and if it has our approval, go ahead at once with the blue prints. I may be able to whisper something about the architect's kindness to us before long. Just now I am forbidden to do so.

And you just ought to see those talents (dimes) working. The average increase is already more than four-fold, and some of them have multiplied more than ten-fold.

We hear nothing but favorable comment about the new location. Visitors, friends in other churches, and those who know the needs and opportunities of the city, say we could not have done better. We are four blocks from the nearest church, three-quarters of a mile from the center of the city, on one of the principal residence streets on one side, and one of the main trolley lines on the other, and with territory to the east, west, north practically unworked. If the work cannot succeed in this locality then it cannot succeed anywhere. We are doing now what Asheville has long needed to be done—taking the church to the people instead of trying to bring the people to church.

The Ladies' Aid is to hold a sale at the Park on Labor Day. The sale will be similar to the one held on the Fourth at which we cleared over a hundred dollars. We hope to break the record this time.

ANDERSON AND YARBOROUGH NOTES.

So much has accumulated since my last report that I hardly know where to start. One thing I ought to have reported is the president's visit. Bro. Cecil impressed our people with his earnestness. He is very thorough. He looks into everything connected with work. My people are already doing what he told them. His visit truly was a blessing. There has been a general improvement on my charge within the last six months. Our meeting with Harmony church the fourth Sunday in July resulted in eighteen converts, six accessions. In many ways this was a good meeting.

Yarborough first Sunday in August: six accessions, a good revival in church. We had splendid congregations. Bro. Casto did the preaching to the elevation of the church. Our people greatly enjoyed his preaching. He was a great blessing to us.

Liberty Hill, second Sunday, Rev. J. Anderson pulpit help; fourteen accessions. This meeting was a great meeting, a good revival. Bro. Anderson was somewhat rough, but the people enjoyed him when they understood him.

Fairview, third Sunday. Rev. Sam Rose help. He did fine work. Nine accessions. A few more to follow.

Ladies'Aid has paid for painting church. Bro. Bill Watson did most of work getting us paint. Also bought new lamps.

FROM LOCAL REPORTERS

FAIR GROVE, HAW RIVER CIRCUIT.

Dear Herald: Our special meeting began the second Sunday in August, and closed on Tuesday. We had a good meeting. Do not know the number of professions and reclamations. Ten joined the church on profession of faith and three by letter. Prof. Amick helped our pastor, Bro. Ashburn.

Some of the unsaved young men said they had never heard such good preaching; and had the meeting not closed, they would have to quit coming, for they could hardly resist the strong appeals to seek Christ. Hope they may yet seek, and find Christ precious to their never-dying souls. Our Sunday school is doing very well, but there is room for improvement. With best wishes for the Herald and its readers,

Reporter.

SANDY RIDGE, OAK RIDGE CIRCUIT.

We observed children's day and the children did very well in rendering their pieces, considering the short time they had to practice in. We had a good congregation. Bro. Lowdermilk could not be with us; he sent us very substantial and efficient help in the person of W. S. Linville, of Kernersville. Just before the morning collection was taken, Mr. Delos Hammer, of High Point, made a short but very good and interesting talk on missions. In the afternoon Mr. Linville opened fire on the base-ball game; he stated some facts in regard to the difference of progress that they were making as students. He said that the majority was in favor of the girls in reaching highest per cent. in grade and that the boys were falling too far behind. His estimation was the difference was due to the fact that the boys give too much time to the base ball game. His talk was highly complimented. After this talk the second collection was taken; amount, $4.25.

Sorry to say that Bro. Lowdermilk's throat was in such a condition that he was not able to preach last second Sunday; his appointment was filled with a very much appreciated sermon by Bro. Lendo Gray of Shady Grove. We were glad to have the privilege of hearing Bro. Gray preach. The writer was grateful to have Bros. Lowdermilk and Gray in our home for a short while.

I am sorry that I can't write so encouragingly as some of my brother and sister reporters in regard to conditions of the Sunday school work. I have heard it said that the church that had no singing, no prayer or class meeting, Sunday school trailing in the dust, that the devil lay on top of that church and slept because out of a job. It seems to me that there is some truth in it. For some years we have been running very much that way. I never saw a brighter prospect for a good Sunday school than we had the past summeer. One beautiful Sunday morning, last of June, or first of July, everything seemed lovely and happy. The old fellow woke up, crawled down out of his lodging place, came and peeped in at the door. Oh, my! what did he see? Well, he saw 124 in the Sunday school. He could not stand that. He swore in his wrath that thing should not happen any more. He got busy right off, yes he induced Adam and Eve to partake of the forbidden fruit, commanding the woman to fire at the head of the concern intending to burst it to pieces. Failing in his object he shifted the man into another channel, thereby accomplishing to some extent the object in view. When will our church members arrive at the point when they will not suffer themselves to be used as an instrument in the hands of Satan to do injustice to the cause of Christ. Of course the devil has a two-fold object in view: if he can succeed in getting a great big mountain of animosity raised in the church he can go back to his lodge and take another nap while our special meeting is going on. May God help the church members to feel the responsibility that is resting upon them.

J. H. Gordon.

GILES' CHAPEL, RICHLAND CIRCUIT.

Our pastor, Mr. Whitaker, is still at his post of duty, and is holding his special meetings. We are looking forward to our meeting the third Sunday in September and praying that we may have a glorious outpouring of God's blessings upon the church, and also that many souls will be saved. We ask the prayers of all those who feel interested in us.

We are still having a very good little Sunday school. We could have a large one if people would attend as they should. We have had some real good class meetings this year. Our faithful class leader, Bro. I. F. Pritchard, is ever ready to perform his duty to the church, and seems deeply interested in the young people.

We are now enjoying the beautiful gaslights in our church, which add very much in appearance and also in convenience. Best wishes to Herald readers.

A BIRD IN DISTRESS

BY VICTOR P. HAMMER

I sat beneath the branches of
An oak that stood beside the lane,
And, as I watched, I saw some birds,
Returning through the wind and rain.
A storm was raging wild and wide;
The air was like a sea of foam,
But, one by one, these little fowls
Found shelter in that tree-top home.

But when the angry storm had passed
Away, the sky was clean and bright;
Then every little bird flew off
And seemed to say, "What great delight!"
In looking at that mammoth tree,
I saw a half-forsaken form,
Perched on a limb; it was a bird
Which had been injured in that storm.

Yet, quiet as that bird appeared,
It seemed so sad and lonely there,
While all the other birds had flown
In all directions through the air.
"O, could I aid that helpless fowl,"
I felt, "in pain and loneliness,
Whose fellows had all disappeared,
And left it sad and in distress!"

Just then I saw another bird,
Afar, returning through the air;
It came, and tenderly caressed
And nursed its mate with loving care.
They both commingled tho't with tho't,
It seemed, as only birds can do;
But soon, the air grew warm and still
And off the two companions flew.

I thought: "The Hand that rules the land,
The sea, the air, the universe,
Enables every living thing
It's sick and lame to keep and nurse;
Yet mortal man, supremely blest
In body, mind and soul, heeds not,
The helping spirit, higher life,
Like this—the lesson just been taught."

VANQUISHED BY PIE.

Perhaps if the truth were known, the American pie could count its victims by the scores—that is, if a pie could count. But the American public will go on eating pie as long as it is able and as long as the supply of pie holds out. It makes an editor's mouth water just to write on the subject. But there is a tragic side to the picture. News reports tell the story of two men whose deaths were caused by eating pie.

One of these, H. J. Lynch, of New Jersey, had been through all kinds of serious accidents and escaped with his life. Two years ago after celebrating his 87th birthday he fell from a load of hay and was badly injured, but he pulled through. Shortly afterward he was struck by a railroad train; his horse was killed but he escaped with his life, though badly hurt. His next mishap was being backed over a steep embankment and upset by his horse, which was frightened by a passing train; this laid him up for a while but he finally recovered. He had so many other narrow escapes from death in serious accidents that he often said he had a charmed life. But the charm did not seem to make him proof against huckleberry pie. He ate some a few days ago which brought on an attack of acute indigestion and he lived but a short time afterwards.

The other victim of pie-etis was Caleb Evans, of Waldo, Colo., who ate 11 pies in a pie-eating contest and told his friends after the feat was accomplished that he had never felt better in his life. But the fool-killer was lying in wait for him and he died an hour later from his over-indulgence in the toothsome pastry.—Pathfinder.

AN INCENDIARY WHO NEEDS A STRAITJACKET

The increasing tide of distrust of the Church of Rome and its pretensions is entirely due to the rank things some of the people and leaders of that church are constantly saying. That church ought not to be surprised if Protestants take some of these things seriously. There is no reason why they should not. We do not rejoice in any hostility to this church, but it should see to it that some of its priests use more moderate speech. Here is Father Phelan, saying in the Western Watchman: "We would like to rack and quarter Protestantism, we would like to impale it and hang it up for crows to build nests of; we would like to tear it with pincers and pierce it with red-hot irons; we would like to fill it with molten lead and plunge it into hell fire a hundred fathoms deep." This priest is not only militant, he is ferocious. He should be curbed in, otherwise he might create a disturbance.—Lutheran Church Work.

IT BROUGHT RESULTS.

The bald-headed man burst violently into the barber-shop and bustled up to the proprietor. "See here, sir!" he said, "that hair restorer——"

"Why," interrupted the barber, "you bought that only two days ago—you can't expect——"

"No, no," the man broke in, 'our green servant-girl mistook it for furniture polish and——"

"Oh, you want another bottle?"

"Not by a jugful! I want you to come at once and shave our parlor set and four bed-room chairs."

—The Commoner, Bryan's paper, has been changed from a weekly to a monthly.

—People in Kansas and Missouri are in great drouth and are praying for rain. Governor Hodges of Kansas was asked to issue a proclamation calling for a day of public prayer. He declined, saying he believed in the efficacy of prayer, but not in the case of flood or drouth. The Governor must have a peculiar notion of God's relation to the world.

—A shocking murder is reported from Hamlet. Geo. S. Nance killed a woman supposed to be his wife in the Seaboard hotel there. He claims that it was in self defense, and that he did not intend to kill her, but hit her harder than he meant. He was taken to jail.

—Mr. Craven having charged that the "Pope says that no one has a right to teach or read the Bible except such as receive the authority from him," W. H. McCormick, of this city, disputes the statement. He says he is a Catholic and that he has always been taught to keep and read the Bible.

—If any of our readers have any idea that they would like to study law under competent guidance, and while following their regular pursuits, we would advise that they write for the catalogue and full particulars of THE SPRAGUE CORRESPONDING SCHOOL OF LAW, No. 401 American Building, Detroit, Mich. This is an old established school of an excellent reputation and one that can refer to successful graduates in every state and locality in the United States. The expense is not large and can be met on the easy payment plan.

—Attracted by the light in a store window in Cambridge, Mass., a big California sea lion came up out of the Charles river and smashed his way through the plate glass window into the store. Excitement reigned until men from the Boston aquarium lassoed him and carried him off as a prize.

—The Nebraska state board of agriculture says that if powdered lye be introduced into the burrows of gophers, prairie dogs and other rodents, it will destroy them. The animal gets the lye on his own feet, licks it off and is poisoned.

—Bro. Chas. Way, of Burlington, enters school again this fall.

It is said that fully twenty-five per cent. of all the school children in the United States have defective eyesight. Don't neglect your chidren's eyes. Eyesight is precious to every human being. Impaired vision is a serious handicap in any calling. Consult your family doctor about your children's eyes. If he recommends an oculist, see him without delay.

Pure air makes pure blood; pure blood makes you disease-resisting.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

On Thursday the 14th, I took the train at Kinston at 7:20 A. M. and at 10:20 I landed at Scotland Neck where Bro. Berry Price met me and took me to his home where I took a short but a very pleasant rest. Bro. Price took me to my first appointment on the Roanoke Circuit at Roseneath where Bro. C. L. Whitaker met me. At 8:30 there was a splendid congregation gathered for service and the attention was splendid. The pastor and I drove to his sister's Mrs. W. C. Whitaker, 12 miles, near Whitaker's Chapel, were we spent the night. At 11 o'clock Friday we met at the Chapel, preaching, dinner on the ground. Quarterly conference met at 2 o'clock; a good attendance both at preaching and conference, and the reports and interest good except the general interests collection, and I trust this part of the work will have special attention by the pastor and people. We drove to Bro. Walter Beavans's and took supper and then drove to our church in Enfield and preached to a small congregation. We spent the night in the parsonage, but did not find the mistress of the house at home, so we took two meals with the daughters of the late Dr. B. F. Whitaker and grand-daughters of L. H. B. Whitaker who was a class leader at Whitaker's Chapel for 35 years. I spent most of Saturdy in Enfield. In the evening at 4 o'clock we started for Speight's Chapel, a distance of 13 miles; on our way we called to see Bro. T. L. Whitaker who has been confined to his room for some time; he is now improving, I trust he will soon be out again.

We then drove to Dr. Speight's and spent the night pleasantly. At 9 o'clock the pastor drove to Whitaker's to preach at 11 A. M. and left me to preach at Speight's, which I did. There was not a large attendance; but as many as the pastor thought there would be; they were good listeners. I took dinner with Mrs. Helen Hyman; here I met her son and daughter, who knew Sammie York, my nephew, and I was glad to see them. Soon after dinner Dr. Speight's youngest son Carr came to take me to Whitaker's and he was not long going a distance of nine miles in his auto. Thank you, Carr. I stopped with Bro. J. M. Cutchin. Soon Bro. Whitaker came. At 8:30 I preached in our church at Whitaker's. A good attendance. Some of the members at Enfield and at Whitaker's. They ought to secure other locations and build new churches which would be a splendid thing to do if they could agree and they could believe they were able. The Roseneath people need a new church and I am persuaded in my own mind they will build or overhaul the old one.

This is a splendid field of labor, and a kinder people would be hard to find. Bro. Whitaker has been on this field 7 years and he is still popular and said to be as good a preacher as any denomination has in this section of the State. More pastoral work is needed, and as Bro. Whitaker has no school he can give more attention to this special need. I spent part of Monday in Rocky Mount in consultation with Mr. R. L. Huffines. Miss Mamie Johnson met me at Whitakers on my return from Rocky Mt. and I am spending my layover in Sister Bettie Johnson's home, a very pleasant place to rest and catch up with my correspondence. Thanks to Bro. Whitaker and his good people for kindnesses shown me. Claim over paid.

C. A. Cecil.

STANLY.

Our third quarterly conference met at Mill Grove Saturday, Aug. 16. All churches represented except Simpson's. James E. Gautt, of Albemarle, was declared elected delegate to Annual Conference. R. A. Swaringen, a Seminary student, was licensed to preach. Next quarterly conference to be held at Friendship.

Simpson's. Our special meeting for this point was held in the Presbyterian church at Porter. Our people intend to build at Porter in the near future. The attendance was good all the time and good interest manifested but no conversions. Paid pulpit help .$3.75.

Friendship. The meeting here began first Sunday in August and every service was largely attended. There were 12 conversions and reclamations and two accessions. This meeting was more largely attended than usual and I feel sure that the energetic work of Bro. Braswell has made an impression that will not be erased by the flight of years. Paid pulpit help $13.00.

Love's Grove. The second Sunday in August found us at Love's Grove. This meeting was considered by all to be the best held at this church for many years. The Holy Ghost preaching of Bro. Braswell soon set the church on fire and a great revival followed. There were fifty-five converted and reclaimed, and the church was wonderfully moved. Three accessions to the church. A deep and lasting impression has been made. Paid pulpit help $18.25.

Mill Grove. The camp meeting at Mill Grove included third Sunday in August. This was merely a continuation of the splendid work begun at Love's Grove. Mill Grove is only about three miles from Love's Grove, divided by Rocky River, but a large bridge has been built across the river, making it easy to get from one church to the other. The revival spirit took hold here on Sunday and continued throughout the entire meeting. Sunday is often the devil's day, but it was not so here. Quite a number of penitents were in the altar and there were four or five conversions. The large arbor was more than filled with people, yet the people shouted praises to God just the same. The attendance on Sunday was unusually large and there were automobiles from Charlotte and many other points. Many good and helpful things were said about the preaching and the Holy Ghost fire of our pulpit help—Rev. D. A. Braswell. There were 24 conversions and reclamations, but no accessions. Paid pupit help $25.00.

Our pulpit help at Porter was Rev. D. L. Surratt. Bro. Surratt is a local preacher, yet he is a good preacher and good help in revival meetings. His preaching was much enjoyed at Porter and we greatly appreciate his help.

Rev. D. A. Braswell, Conference Evangelist, was with us at all the other points. I feel safe in saying that the great success of these meetings was largely due to his preaching and work. He preached some strong financial sermons and said many things that will bear fruit in years to come. His strong doctrine on finances had just enough emotions with it to keep the people from becoming offended. The same things said by me, perhaps would have had a different effect. May God continue to bless him and give him many more years in which to do this great work.

In all we have thus far had 96 conversions and reclamations and only 9 additions to the church. I notice in other reports that often there is a large number of conversions and just a few accessions. Why is this? I feel like I have done about all required of a Christian minister along this line and yet the accessions are far less than the conversions. I find some of our members but very little interested in getting new members. I am made to think are we really ourselves or somebody else, which?

I believe in the spirit of church union, but I am not yet ready to acknowledge that our forefathers made a mistake and that mutual rights are not from God. I recently noticed this statement in the Herald, "Perhaps the General Conference would be able to secure greater concessions," I thought is it possible that the M. P. Church means to get all the concessions possible and then "jump in and go on with the crowd." I feel like saying, Never. I also believe if we had spent the time, money and energy in a great "Denominational Rally" that has been spent in trying to become a part of some other church, our cause would have been strengthened greatly.

I most heartily endorse Bro. S. R. Harris's views as expressed in last week's paper. Geo. L. Reynolds.

MEBANE.

A summary of some of the things we have been doing and trying to do on the Mebane charge during the year: A wide cinder walk straight in front of parsonage, then narrowing, around east end of parsonage to back porch. A solid perpendicular plank, sawed obliquely so as to make the top sharp, has been put up around the back yard. Flowers have been set out in front and hedge around the entire front of parsonage. A nice large wood house and chicken house have been built and a back porch ten feet wide, the well now being in one end, has also been built. A small dike thrown up between the church and the parsonage, a ditch cut along the side walk in front into which the water now goes instead of flowing across parsonage lot. A wood house in which to keep wood and kindling for the church has been built and arrangements made for a large coal bin near the church also. Recently the church has been painted solid white. The parsonage has also been painted, the windows up stairs have been screened, and the three rooms up stairs been painted on the inside. One good thing about all this is we owe but sixty-five or seventy dollars. The work done, counting cost of material and labor, would run up to about two hundred and fifty dollars. Beginning July 6 there was a union meeting held in Mebane in Piedmont warehouse, Dr. W. W. Orr, of Charlotte, doing the preaching and Prof. Arnold, of Scranton, Pa., conducted the singing. From this meeting twelve came into the Methodist Protestant Church at this place. Of course this is not all the good people here have done. Very much has been done to checkmate things that were hurtful and much of the efforts have been of a forestalling character. We have some other things that we contemplate doing later, but just now they must be deferred. The Sunday schools are doing well and congregations are good. These are great folks and easy to please. W. E. Swain.

HICKORY GROVE, SILER CITY CIRCUIT.

Our special meeting commenced at this place on the third Sunday in August and closed on Thursday following. The meeting was one of almost unusual interest. The church was much interested, strengthened and edified. Five professed faith in Christ and nine were added to the church. Perhaps it would be very hard to find a church that has made a more rapid progress than this church has in the last year or two. The older settlers say that there was never a better, if as good, Sunday school at this place as at this time. Prayer meeting is held twice a month. The church paper is in nearly every family, and yet the most of the time they are in advance on all the finances. If taking the church paper affects the finances, what do you think the effect would be if they did not take the church paper? Answer, Editor. Needed improvement on the church is taking definite form and indeed is under way as the framing is on the ground. Bro. Johnson was my much appreciated help, and his good sermons were heard to profit.

J. H. Bowman.

RANDLEMAN CIRCUIT.

Our third quarterly conference met at Bethany church Saturday, Aug. 2. Small attendance. Worthville and New Salem were not represented. Business was gone through with in the usual order. Bro. Madison Julian is our delegate to Annual Conference. Finances are behind. Worthville Mills have been standing so long and our people have moved away until it makes us sad when we go there. Nothing definite is known yet, but we are hoping for better things for Worthville, but just how it will come about we do not know.

We have held our meeting at Bethany. We had a good meeting with Rev. R. S. Troxler as our help. Eleven have joined the church, and quite a number were reclaimed and the church greatly revived. Bro. Troxler will be our help at New Salem and Mt. Lebanon which will be the third and fourth weeks in September. We are praying for good meetings at these churches.

Mt. Lebanon S. S. is planning to visit our Children's Home Aug. 30 for a picnic. We have a nice people to serve. More and more we are convinced that God set us down in the midst of a good people.

MECKLENBURG CIRCUIT.

Our camp meeting at Antioch began Saturday night before the second Sunday and closed Wednesday night. Revs. Davis, Highfill, Reed and Self were the pulpit help. Result, 10 conversions and two accessions. The meeting was not what it should have been. The preaching was fine, thanks to these brethren. From Antioch we went to Zoar and held our third quarterly meeting Saturday with a small number present. Our special meeting began Sunday and closed Friday night. We had no help except two sermons from Rev. Mr. Davenport of the Baptist Church. This meeting was a glorious success, one of the very best; about 100 conversions, 21 were received into the church. Hardly any one left, we trust, to advocate Satan's cause. This is a promising church. We had the best order I ever witnessed, much to the credit of this people. We are now at Beulah, holding our last meeting with Bro. Plyler as pulpit help. We had two fine sermons from our young Brother Morris, of Fallston, N. C. There is a bright future for this talented man. Mecklenburg seems to be looking up at this time. Pray for us. I want to say to the brethren that I have had great liberty in preaching. I have fasted and prayed daily for about three weeks; have eaten one meal per day most of the time and I see where I have not done what I could in the past to have power with God; fasting is necessary. It is a great blessing. To God be all the glory and praise. W. P. Martin.

ASHEVILLE.

The preacher was so busy last week, and so lazy the week before—he was on his vacation—that no news has appeared from this work in the last two weeks. However, lots of things have happened since the last letter.

The first thing, and the best, is the gift of Col. S. V. Pickens, of Hendersonville. The gift is in the shape of a check for fifty dollars "for the new Methodist Protestant church in Asheville". It came without our asking for it, freely, out of a great man's heart. Bro. Pickens has had his eye on and his heart in, the Asheville enterprise since the very beginning of the work. Our people were delighted at this substantial evidence of his interest. Nothing has happened here in many a day to so hearten them as this. The check was received an Saturday, and the next day at the morning service the congregation gave a rising vote of thanks to Col. Pickens for his gift and interest.

The Board of Trustees met on Tuesday afternoon of last week to receive the bids of the firms who were bidding on the church. Only one bid was received in writing, and it was so high that we had to reject it. Another bid was received, a verbal bid, but it was so low that we were sure that the firm did not know what we wanted. We had thought we might save the expense of architect's plans by just giving the contractors a sketch, with the size, kind, and materials, and have them estimate from these; but we found out, when we got these bids, that that was not feasible, so we immediately secured the ser-

DISCIPLINE.

Grandmother Benson was very busy that morning. There was to be a family dinner at Aunt Jane's, and she was trying to get the children ready. Martin and little Janet were her orphan grandchildren, who had lived with her since the death of their parents, two or three years ago. She was very fond of them, but she did wish that morning that Martin wasn't so full of mischief, and that Janet would stand still to have her hair curled.

The hair was done at last, and the curls were tied with a pretty blue ribbon. It had been a work of time for grandmother's fingers to tie a stylish bow, and, when it was satisfactoritly done, Martin had laughingly twitched it off. Grandmother had protested and scolded, had patiently gathered the curls again into the ribbon, and tied once more the pretty bow.

"Don't you touch that again, Martin," said she.

Martin didn't mean to, but Janet came dancing up to him, with the curls flying. She was so provokingly happy, and she was almost ready, and he was not. He put out his hand, and touched the bow of ribbon. Strange to say, it came off in his hand. Grandmother was righteously indignant.

"Martin Benson, if you do that again, you won't go one step. I mean it."

It was funny to see Grandmother Benson looking so tall and straight. She was a cheery little body, and this dignity sat queerly upon her. Martin laughed.

"It's no laughing matter, I mean it, Martin."

Martin became sober. He didn't mean to offend again.

But waiting so long to be dressed was very tiresome. Cousin Walter was coming for them. The auto would soon be there. What if he shouldn't be ready? Oh, dear!

He put his hands in his pockets to keep them out of mischief, but at that moment Janet came running in again. She was all ready now, but quite too happy to sit still. She stood in front of him, the ribbon dangerously near. It seemed to Martin that his hand flew out of his pocket itself and did the mischief. At any rate, it was done.

"Now, Martin," said grandmother, "you heard what I said. You can't go today."

Martin looked sober.

"I'm sorry, but I can't take you."

She looked sorry. Martin didn't like to look at her.

"Never mind, Martin," said Janet. "You can look out the window, and see me go."

"Janet," said grandmother, sharply, "don't be an idiot."

Martin scowled fiercely. Surely, grandmother couldn't mean to be so cruel.

His good, kind grandmother! He couldn't believe it. Surely, she would call him to her to be dressed, and tell him it was all a joke.

He watched her anxiously, but she did nothing of the kind. She dressed Janet in her warm wraps for the auto, then put on her own, without a word to the little boy. Her face was forbidding.

At length the auto came.

"Good-bye, Martin," said grandmother.

"Good-bye," cried little Janet.

Martin couldn't answer. The auto puffed away, leaving a heavy little heart behind, and Martin never suspected that the one it carried away was heavier still.

Kind old Margaret came up to comfort him. "Never you mind, Martin," said she. "We'll have griddle-cakes for dinner."

"I don't want griddle-cakes."

"What! Not wid the nice maple syrup?"

"No."

"Nor cream-cakes?"

"No."

"What'll we do thin, at all?" she queried, perplexed. "I'm thinkin' of goin' to Brighton the day, to see poor Miss Carson. She's awful sick. I wonder could I get a small boy to go wid me."

"N—o!" answered Martin.

Margaret went downstairs, discouraged, but resolved that the griddle-cakes should be made, even if she had to eat them herself.

Martin stood by the window, the picture of woe. He did not cry. Somehow, the thought of the contrast between the transports of the morning and his present desolation weighed too heavily upon him for tears. Besides, he was six years old.

He didn't mean to be a naughty boy. Circumstances had conspired against him that morning. Oh, it was cruel, cruel!

But Margaret's kind words, ungraciously as they were received, had comforted him a little. They made him cry a little, too, with a realizing sense of his misery. It was a hard world that day, for poor little Martin.

Meanwhile the auto, with its load, sped swifly on. The children laughed and shouted, but Grandmother Benson was very quiet. Aunt Jane saw at once that there was trouble.

"Is anything the matter, mother?" she asked anxiously. "You're not ill."

"I'm perfectly well," answered Grandmother Benson.

"Where's Martin?"

"Martin is a very naughty boy," spoke up Janet. "He can't come."

"Janet," said grandmother, severely, "are you always a good little girl?"

"No," faltered Janet.

"Then don't say a word about Martin."

Janet subsided. Bereft of their wrappings, the little people made the large old house gay with happy voices, but grandmother did not smile. Even the children, happy as they were, felt the difference between the old-time heartiness and this melancholy silence. At last Aunt Jane went out to her young daughter who was assisting Chloe in the kitchen.

"Something must be done, Julia," said she. "Your grandmother hasn't smiled once since she came, and the children are getting as solemn as owls. What can it be?"

"It's something about Martin," answered Julia. "I'm sure of it, mother. I wish she'd let me go after him."

"Do go and ask her. We can't stand this."

Julia came softly into the room, and stood beside grandmother's chair.

"You're not having a bit of a good time, grandma," said she.

"I'm doing very well," was the reply.

"And we all miss Martin dreadfully," she went on. "Mayn't I go and get him, grandmother?"

Grandma started up. "You couldn't get him here before dinner, could you?" she asked eagerly.

"Of course I could. George Risley would take me over in his auto. There's plenty of time."

"And you wouldn't mind a little turn with George Risley," said grandmother, mischievously, her face lighting a little.

"Not a bit."

"Then do go. Go as fast as you can."

Julia went to the telephone, and soon announced that the auto would be there in five minutes.

"And what shall I say to Martin?" she asked.

"Say to him? Why, just bring him along."

"I thought"—Julia hesitated. "I thought—that—if you told him he shouldn't come, and then sent for him, he might think—"

"If he thinks his grandmother has broken her word, I can't help it. The punishment doesn't fit. You needn't tell him anything, and don't wait to change his clothes. Just bring him. Here's the auto ready."

Julia skipped out, and grandma watched the flying auto out of sight. Then she turned back to the children. She could enjoy them now, since Martin was to be one of them.

Martin was in the kitchen, with Margaret. With his little rolling-pin and cake cutter, he was shaping the bits of gingerbread into fantastic forms.

His little face was sober, but his tears were dried. He was working busily, helping Margaret.

Suddenly the door opened, and Cousin Julia stood there. "Here you are, Mar-

HICKORY RIDGE, FORSYTHE CIRCUIT.

We are still striving to keep our church at work. Our special meeting began the second Sunday in August. Bro. J. R. Hutton ably assisted our pastor, Bro. Lindley, in this meeting. Bro. Lindley preached three inspiring sermons on Sunday. Bro. Hutton did some excellent preaching during the remainder of the week. We only had four acessions to the church, and if we only looked at this number of souls being saved we might feel discouraged that these were no more, but though this number be small in comparison to the unsaved of the congregations, still we feel we had a great and good meeting, for we as Christians need so much help to keep us in the right way and I am sure we received this help from the good sermons given us. Last Sunday we had preaching again; we enjoy twice a month preaching so much. We were indeed glad to have Bro. Lindley's wife and children to worship with us that day.

Our Sunday school is progressing about as usual, not very large, but an interested Sunday school.

PILOT CHURCH.

We are not dead, but still living and trying to move onward. Our special meeting began the first Sunday in August with Rev. G. H. Austin as pulpit help. Bro. Austin did some earnest and faithful preaching, but it seems as if the people did not heed it as they should. We had a very good meeting but not any accessions to the church. We were indeed glad to have Bro. Austin in our homes and hope he will have the pleasure of coming again. We are having a good Sunday school for this season of the year. With much love to the Herald and its many readers.

HICKORY GROVE, SILER CITY CIRCUIT.

Dear Herald Readers: I am going to try to tell you something about our meeting, which we held last week. It began on Sunday, August 17, and lasted until late Thursday evening.

I think the meeting was a great success as four souls were saved and nine joined the church. I'm sure the meeting was a great help to me, and I have heard others say the same. Nearly all who attended say that they have never before heard such good plain preaching as we had, and I'm sure I have never heard better. Rev. John Bowman is our pastor, and Rev. Talton Johnson was his help. There was a good attendance every day. Our children's day service, held the third Sunday in July was quite a success.

The writer was taken real sick yesterday while attending the protracted meeting at Rock Creek.

I will close, with love to the Herald and readers. Gertrude Isley, Reporter.

CHESTNUT RIDGE, ORANGE CIRCUIT.

Our pastor, Bro. Stubbins, being absent, Rev. W. D. Fogleman preached for us yesterday. We were glad indeed to have him. He gave us a good sermon from the subject found in Psalms 66: 5 "Come and see the works of God."

Our special meeting will begin the fourth Sunday in September with Rev. N. G. Bethea pulpit help. We welcome him. We are doing very good work in our Sunday school.

Success to Herald. Fannie Thompson, Reporter.

BETHANY, RANDLEMAN.

Our special meeting commenced second Sunday in August. Two sermons by our pastor on Sunday. Bro. Troxler came on Monday and did most of the preaching. We had a good meeting. About 40 conversions and reclamations. About 20 of them were conversions; 10 have joined the church. We think more will join. We are always glad to see the little children saved, but we were glad indeed to see fathers and mothers saved. One mother and three grown sons were saved in one night. Bro. Troxler is a good revivalist and we believe a good man, and we bid him godspeed. But we do not give him all the praise due man for this meeting. Our pastor, Bro. O'Briant, is doing a good work here. He is just loving men into the kingdom. We truly hope conference will see fit to send him to us another year.

Yours in His name,

Theodosia Routh.

FAIR GROVE, WHY NOT CIRCUIT.

Our special meting began the third Sunday in this month, and closed the following Thursday. Rev. J. B. O'Briant was our pastor's help; we were glad to have him back with us again, we enjoyed hearing him preach so much. We had a grand revival in the church, one soul saved from sin. May the Lord help us as church members to keep this revival in our hearts the year round. It seems that we have to have about three days of hard preaching before we as church members get ready to have a revival. Church members, we have not been busy. May the Lord help us to be always in the lookout for them that are afar off. Our Sunday school is getting on nicely. Pray for us. J. C. Auman.

Recently that man has been suffering much from that arm, being seized with a sort of jerking, which is very painful. He has had two or three operations, but still the trouble continues. And now here comes the strange thing: Some of his friends are sure that the pain is caused by something that has happened to his buried hand—perhaps a root from a tree is pressing upon it, and they are hunting for the place where it was buried years ago that they may bring to him relief. But it is said the man has gone to a hospital, and the doctors have assured him that they can relieve him completely. We hope they will not only for his sake, but also for the sake of his friends of the false philosophy.

DENTON HIGH SCHOOL

——OPENS SEPTEMBER 1, 1913——

DENTON is situated in the Piedmont hills of Davidson County twenty miles South from Thomasville on the Carolina and Yadkin River Rail Road. This Railroad connects us with the Southern at Thomasville and High Point on the north and with the Southbound at High Rock on the South. About 350 yards west from the depot on Salisbury Street, nestling among a beautiful grove of oaks, is the home of Denton High School.

OUR COURSE OF STUDY prepares for any College, also for our State University. We give each student personal atention and do everything necessary for their comfort and advancement. A thoroughly competent teacher has been employed for the Music Department, and those who take this course will receive special attention. A High School Business Course will be taught free of charge as to tuition. Special work in Pedagogy for those who intend to teach.

FREE TUITION to ministerial students and children of the ministers of the North Carolina Conference. Cost of all necessary expenses for a year ranges from $115 to $145. We board students in good private homes. Indigent young men can get rooms and board themselves at actual cost. If any one wishes to pay a part or even all expenses by work, write the Principal for particulars. The school uses water from deep drilled wells with pumps, which eliminates all danger from germs in the water. Pure air, pure water, plenty of work; if these do not give health to the student, he will never have it. Write the Principal at Denton, N. C., for any further information.

DIED.

Yarborough.

Daniel Yarborough, the subject of this sketch, was born June 15, 1845; died July 21, 1913. He was born, reared, lived and died in Spartanburg County, S. C.

For more than fifty years he was a member of Yarborough's Chapel M. P. Church, and up to the time of his death was one of the oldest members of Yarborough's. His father, Hiram Yarborough, Sr., was the founder of this church and he helped his father to build the first house of worship.

When the present church was built—in 1896—he had charge of the work. In the year 1867 he was elected trustee of the church and continued such until he was called up higher.

God blessed him with considerable wealth and of this he contributed liberally to his church and its work. In his home his pastor always found a welcome and a home. He was a life-long subscriber to the Methodist Protestant and for years to Our Church Record.

Quiet and unassuming in manner, he was yet a man of strong convictions, to which he was true. He was a good citizen, ready always to stand for the right as he saw it; and a good kind neighbor, ready and glad to show kindness to anyone in need.

Near the close of the Civil War he enlisted with the sixteen year old boys—as they were called—and joined the Confederate Army. Was an honorary member of Co. F, 14th Regiment, S. C. Volunteers.

In 1873 he was married to Miss Evelyn Snead, who, with six sons and one daughter—all members of the M. P. Church—survive him.

In the passing away of Daniel Yarborough, his home has lost a kind husband and father, the comunity a kind neighbor and industrious citizen, and the church a loyal member.

weeks in the Steadly Hospital in the spring, he returned home near Cross Anchor unimproved. He lingered on, suffering much until July 21, 1913, when his spirit passed out of his body.

To undertake to tell of his life so full of good deeds would be a pleasant task if we only could find words to express our thoughts and had space to record them. And to write of his church life so full of devotion would be to write the history of one of the greatest Methodist Protestants.

The church loses its strongest support. The country and community loses one of its best citizens. All of his former pastors as well as the present one can testify to his faithfulness to his church and his blessings poured out upon his pastor from year to year were without measure. His mantle has fallen, but on whom? His servants around his home and on his farm enjoyed his friendship. They always spoke of him as a friend to the poor. On the morning of his funeral my heart was touched when a number of his servants passed by the casket, looking sadly at him. Their lingering look seemed to say, "We hate to see you go." He is survived by his wife, one daughter, and six sons, who all are loyal supporters of Yarborough Church. May rich blessings follow this noble family the rest of life's way. His Pastor.

Hiatt.

Our hearts were again made sad on Saturday afternoon, Aug. 16, 1913, when the death angel claimed from our midst Sister Allie M. Hiatt, wife of Bro. David G. Hiatt. She was born Nov. 14, 1881. She was twice married, first to Mr. James M. Hiatt. To this union were born three children, one with its father having preceded her to the glory world. Several years ago, on Oct. 4, 1905, she was married to Mr. David G. Hiatt. To this union one child was born. She leaves a husband, three children, father, mother, three sisters, one brother and many relatives and friends to mourn their loss.

While her death was not unexpected, it was so hard to give her up. All was done for her that doctors and loving hands could do, but God knows best.

She professed faith in Christ when quite young and lived a faithful Christian life until her death. Never has a member lived a purer Christian life. She suffered for almost a year with that dreadful disease tuberculosis. Sister Hiatt often said she did not fear death and was ready to go when the Master called for her and told her husband and loved ones to meet her in heaven.

Until about six months ago she attended church regularly, always taking an active part. She was teacher of the Philathea class until then and always filled her place in the choir, for she was a lover of music.

Now that she is gone from us and we shall see her face no more on earth may the memory of her life abide with us to inspire and encourage us in our Christian warfare.

If we are faithful we shall meet Sister Hiatt where sickness, pain and death are feared no more. She was a dear wife, a good mother, never grumbling, and an humble follower of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Her funeral was conducted at the church by her pastor, Rev. D. R. Williams, after which her body was laid to rest in the city cemetery to await the resurrection morn. When we look at the dark cloud may we look through to the silver lining.

"Jesus, while our hearts are bleeding
O'er the spoils that death has won,
We would at this solemn moment
Calmly say, Thy will be done."

Mrs. D. R. Williams.

—No doubt the church must return, and that speedily, to the Pauline doctrine of conversion. One is reminded of the old saint who one day went to see a great cathedral. The beadle took much care to point out to him the altar, the windows, carved wood, and other works of art. Thereupon the old saint turned round to the beadle and asked, "Do you get any conversions here?" The beadle, with a look of astonishment and disgust, said: "Do you think that this is a Methodist chapel?" That was a great insult to the cathedral, but a great compliment to the Methodist chapel, for surely one converted soul is more precious in the sight of God than all the costly carvings of a cathedral.—Rev. J. Westbury Jones.

Elon College

For Both Men and Women

Elon College, North Carolina

For a quarter century Elon College has rendered the best families of the South a paragon service in providing young men and young women with the best mental, moral and physical training under positive Christian influences, tho entirely free from sectarianism.

Karl Lehman, of Boston, testifies that "of all the Colleges I have visited as International Field Secretary of Christian Endeavor during six years, the spirit of Elon College appeals to me as most genuinelu Christian." Elon College is situated in the delightful hill country, a section unsurpassed for beauty, with a climate far-famed for its healthfulness. There is no medical fee, for there is no necessity for it. Its campus, comprising twenty-five acres of native oak and hickory, shrubbery, winding walks and driveways, is one of the most beautiful in the South and, with its two unsurpassed gymnasia, provides abundant opportunity for recreation and relaxation.

The splendid equipment of Elon College was only made possible through liberal endowment. It maintains seven elegant new buildings, especially designed and appointed for college work. These are furnished with every known convenience; steam heat, electric lights, running water, baths and sewerage. The College plant is conservatively valued at $300,000.00.

Elon College is distinctly a high-grade institution, though its charges are moderate. Its graduates are admitted to the graduate departments of all the great universities without examination. Its literary and scientific courses are arranged in various departments which lead to the degrees of Master of Arts, Bachelor of Arts, Bachelor of Science, Bachelor of Philosophy, Bachelor of Pedagogy, and a three-years' course leading to the degree of Licentiate of Instruction, designed especially for teachers. This institution affords special opportunities for training in Piano, Voice, Expression, Fine Arts, Normal Training, Physical Culture and Commercial Practice.

The Faculty consists of twenty-one specialists; men and women selected not only for their superior teaching ability, but also for their exemplary character and manners.

The student body numbers nearly four hundred and comes from thirteen states.

The lowest Rates in the South, only $131 to $191 per College session of ten months. Fall Term always opens the first Wednesday in September. For full descriptive catalogue and view-book, address

THE UNION QUESTION.

It has come to me that several of our brethren think that I ought to write something on the Union Question; but however much ought to be said, I have little to say.

I will say in the outset that no basis of union which could appeal to me as a Methodist Protestant has been agreed on; nor do I see how it can be considered worthy of our support; nor do I believe it will be supported by one in a hundred in this State, as I have yet to see the first one who favors it.

In the first place, the commission seemed to be trying to proceed on the assumption that the possibility of union was dependent on such agreement as could be reached before the meeting of the General Conference of the U. B. Church. It seemed to me impossible to reach any conclusion worthy of intelligent men in the few days they could give to the matter and I said as much to the commission and was met with the assurance that "It is now or never."

When I considered the fact that there had been no "Like Commission" to meet with ours, and whene I furtheer considered the flouting that the commissioners of our church received at the hands of the U. B. General Conference at Canton four years ago and not having heard of any subsequent action of that body touching that matter, I was driven to the conclusion that progress was impossible. However, it seemed to me if the intention was to dispose of the matter, the action would be the most direct even if it should prove costly.

I have never thought anyone in N. C., preacher or layman, would consider the proposition seriously; nor have I seen one yet who seems favorable to it. It seems to me that as far as our Conference is concerned, there are many things we can do with less damage to ourselves and to Christ's kingdom.

It has never been in my thought that our Conference would be governed by a board of bishops and certainly by one not of our making, nor that we would alien such rights as we deem inalienable. I believe in Union, but I believe in human rights more and I very sincerely trust that sometime in the future such legislation may be made by the different parties as will make all Christians one and not subject to temperamental differences. S. R. Harris.

[We believe Bro. Harris does the U. B. Church an injustice when he uses the word "flouting" above. As we understand the case, they did what any other body of Christian men would have been likely to do under the circumstances—they maintained a dignified and self-respecting silence. The word "flouting" implies contempt. The United Brethren have invariably manifested toward our church sentiments of respect and esteem when they have had ocasion to express themselves. At the time referred to by Bro. Harris, they were compelled either to be silent, to speak evasively and insincerely, or to speak in a way offensive to another church. They chose to be silent. We think this was the best course of the three, and that they are to be commended rather than censured for pursuing this course.—Editor.]

HOW CHURCH MEMBERS ARE LOST.

It is a sad fact that many church members are lost to the church to which they belong and in which they ought to be useful members. In some cases, the fault is mainly that of the persons themselves. They allow themselves to be led off into other churches or back into the world in spite of all that is done to keep them in their place and at their work. But in some cases the pastor or fellow church-members are to blame. Members move away to another charge and the pastor fails to look after them or to notify the pastor of his own denomination in the new locality, thus leaving the straying members to whatever influences may be brought to bear upon them by those who would utilize them. Sometimes a pastor waits till he receives a demand from the absent member or from a minister of another denomination for the church letter, and then he wakes up and notifies his fellow-minister—after it is too late.

Then sometimes members are lost to a church in spite of all the pastor can do because the church membere fail to give proper social recognition and attention. The pastor is surprised some day to receive a request for a letter of standing, with a view to removal of membership. He inquires for the reason. Reluctantly it comes out that the members are wanting in the spirit of fellowship and the person wishes to go where he will be made to feel more at home.

Let those that are strong reemember that there are weak ones, and that it is their duty to bear with the infirmities of the weak.

—Bro. Ogburn is to begin a special meeting in Asheboro next Sunday. Prof. Pender has been engaged to teach vocal music this week and train singers for the church services.

—Bro. Dixon had two funerals last Sunday in addition to his two church services. Rev. D. R. Williams had one. Mrs. Secrest and Mrs. Hiatt, two of the deceased, were first cousins, both dying of tuberculosis. Mrs. Hiatt was formerly reporter from Welch Memorial Church.

—The letter of Chairman Millikan to pastors regarding the Children's Home will be read with interest by others besides pastors. The call for a special offering in September for the Home from every church is reasonable. The bills incurred in doing the work mentioned are pressing and must be paid, and there is absolutely no source of income save the gratuitous offerings of the people. Let all heed the call, feel the importance and urgency of it, and make such an offering as the case calls for. We know that the board of directors are giving much time and anxious thought to this institution, to the neglect of their own business. Let the pressure be felt by all, and they will be relieved, and the burden will be gladly borne without injury to any. The call is for a LIBERAL OFFERING SOME SUNDAY IN SEPTEMBER FROM EVERY M. P. CHURCH.

CHINA—KALGAN

BY C. E. WILBUR

So many questions have been asked by various persons, and so many surmises have been made in regard to Kalgan, that I have thought it best to write fully, even though the editor may think it best to divide the article into two sections. I have sought from every source to obtain all the knowledge possible, and will give what I have learned without reserve. Much written is from my own observation of two days on the ground—by far the larger part; much is from reliable books, and much from conversation with missionaries, and others who have some special knowledge of the place, personal or otherwise. Of course there are possibilities of error in all these sources, but I have tried to correct each by the others, even my own observations, and shall try to present an unbiased account.

THE JOURNEY TO KALGAN

Kalgan is one hundred and twenty miles to the northwest of Peking, and is reached by a Chinese government railroad, the first railroad built by a Chinese engineer. The engineer is a graduate of our schools—the Sheffield Scientific School, of Yale University. The railroad has now been open for five years, and appears to be standing the test of use very well. In the distance named there is an up grade of twenty-five hundred feet. The tremendous rush of water in the rainy season made some vexatious washouts the first year; but adjustments were made to carry off the excessive flow of that period, and trains are now being run with the regularity of our own, but not with the same frequency. There is one through train each way per day, and their time of travel is seven hours up and six down. The fare is five dollars and forty cents, Mexican, second class, and ten dollars first class. Mexican is equal to fifty cents of our money. Third class is carried also. The first is equal to our day coach, the second has a very hard board seat, and there is no carpet or upholstering of any kind, the third is a cattle car, and it carries most of the passengers. No dining car is run, but boiled eggs can be secured on the platforms, out of a basket of otherwise uneatable Chinese food, and tea is made by the train "boy." He has a little charcoal furnace, and will give you hot water for a half cent. Be sure, however, not to call him "George," or "Charlie," or any other conventional name. His official name is just "boy." That name is on his arm or cap, and he is inclined to take offense at any other, if he knows what is being applied to him.

The first twenty miles out of Peking are through a rich plain, and then begins a gentle rise through the foothills of the mountains. Fifty miles brings us to the center of the mountain range. In passing through these mountains the Great Wall is passed twice. The first passage is under the wall by tunnel; the second passage goes through it—here old China must give way to New China. The northern foothills are sandy and desolate; and in many places, where the winds draw through the breaks in the hills, the sand drifts and stands in great ridges, as the snow blows and lodges in our own country in winter. Soon a richer country is reached, where irrigation is seen, and then comes the well-watered plain in which Kalgan stands.

We had the pleasure of the company of Brother Dierberger, wife, and boy, from Peking; and at the station, Brother Heininger met us with enough of the Peking springless mule carts, so characteristic of middle and northern China, to convey us to the mission compound. In these an entirely new experience awaited us, of which we prefer to say nothing—the very remembrance is a horror. On our arrival at the compound the scene that presented itself was truly Oriental, almost to the last detail. Several Rebekahs were drawing water from a creaking well; the cows were being milked, while calves frisked about them, awaiting their turn for nourishment; oxen, detached from their carts, had already eaten their fodder, and were contentedly chewing the cud; mules and donkeys were moving about, lashing the thick flies on their thin flanks, and occasionally filling the quiet air with their music (?); men and women, of strange garb and mein, were moving about among those of European dress; children more or less clad, a factor never hidden in the Orient, dashed about among the animals in their sports—all were there save the hog. He is strictly forbidden in the Kalgan compound. The last thing necessary to make the scene complete, was for Mr. Heininger to grow a beard; for a beardless man could hardly play the role of an Abraham or Jacob, however efficient he may be in his special field of labor. The explanation of this great variety of life lies in the fact that the missionaries among the Mongols had been ordered out of the region of conflict between the Mongols and the Chinese, and they had come to Kalgan and our compound as a place of refuge.

KALGAN, THE CITY

Kalgan is a Mongol, not a Chinese word. It is derived from the root "halag," meaning "great gate." The Chinese name of the city is "Chang Chiu K'on," meaning "the Chang Family Pass." It is a city of two hundred thousand people, perhaps slightly more. The city is three miles long and quite narrow; and at the northern gate it extends through the pass in the mountains to the plains beyond, and widens out along the base of the mountains to the right and left. The altitude of the city is twenty-seven hundred feet above sea level. This, together with its latitude, being about that of Albany, New York, gives it a delightful climate, very much superior to Shanghai or Peking. The missionaries do not find it necessary to sek any other place as a refuge from the extreme heat that is so characteristic of most of China in the summer. Missionaries from Peking and beyond often write to be accommodated at Kalgan for a portion of the heated season. The city is very nearly surrounded by mountains, the highest being twenty-five hundred feet. The pass to the north, through which the great trade between Mongolia and China passes, is only a few rods wide, but the plain through which the railroad enters, covers a sixteenth of the horizon, as it appears from the second range of foothills to which we climbed.

Kalgan is one of the most important cities of the north from a commercial standpoint. It is the point of departure for Mongolia and Thibet, and consequently, is the south gate of Mongolia into China, and the north gate of China into Mongolia. Three hundred thousand sheep a month pass through Kalgan on to Peking and beyound, while the same number of chests of tea are taken through Kalgan to the north, with much silk, cloth, and many saddles. It is a rapidly growing city, and because it is a distributing center for both north and south, its permanence and continued growth is assured. It is, too, destined to be a great railroad center. As already seen, it is now connected with Peking, and another road is now being built to open into the west and south. The contemplated road to the north to connect with the Russian Trans-Siberian road at Harbin, must pass through Kalgan. If Mongolia and Thibet are to be open to travel from Shanghai and Peking, it must be done by way of Kalgan.

KALGAN AS A MISSION STATION

Kalgan was opened as a mission station by the American Board in 1865. Rev. John T. Gulick, now a missionary in Japan, was the first worker. Many honored names are associated with this mission, among whom were Rev. Mark Williams, Rev. J. W. Thompson, and Rev. W. P. Sprague and wife. The secondary object of opening this mission was to make it a base of approach to the Mongols and beyond them to Thibet. This long and still closed door to the Christian religion has been a continuous challenge to the missionaries of the Cross, and, when it is at last opened, many that are now waiting and working will be found ready to enter. This object was never lost sight of, though the Chinese work has never been neglected to pursue it. From time to time approaches were made to the Mongols, but with comparatively few results. At the last entire attention was given to the Chinese work.

Three factors seem to have led to the withdrawal of the American Board from Kalgan. First, the giving up definitely of any effort to open a special mission among the Mongols; secondly, the comparative isolation of Kalgan from the centers of American Board work; thirdly, the inability of the Board to secure sufficient workers to man all its stations efficiently. Of course, at the time the determination to withdraw was reached, the railroad had not been built, so that point had greater force than it would now have. The withdrawal from Kalgan was made in the face of the protest of the entire missionary force on the field of China in general, but it seemed best to the home secretaries to make it. Such withdrawals and transfers, as are now contemplated between the American Board and our society are not uncommon on the mission field. The Sunday school Commission met with several on its journeys, notably at Fusan, one of the finest missions in Korea, to be turned over to the Canadian Methodists by the Southern Presbyterians.

The direct field assigned to the Kalgan mission in the distribution made by the mission bodies on the field, covers a territory as large as the state of Connecticut, and it has within its borders two thousand cities and villages with more than two million people. The territory lies in part to the east and north of Kalgan, but the far larger portion lies to the south and west. It is accessible in part by railroad already built, and in part by another now being built to the west, and the third part by cart and horseback. Our missionaries use all these means of conveyance as seems best at the time. This territory extends through latitude 40-41 and a half, and longitude 111-115, reaching to the provinces of Chili-Shansi on the west. It is located between the two northern branches of the Great Wall of China. The southern branch of the wall marked the approach of China to the Mongols, but Chinese merchants and farmers are nothing, if not aggressive; they went beyond the southern branch of the wall. The northern branch was made to enclose these venturesome people. The Kalgan field is between these two branches, among these enterprising and progressive people. The people appear to bear on their faces and forms the marks of their superiority.

But there is still another "open door" for the Kalgan mission. The Chinese merchants and farmers are still aggressive, and out through the gate of the Great Wall, and through the pass in the mountains they have gone; and a district one hundred miles broad to the north, and of indefinite length east and west has almost a pure Chinese population. This field is practically unoccupied.—The Methodist Recorder.

SHALL OUR EDUCATION BE CHRISTIAN OR UNCHRISTIAN?

By President W. A. Harper, LL.D., Elon College, N. C.

A Startling Revelation.

The National Educational Association, which is supposed to reflect the educational sentiment of the country as faithfully as such an organization can, has just adjourned. It suggests in its platform many needed reforms and is eloquent in its plea for the rural public school, larger and better school houses, beautification of school grounds, practical education, and kindred themes, but does not even make mention of the religious life as at all within the province of education. O tempora! O mores!

A Study in Values—Weigh Well!

Our various State Constitutions and our Congress by the creation of the Bureau of Education in the Department of the Interior recognize that education is the duty of the state. These same instruments, as well as the Constitution of the United States, affirm that the church and state shall be forever separate and distinct in this coutry. In the popular thought the church has been accepted as the synonym of religion, and so the conclusion has been drawn that there must be no religious instruction in the public schools or the state institutions of higher learning. If it is the duty of the state to educate that its citizens may be intelligent and provide livings for themselves, is it not also the duty of the state to provide moral and religious instruction that the graduates of its school system may be law-abiding and upright? Is it worth while to educate a mans head and neglect his conscience? Which is worth more to a state, an intellectual prodigy without character or an intelligent man of character? Is it any more the duty of the state to provide for education than for religion?

A Tremendous Blunder.

But this is not the end of it. Not only have we seen the Bible and prayer excluded from our public schools, but we have seen something positively hurtful to moral and spiritual growth put in its place. In the public school age the pupil is in its own home when not in school and so the evil effect of the lack of moral and religious instruction does not appear, the parents' admonition and the home influences acting as a corrective to any moral or spiritual laxness that may tend to develop from the school, but even here teachers whose moral character is low and whose opposition to religion is outspoken have their depressing effects on their pupils. I would like to see the time come when no man who was questionable as to his moral life and hostile in his opinions to the Christian religion should be permitted to teach in our public schools, and the state runs a great risk of immoral infection from this deadly source today. When will a free people in the wild clamor for a false liberty of religious opinion see the fatal error they have permitted in not protecting the fountain-head of our public school system from moral pollution?

Religious Divorce Courts—Avoid Them.

Even worse does the status of religious instruction become in the institutions of higher learning, worse intrinsically and worse also because of the lack of counteracting home influences which serve to nullify the direful effects of irreligion in the public schools of secondary grade When we send our sons and daughters off to College, they are on their own responsibility. When deadly seeds of unbelief, of infidelity, of skepticism are sown in their hearts, there are no parental words to uproot them. They must be so thoroughly grounded in their religious life that they will be able of their own power to question and disprove to their own satisfaction the destructive teachings of those they are supposed to accept as authorities, or they shall lose their respect for religion. This is not an idle dream; it is a fact, sad fact, and these statements are made upon a basis of experience and observation. I record with solemn affirmation that I have known many instances where devout Christians have lost their devotion to their church and their God through a false step in the choice of the place of their higher education. They went away religious; they came back irreligious, scoffers. There would be no such objection to state institutions of higher learning as we constantly hear, if they had not really become divorce courts, divorcing their students from religion and marrying them to irreligion.

Religion or Irreligion—Which?

It amounts to just this: Shall our sons and daughters go to institutions where religion or irreligion is taught? There is no midway ground. Religion is not a separate department of life and cannot be set off from other vital questions by strict lines of division. Religion enters into every relation of life and must be provided for at every step. It is impossible to arrange a College curriculum in such way as to exclude religious instruction, so as not to be forced to take position on certain vital religious and spiritual interests. History and the Social Sciences simply cannot be taught without involving instruction favorable or inimical to religious growth. The same is true of Natural Sciences. Literature has a tremendous bearing on the spiritual life, and it makes no difference whether this literature is ancient or modern. Philosophy cannot be touched without involving spiritual interests. Even Mathematics has its religious aspect. Since there can be no education that does not have its religious bearing, how can we escape the conclusion that our young people during the fateful four years of College life are developing an intellectual bias for or against the religious life? There is no escape; we are providing them a wholesome religious atmosphere or they are breathing miasmatic germs destructive of the spiritual life. Our education shall be Christian or unchristian, and each individual parent shall settle that issue,—it cannot be avoided.

THE FREE TUITION BAIT—A FARCE

What will the outcome be? Will state college push Christian College to the wall? Ostensibly they have the advantage because they can put their hands in my pocket and in yours and take therefrom the money to perpetuate themselves! When they lose a student in open, fair competition, they can carry the contest still further and award scholarships without limit, relying upon the power of taxation within their grasp, and they are doing it every day, though even with free tuition it costs more to educate at these schools than in the Christian Colleges and pay tuition. Ostensibly these scholarships are given to those who expect to teach or to those who deserve them, which latter class are limited in number supposedly, but actually anybody who lets it be known that he will come on no other condition will find the scholarship "available", and more often they are given to the scions of rich men and politicians than to those who most need them. Shall this public plunder continue forever? Never! But why not? What reason have you to believe that the Christian College shall continue in the face of the tremendous odds against it?

The Christian College is the Place for the Proper Unfolding of Character in Youth.

I believe the Christian College is here to stay and to grow and to increase, because it furnishes that element of life without which there can be no enduring estate or state, character. If the time were ever to come, wherein the great majority of our intllectual men were without character, the death knell of the state would already have been sounded. But that day will not come. I am exceedingly optimistic over the situation. There will always be some to whom the monetary consideration of free tuition in a state college and the false supposition that it will make education cheaper for them, will outweigh the character developing process in the Christian college, and if the product turned out by the state college could in any way compare with the product in Christian character of the Christian college, it is conceivable that eventually the Christian college would cease to exist. Of those who accept the farcical monetary bait, many will return moral perverts and religious scoffers, and the observation of those unfortunates will steel the thinking parents round them against any such appeal in their case. The Christian college, the product of Christian hearts for the Christian end of educating the heart as well as the hand, is destined to fill a larger place in our educational system and will make our education safely Christian.

Our Education Is To Be Christian.

But I ought to add, in conclusion, that this optimistic view will not make it less necessary for the friends of Christian education to do their full duty by their Christian college. The Carnegie Foundation, The Rockefeller Foundation, and scores of rich men, whose hearts are poor, are active to break the power of religion over education. They will succeed, unless the liberality of the Christian world shall exceed the lavishness of these few would-be philanthropists in the educational realm. I have faith and reason to believe that the men and women of the Church of God will rally to the Christian colleges and will save them from eclipse and to the world's upbuilding. Whether or not our education shall be Christian or unchristian is to be determined in the support accorded the Christian colleges by the followers of Christ. I believe they will amply support them, both by gifts and by patronage, and for that reason with confidence I give utterance to the faith that is in me, that Our Education is to be Christian.

POPULAR TALKS ON LAW.

Assaults and Batteries.

By Walter K. Towers, A. B., J. D., of the Michigan Bar.

Many are the happenings of everyday life that might, under strict rules of law, be held to be assault and battery, if the persons involved chose to bring the matter to the attention of a court. Enough are taken up by aggrieved parties, who choose to press their claims before the law, to make actions for assault and battery frequent indeed. So, an action for assault and battery is likely to happen within the experience of any of us. The victim of more than one "practical joke" has failed to view the mater as a "joke", and recovered damages against the joker, whom the law held to be guilty of an assault and battery. Not infrequently an angry assailant, though he fails to reach the man upon whom he would vent his wrath, finds that he must pay damages to the person whom he failed to touch, because he has committed a technical assault. So, too, the fist fight of ancient origin brings forth an action for assault and battery—civil or criminal.

A criminal action is one undertaken by the public prosecutor—thongh possibly at the instance of the aggrieved party—to punish the offender for his affront to the peace and dignity of the state in creating a disturbance. The action is taken in the name of the state, and if the offender is found guilty the result is punishment—a fine, which the state receives, or imprisonment. The civil action, on the other hand, is a private action taken by the aggrieved party, in which he moves in his own name by his own attorney. If he is successful he recovers damages to recompense him for the injuries he has suffered, and these are paid to him. The same fist fight may be both a crime against the state and a private wrong against the individual. The state may punish the aggressor for his crime against its peace and dignity, and the private citizen also bring a separate and distinct private suit in his own behalf to recover damages. It is the private action by the individual to secure recompense for the injuries he has suffered that is of most immediate concern to the average individual, and it is the circumstances that give rise to this civil action that we will discuss here. The grounds of criminal liability are not dissimilar, in most states, though a criminal conviction for assault and battery is more difficult to secure than damages in vindication of a private wrong.

Though generally used together assault and battery are two distinct things. There may be an assault without any battery, though a battery is usually accompanied by an assault. Thus Mortin was walking along the footpath by the side of the road, when Shoppee, who had threatened him in the past, came riding from behind, mounted on his horse. Shoppee rode straight at Mortin in a most threatening manner, and Mortin, by desperate running, just managed to keep ahead until he could turn into the garden gate. Shoppee sat his horse without inviting Mortin to come out and be "licked." Mortin sued Shoppee for assault and recovered, although he had not been touched. These hostile demonstrations, which threaten immediate bodily harm to another and put him in reasonable fear of his personal safety amount to an assault, in law, although the assailant does not succeed in touching the person attacked.

A frequent instance of assault is where one man starts in the direction of another shaking his fists with every apparent intent of attacking him, but is checked and held by bystanders before he can reach his intended victim. This action amounts to an assault in law and the person against whom the attack was directed may bring civil suit and recover damages against the aggressor. True, these damages will not be large where no substantial injury has been inflicted, but even where no injury or damage of any nature can be shown nominal damages—six cents—will be awarded as vindication, and the assailant will be required to pay the cost of suit.

Pointing a loaded revolver at another, or making hostile demonstrations with any weapon, is an assault. Pointing a revolver may still amount to an assault though the weapon be not loaded, provided that the person threatened is not aware of this fact. The courts of Alabama, Indiana, Oregon and Texas have ruled that pointing an unloaded revolver at another does not amount to an assault; but in Iowa, Kansas, Massachusetts, New York and Tennessee it has been held to be an assault.

The essential idea of an assault lies in the attempt, real or apparent, to do harm. The attempt need not be real; it is sufficient if it is apparent, and appears to be real. The intent to produce an assault is not necessary if the action of the attacker was hostile and produced genuine fear.

The words or circumstances accompanying a threatening gesture may be such as to show to a reasonable person that no harm is imminent. The man who says, "If I were not in my Sunday suit I would lick you," and shakes his fist, is not guilty of an assault. His words deny the implication of an immediate threat. Neither do preparations to commit an assault amount to an assault. To amount to assault there must be some physical effort to carry the attack into effect. In a case where one was held liable for shooting a gun in the direction of others, "as a joke," as he explained it, the judge said: "Those who shoot at their friends for amusement ought to warn them first that it is mere sport."

Battery is added to assault when the assailant so far accomplishes his purpose as to reach the person of the victim. To touch another in anger, though in the slightest degree, or to use violence against another to rudely force a passage is, in law, a battery. If one strikes another with hostile attitude, though it be but the weight of his little finger, it is as truly a battery as though he struck him a dozen blows with great force. In the latter case, of course, greater damages would be awarded to the injured party. Battery has been defined as the unpermitted application of force by one to the person of another.

Many are the instances of assault and battery. If one strikes another in anger the case is clear. One who rudely and unnecessarily jostles another is guilty of assault and battery. The party jostled, may, if he desires, sue in civil action for assault and battery, and recover damages. Of course it is not every bit of jostling and pushing that occurs in a crowd that amounts to an assault and battery, but only that which is inexcusable and unnecessary. An overseer of poor who cut the hair of an inmate of the poor farm, contrary to his will, and without authority of law, was held liable as for assault and battery.

The body of the person assaulted need not be touched in order to constitute a battery. It is enough that the clothing be touched. If you knock a man's hat off you have comitted a battery. That it was intended as a joke is no defense if the person injured did not willingly submit to the joke and does not choose to treat the matter as a joke. An assault is none the less such because it was committed to have fun during the merry season of Christmas, or at any other time of gaiety and carnival.

An assault and battery may be committed by touching that which supports a person, as well as his body or clothing. If you pull the chair from beneath a man, it is an assault and battery. If you drive a wagon against the buggy in which he is riding, hostilely and unnecessarily, that is an assault and battery.

LETTER TO PASTORS.

Dear Brother Pastor:

Just one year ago this September an appeal was sent throughout the Methodist Protestant Church for aid in erecting the new Children's Home near High Point, N. C.

You will doubtless be glad to know what has been done since then. There was purchased 38 acres of valuable land within two miles of High Point, one of the most progressive cities in the Southland, and there has been erected thereon a most modern, suitable and splendid building that can accommodate nearly one hundred people. The total cost of building and land has footed up about $26,000. The land cost $3,800, and the building around $22,000. The building committee set out to erect a building not to cost over $17,000, and $20,000 was secured in cash and good pledges for this work, but after the work was begun it was found that no arrangement had been made for heating, lighting, furnishing, water or sewer conections. These all have been added, and have made the cost greater than was first contemplated. The building is a marvel in completeness, attractive in design, perfectly sanitary, well arranged for the Home, and located in a good community in the Piedmont section of the State. Last year we asked for one offering from the Sunday schools during September to help erect this building, and now we are asking for one more offering to help us pay off every cent of the indebtedness, complete the furnishings and maintain the Home during the coming year. The new Home was entered August first, the cost of maintenance is increasing as the number of children increases. Let us make this the happy ending of a noble undertaking and free this Home of all indebtedness and be able to furnish every room before winter comes.

Dear Brother Pastor, you can greatly aid us in this work by bringing the matter before your people and earnestly asking them to respond to this appeal. Please urge all your Sunday schools to make a liberal offering one Sunday during September and send it in to the Treasurer, Dr. J. R. Reitzel, High Point, N. C. Believing you will give this your immediate attention and help us in every way, we are,

Very sincerely yours,

J. M. Millikan, Chairman.

WHERE TROUBLE BEGINS.

By Victor P. Hammer.

A wise old owl sat on an oak;
He turned his head, but never spoke;
With all he knew, he held his tongue,
While sitting there the boughs among.
Another owl (the old owl's son),
Up on a limb, hooted for fun.
A boy passed by and saw the show,
Then grabbed a rock—and "let it go!"

An old man set a nice, new trap,
Then, lying down, he took a nap,
When father rat passed by and said:
"Without my lunch I'll go to bed."
The old rat had a little boy
Who passed that way and saw the toy;
He took a nibble, then, a bite—
"Snap" went the trap and held him tight!

A cunning fox lived in the woods,
And there he kept stored all his goods;
But none of his neighbors ever knew
Just what that fox had planned to do.
Young Reynard wouldn't mind his ma,
And, often, disobeyed his pa;
He'd run and "yap", both night and day,
And go away from home to play.

Now, sir, young owl goes on a crutch,
While, for good luck, wee rat's no such;
And little Reynard's in a cage,
Where he can bite himself and rage.
And so it's true, as well, with folk,
As true as where there's fire there's smoke,
That one starts to disobey,
He gets in trouble right away.

Washington, D. C., July 25,1913.

YOUR PUBLIC FACE

WHICH OF THESE WERE YOU?

You were on the car that carried me down-town this morning. I wonder which one you were. Were you the one who sat dejectedly, inviting out all the inner worries and perplexities to line your face and make the corners of your mouth droop, taking into your confidence, as it were, all the unsympathetic crowd?

Speaking of sympathies, surely you were not the person who presented a tear-stained face and brimming eyes to those curious people. Genuine grief seems too sacred a thing to exhibit to strangers.

But I may be mistaken: perhaps you were the giggly one. I mean the one who could not suppress a titter whatever happened, even when the lurch of the car nearly threw that old lady down in the aisle.

I hope you were not that individual with such snarling lips that the timid lady next you thought involuntarily of a muzzle.

Possibly you were the one who considered it "the proper thing" to ignore all your fellow passengers. You had a set stare that made us feel as if you were walking in your sleep. You were as impersonal as if you were moving among creatures of another order of being.

Were you the one who glared angrily at every person who happened to touch you, as if you were the owner of the line and were making up your mind to hand the trespassers over to the police at the next stop?

Or maybe you were the haughty one, and glared at the innocent strap-hanger who leaned toward your window to see whether he had arived at his destination as if he had personally insulted you.

You—but of course you were that one who came aboard quietly, and walked heedfully among the others, as easily, naturally, and considerately as a person of gentle breeding always conducts himself. There was no pretence about you, for you have learned that it is vulgar, and, moreover, does not deceive a single person, whether one sits comfortably, or sways from a strap, or hangs on the jammed platform.—Josephine B. Krieg, in C. E. World.

THE BOARD GENEROUSLY REMEMBERED

I am informed that by the will of the late Matthew C. Crawford of Allegheny County, Pa., the Board of Foreign Missions will share with the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in his estate to the amountof from four to five thousand dollars each.

Mr. Crawford was a Presbyterian, but on the removal of the church to a distance too great for him to attend, he became interested in our church through the ministry of Rev. John Henderson, of our Pittsburgh Conference.

His bequest is the practical expression of his great interest in foreign mission work, and of his regard for our denomination.

He was unmarried and died July 4th at the age of eighty-four.

His generous gift to our foreign work ought to incite many of our own members to remember the Board of Foreign Missions in their will. Do it today, and so let this venerable man's good work be fruitful at home and abroad.

Write me also about the Board's Annuity Plan by which you receive, during life, interest on the sum of money you give to the Board of Foreign Missions, and at your death the money is used directly in the foreign work, being safely invested meanwhile.

EVER THE ESSENTIAL

By saving the children now, you are helping to save the next generation to the church.

By enlisting and training the children now in our Sunday schools, you are preparing the next generation to be a working force for the world's evangelization.

While we must appeal to the adult members to meet their obligations, we must not in any degree overlook the children who so soon will be the adults in the church, or be out in the world without Christian experience and purpose.

The great problem is really childhood and youth, for statistics prove most conclusively that the great majority in the church today were converted when they were young, and certainly it is not a very difficult matter to train young people in Christian service and in the grace of giving.

The church suffers today, because its adult members did not get the information and training needed in their younger days, hence the indifference, apathy of so many to the tremendous claims of the gospel and the needy world.

The same results must inevitably follow if we do not give the young a missionary education, and have them share in the activities of the church. It is imperativee that we try to save and train the young.

PLEASE HEED THIS

A great many schools have not yet sent me their Children's Day offering. Do not keep it until your Conference meets. Send it to me today, and your assessment too.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

I left High Point on the sixth of August for the East. I reached Edenton on the Albemarle Circuit at 1:30 on the 7th. On my way I met up with Bro. Abernethy and wife and they accompanied me to Mackey's St., where Bro. Gerringer met me and we were soon across the sound and landed at Edenton Station.

Bro. Gerringer and I spent our stay with Bro. and Sister Davenport while in Edenton. At 8 o'clock we met in our church for preaching. Not a large attendance; but a very good service.

We have a good location and one of the nicest little churches there are in our conference. It is a pity that we have not been able to build up a good strong membership at this point. Our following has never been large here, and from what I could learn it is less now than it was in years past, and the only thing I see left to do is for the balance of the circuit to help the few members that remain to pay the pastor so he can go over and preach for them and see what will develop in the near future. Mrs. Davenport is a true Methodist Protestant. Thanks to her for entertainment.

At one o'clock on the eighth Bro. Gerringer and I left Edenton for Creswell and there we were furnished with horse and buggy, and we drove 9miles in the country to Mt. Elma, where we met a large congregation who seemed to enjoy the service. We spent the night with Bro. N. A. Ainsly. Back to Creswewll and secured another turnout and drove three miles to Woodley's Chapel, preached to a small assembly at 11 A. M. and took dinner with C. W. Woodley and here we enjoyed a few hours rest and refreshments.

We were soon off to take supper with Bro. A. W. Davenport. At 8 o'clock there was preaching at Mt. Hermon, and a large congregation was in attendance. The pastor and I drove back to his boarding place at Bro. Alfred Alexander's and spent the night. Sunday A. M. was a bright, hot, clear day. Our appointment was at Rehoboth at 11 A. M., and through the kindness of Bros. Wiley, Alexander and Gerringer, we were taken a distance of 13 miles in an auto, and the trip was a very pleasant one indeed. Preaching at 11 A. M., a fair attendance, and the attention good.

We took dinner with Sister H. H. Tarkenton and her daughter; we fared sumptuously. We had supper with Bro. Alexander, preaching at 8 o'clock at Creswell; good attendance considering the revival in the Baptist church near by; good attention to the Word.

This completed my plan for this field. The pastor and Ispent the night with Bro. Wm. Wiley. Monday A. M. we looked over the village and viewed the parsonage, etc. Mt. Elma, Mt. Hermon, Rehoboth and Creswell churches need painting and some other repairs, and this field ought to pay a better salary and raise more of their general interests; it's a good field for development. Bro. Gerringer is well received and he is doing a good work; but if any field wants such a pastor and preacher as he they ought to be willing to pay a better salary and pay it monthly or quarterly. Claim paid.

Thanks to pastor and people.

LA GRANGE.

I left Creswell at 9 o'clock on the 11th for Fieldsburg, where Bro. Sam Walston met me and took me to his home in the community of Harris's Chapel, where I was to preach; but on account of rain storm there was no service. Bro. Abernethy met me at Bro. Walston's, where we spent the night.

Tueesday A. M. Bro. Abernethy and I went to the church, and I went in and looked over it, and found it in good condition on the inside, but it needs a coat of paint on the outside, and the pastor thought it would be painted soon. I could but think of Bro. W. L. Harris while in this community, he is greatly beloved on this field, so is Bro. Swain.

We left this community for La Grange and arrived at 1:30 P. M. and took dinner with Bro. N. L. Creech. Our next appointment was at Hickory Grove, six miles in the country. We drove to Bro. J. F. Borwick's for supper. Preaching at 8 o'clock, a fair attendance, and a good service. We spent the night with Bro. J. A. Sutton, drove back to the home of the pastor in La Grange, read and answered some mail, and took supper with J. W. Graham. At 8 o'clock I preached to a small but very appreciative audience. La Grange church needs to be painted at once in order to preserve the building. The people are able on this field to support a pastor handsomely and I hope they will see the importance of doing so real soon. It is impossible for a pastor to do his best work on a field if he has to farm, or teach, or do something to supplement his salary, and yet some of our pastors are forced to do so, and in many instances the field suffers for attention in more ways than one. I have enjoyed my eastern trip so far, except the extreme heat. I leave tonight for Kinston on my way to Roanoke Ct., where I expect a pleasant visit, being associated with Bro. C. L. Whitaker, who joined the conference when I did twenty-five years ago at Flat Rock.

Thanks to Bros. Gerringer and Abernethy and their people for their unlimited kindness to me. C. A. Cecil.

FROM OUR PASTORS

YARBORO CHARGE

It was my privilege to be with Bro. Lamar and assist him in two of his revivals. While Yarboro Circuit has only two appointments it is large if distance between points counts. It may well be called the circuit of "magnificent distances." We drove from the pastor's home at Cross Anchor, thirty miles to Harmony church, and began revival services the fourth Sunday in July. The services continued until Friday night. This was a good meeting, some seventeen souls professing conversion and reclamation. Harmony, while a small church, is doing good work. The membership is loyal and appreciative. They spoke well of their pastor, and all the preachers who have helped in revival work there; said they were all good preachers. Sorry, however, there is one exception now. We are under many obligations to these good people for their kindness while among them.

The revival at Yarboro Chapel, which is situated one mile from the village of Cross Anchor, commenced the first Sunday in August with a Sunday school Convention. The services were to close Friday evening. I left for home Thursday morning. This also was a good meeting, though very quiet. The people are intelligent and have what is lacking in so many of our congregations —reverence. The pastor, Bro. Lamar, also serves the Anderson charge, which gives him the largest territory to cover of any man in the Conference. He is doing good work for the Master and the people of all churches find in him a helper and desire his return. H. C.

HOPE CHURCH, SILER CITY CIRCUIT.

This church is situated in the thriving little town of Bonlee, the junction of the Southern and the Bonlee and Western railroads. The town is building up rapidly and contains some of the very best people among whom we have some as good as the best. This is one instance where a town came to the church. Hope so far as the town is concerned is ideally located. In the next few months a splendid school building will be erected near the church at a cost of from $8,000 to $10,000. It looks to me as if there might be a bright future for our church at this place. Indeed we have a live church here now. The special meeting commenced at this church the second Sunday in August and closed on Wednesday night following. Three services were conducted each day after Sunday. This is necessary, as some of our best members are too far away to attend at night, and a night service is necessary for the town. The meeting was a most excelleent one, for spiritual uplift and inspiration it was unusually significant, indeed the revival was good; nine professed faith in Christ and four joined the church. Bro. Millaway was my help. They will want him to come again.

My third quarterly conference will be held at Siler City on Saturday before the fifth Sunday in this month at 10:30 A. M. Brethren, come. J. H. Bowman.

REIDSVILLE.

The Sunday school of Reidsville church went to the mineral springs near Wentworth Thursday last. It was cloudy in the morning and several were afraid to venture. There were 45. It was a day of great enjoyment. Old and young alike were young and joyful. It was one of the finest places I ever saw for a picnic, cool shade, pure water, etc. The dinner was all that could be asked for. Watermelons fine and plenty and to spare, grapes and cantaloupes. After some two or three hours of real life among the trees, beside the rippling stream, we started for home and came by the county home. There we were made sorry to see the unfortunate ones, yet fortunate in having a home to spend their last days. We left a part of our dinner and lingered about three quarters of an hour, then on to Wentworth, the county seat. We went through the court house, which is a modern one, then through the jail. Here our hearts were made to mourn to see the wicked, unfortunate ones. Especially for one fine intelligent looking young man,—some mother's son,—fast behind iron bars in jail for burglary. About 4 P. M. we started homeward. The jail is modern in every respect, and they are at work on a new modern up-to-date county home. We came back the McAdamized road, miles of which we will put against any four miles in the state for being the road of more S's than any other. Some time when I have pencil and paper I intend to count the S's on this road if I live. Moral: as you start from Reidsville two miles nice and very straight, then dangerous for curves and automobiles, for about three or four miles. Then nearly straight to the poor house, on to the court house and on to jail. Much like the sinner's life —first easy, then hard sailing and on the last run smooth and the end certain. Mr. J. D. McCollum, superintendent, really had a day off, and he enjoyed seeing his school and pastor mix, mingle, eat, drink and be merry. The day will never be forgotten.

RICHLAND CIRCUIT.

Special meetings on Richland circuit as follows: Cedar Falls began yesterday; splendid congregations at both services, and much intrest. Rev. J. F. Allred preached very acceptably last night. Rev. D. R. Williams expected today. Meeting begins at Brower's Chapel the fourth Sunday in this month; Flag Springs the fifth Sunday; New Zion the second Sunday in September; Giles' Chapel the third Sunday.

The third quarterly conference will meet at Flag Springs Saturday before the fifth Sunday at 10:30 A. M.

C. H. Whitaker, Pastor.

THOMASVILLE.

A pounding by the Baracas and Philatheas:

Last Thursday night, August 14, while we were in the church attending to some business of the Ladies' Aid, Miss Grace Harris came to me saying Bro. Boyles wanted to see me outside. When I got out I noticed the parsonage was lighted up. When we went in, we found, I supposed, 25 or 30 people awaiting us in the dining-room, and the table just loaded down with many good things for our comfort. As it would be difficult. I will not try to mention the ones that came. There were some that did not belong to the Baracas or Philatheas. The Lord knows each one. May He bless each of them. I assure you, dear people, there is a warm spot in our hearts for you all. T. A. Williams.

FAIRGROVE, HAW RIVER CIRCUIT.

It was the privilege of the writer to meet with the good people of Fairgrove Church on the second Sunday in August in their special meeting. We left Elon College on the early morning train and arrived at Brown Summit about half past eight o'clock, where we met Bro. Ashburn, the pastor of Haw River Circuit, and he carried us out to Fairgrove in time for preaching. It was indeed a pleasure to be with Bro. Ashburn again and hold fellowship with him as we have in the years gone by. He is indeed a good man and the people of Haw River Circuit are fortunate in having him for their pastor.

By eleven o'clock a large congregation had gathered at the church. The congregation was large enough to fill two churches the size of Fairgrove. The people gave good heed to the Word and it was a pleasure to preach to them.

The meeting continued until Tuesday evening, when it came to a close. There were thirteen conversions and reclamations and thirteen joined the church. The services were interesting from the beginning until the close of the meeting. The presence of the Spirit was manifest at every service and the unsaved were convicted of sin and were converted to a new life in Jesus Christ.

The people of Fairgrove Church are good workers. There were but few unsaved persons in the community, and practically all of them were saved during the meeting. The church was also greatly revived.

It was our good pleasure to be entertained in the homes of Brothers Moore and Bevil of the Fairgrove Church. It is needless to say that these good people were as kind and considerate of our welfare and happiness as it is possible for any one to be.

May the Lord bless and guide both pastor and people and may they ever be abounding in good works.

Fraternally, Thomas C. Amick.

LA GRANGE.

The first Sunday in this month we filled the appointment at Harris' Chapel, the second Sunday at Hickory Grove and the third in La Grange. The third quarterly conference was held at Hickory Grove Saturday night before the second Sunday. Mr. George E. Sawrey of Harris' Chapel was elected delegate to the Annual Conference. Our meeting at Harris' Chapel will begin the fifth Sunday in the month. We are expecting Rev. W. C. Lassiter to come and do the preaching. The visit of President Cecil to this charge was enjoyed by our people. He is helpful to pastor and people. We are glad he came.

J. H. Abernethy.

PIEDMONT CIRCUIT.

We held our third quarterly conference on the first Saturday in this month; it was well attended; all of the churches represented excepting one. Bro. G. A. Berrier was declared elected delegate to the Annual Conference, and Bro. H. F. Murphy alternate. We began our special meeting at Mt. Pleasnat the first Sunday and closed on the following Sunday night. We had fifteen conversions and four accessions to the church with more to join later. This was a good meeting, and we thank God for the victory he gave us at this place. We have painted Mt. Pleasant on the outside and will also paint the irterior at an early date. We thank Bro. Pickett of High Point for the valuable assistance he rendered us in getting it painted. Our meeting begins at Canaan next Sunday and we ask the prayers of the Christians that we may have a glorious revival. May God bless all the brethren in their work is my prayer. A. D. Shelton.

FROM LOCAL REPORTERS

CID, UWHARRIE CIRCUIT.

The special meeting began at Cid last Sunday with an unusually large congregation. Bro. Allred, of near Randleman was Bro. Trogdon's pulpit help, and I am glad to say we had an old time revival from start to finish. It seemed as if God just poured out his blesings upon the people. I always believe that we get just what we pay for if we come as believing children, I believe the Christian part of the church was in the right spirit before the meeting began and the ministers did not have to preach a half week to get the church in readiness to go in his vineyard and work. There were nineteen conversions and seven joined the church and more, I think, will join. All want baptism by immersion, so let every one have his way. The only thing I was sorry of was the meeting closed too quick, as it closed on Thursday night. Bro. Trogdon got sick and had to go home on Thursday; we were all so sorry. We had large congregations from start to finish. We extend our many thanks to our sister churches for their aid, and especially the choir of Piney Grove, and also Mr. Altas Ridge, of Canaan, who left his work and came to work with us. He knew that our laborers were few and the Lord impressed him that the harvesting of lost souls was so important. Oh! that every child of God would realize the responsibility that is resting on the children of God. I am thankful for such a revival of religion. Sister Trogdon and two children came up to worship with us. She is such a good Christian lady that we were so glad to have her with us. The people came from far away to attend this meeting.

Mr. and Mrs. T. C. Crutchfield, of Greensboro, spent last night with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. N. W. Lanier.

Mrs. Nannie Byrum, of High Point, is visiting her sister, Mrs. N. W. Lanier.

There was a large crowd to attend the children's day at Jerusalem Sunday. The children did well, which showed good training from their teachers. I learn that the collection was excellent.

The special meeting began at Wayside Sunday. There was much interest manifested for the good.

We are thinking of starting up our Sunday school soon.

May God's blessing rest on the people and may many precious souls be saved before the close of this year, is the prayer of an humble servant. L.

MAPLE SPRINGS, EAST FORSYTH CIRCUIT.

Our protracted meeting began the first Sunday in August and continued until Friday night. Bro. R. C. Stubbins was our help and preached all but two sermons. He being unable to preach on account of hoarseness and cold, our pastor preached twice.

There were three conversions. Sometimes I think we measure the success of a meeting by the number of conversions. Of course that is one main object, but oftimes I think the members need encouragement and instruction, even as much as the unconverted, for we may be converted and yet not be saved.

On Friday night Bro. Stubbins gave a special sermon to the children. We appreciated it very much for are we not all children? I know that our church has been greatly helped by this series of meetings.

We were glad to have Mrs. Stella Kiger Wolf, of Thurmond, N. C., with us in our S. S. yesterday. The first visit home since she was married.

We have some new song books in our S. S. now; I think they will help in our singing. Ida Long.

LINCOLNTON.

We will have a special meeting in the Lincolnton church commencing on Wednesday before the fifth Sunday. Rev. J. H. Moton will do the preaching. Many people in this section will be glad to meet Bro. Moton as he was pastor of the Lincoln and Cleveland work nine years. We want to ask the prayers of all God's children for this meeting. The harvest is great, but the laborers are few.

The officers and teachers of our S. S. have just completed a religious census of of the cotton mill district of Lincolnton, and give the report as follows:

Members of the different churches....345
Members of the different S. S.....394
Not attending Sunday school.....326
Not members of any church.....254

This does not include the babies. We have on our Sunday school roll about 150. We had in school Sunday 81. Many absent for different reasons. Our collection was $2.27. We are planning to increase our attendance soon. Our attendance has been good up to the vacation season, so we must plan to bring them back.

Bro. Fitzwater, who is with us working for the American Bible Society gave us a splendid sermon from the subject found in Sol. 5:3: "I have put off my coat: how shall I put it on?" I wish more could have heard this subject so ably discussed. Our C. E. Society both senior and junior is doing some splendid work, but can do more yet.

Success to the Herald and its readers.

MT. ZION, UWHARRIE CIRCUIT.

Our special meeting began the first Sunday in August and closed on Friday of that week. Rev. J. W. Hulin, of Denton, was Bro. Trogdon's help, and he did some good preaching. His sermons were presented in such a plain way that even the children could understand and we all were benefited. I think the members were greatly strengthened and the spiritual condition of the church was much improved. There were twelve conversions, I believe, and two joined the church. I hope that those who did not join our church will join some other. We were very sorry that some are going on in sin yet, but we trust and pray that they may see where they are before it is too late. We were sorry that Bros. Trogdon and Hulin couldn't be in our home but hope they will come, because we are always glad to see them.

May the Lord bless them in all of their meetings that they might be strengthened by the Holy Spirit is my best wish.

UNION CHAPEL, GRANVILLE CIRCUIT.

Our special meeting began the fourth Sunday in July, and closed the folowing Thursday. Rev. R. C. Canipe, of the M. E. Church, was the pulpit help. His sermons were all uplifting and soul-stirring. There were a good many conversions and reclamations; nine persons were received into the church. The singing was good. We had recently purchased a new organ, and fifty new song books.

Our pastor filled his regular appointment last second Sunday P. M. He preached a good sermon, as he always does. After service nearly a third of the amount of money that Granville Ct. is planning to raise, to furnish one of the rooms at the Orphanage, was raised by the good people of Union Chapel.

We are planning to have a Sunday school picnic in the near future.

WELCH MEMORIAL CHURCH.

Since my last report the death angel has been among us. On August 1 it visited the home of Bro. A. P. Trogdon and took his wife. Sister Trogdon had been in feeble health for some time, but still her death was a shock to many of us because we did not know she was so sick.

Her funeral was conducted at the home by Rev. J. H. Moton and her body laid to rest in the city cemetery to await the resurrection morn. We extend to Bro. Trogdon and daughter who are left behind our heartfelt sympathy and point them to God as the only comforter in these sad hours.

IN LOVING MEMORY

On August 8th, 1913, death entered the home of Dr. S. N. Long and wife and laid his icy hand on their darling little Gray, who had flooded their home with sunshine for nearly five years. Little Gray only budded on earth to bloom in heaven's eternal brightness. He is now in the arms of a Savior who will keep him pure and spotless; he is safe. Fond parents, mourn not for him, only think of him as resting free from all pain, a bright star in heaven to lead you on. Hear the pledge of Jesus Christ, "I will not leave you comfortless; lo! I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." As long as God lives and our souls live does this pledge stand. Perhaps we cannot always feel this presence, but we can always know that it is there, always rest upon it, always think of it. There may be a moment in the very depth of sorrow and anguish when the presence seems hidden from us, but it is not, we are only stunned, unconscious, from grief. It is like passing through a surgical operation. The time comes for the ordeal. The anaesthetic is ready. You stretch out your hand to your friend: Don't leave me, don't forsake me. The last thing you feel is the clasp of that hand, the last thing you see is the face of that friend. Then a moment of darkness, a blank—and the first thing you see is the face of love again. So the angel of God's face stands by us, bends above us, and we know that he will be there when all else fails us.

Little Gray was a bright little boy, and with his bright blue eyes, rosy cheeks, and sweet disposition, none could know him but to love him. He was sick about three days. He became paralyzed, but his mind was clear and he could talk to the last. He spoke about dying and asked his father and mother and little brother and sisters not to cry so about him. He also spoke of his grandma, and there is no doubt that he saw her beckoning to him from the other shore as he was nearing the dark stream which we all must cross sooner or later.

Gray is sleeping, calmly sleeping
In a newmade grave today;
We are weeping, sadly weeping
For the darling gone away.
One by one the gentle Shepherd
Gathers lambs from every fold.
Folds them to his loving bosom
With a tenderness untold.

Gray is waiting, calmly waiting
For the friends he loved the best,
And he'll gladly hail their coming
To the mansions of the blest.
One by one the Lord will call us
As our labor here is done;
And then as we cross the river,
Gray will meet us one by one.

To the bereaved family and relatives and friends I can only offer my deepest sympathy and entreat them to look up beyond this thick gloom that has enveloped them, look up into the sunshine of God's great goodness, and with the eye of faith see the precious little jewel who has gone before us in the mansion above, there with many others singing heavenly songs and with their little angel fingers striking the chords on little golden harps. Learn to say with sweet joy, "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away. Blessed be the name of the Lord."

Little Gray was tenderly laid to rest in the grave-yard at Pleasant Hill church, near his grandma and other relatives. The little grave was covered with flowers placed by loving hands. The funeral was conducted by the pastor, Rev. G. H. Austin, and Rev. Walter Grabs, of Bethania.

Stafford

Mrs. Mary M. Stafford, in the early morning of May 23, 1913, departed this life at the age of 69 years, 7 months and 19 days. She was the daughter of John Thompson. She was born near Saxapahaw, Alamance County. Her entire life was spent near her old home.

She was married to George Stafford March 4, 1878. He died Nov. 4, 1904. To them were born three children, Dr. T. S. Stafford, Mrs. W. M. Pike, and S. S. Stafford. She had raised three stepchildren, two of them now living, J. E. Stafford and Mrs. C. M. Braxton. W. F. Stafford having died Oct. 9, 1908. Besides the children she leaves one aged brother, S. W. Thompson, to mourn her departure.

The step-children speak of her affectionately as if she had been their own mother.

She had been a member of Salem church for about 55 years. She was always glad to have her pastor in her home. She lived the life of a Christian, and when informed by her physician of her dangerous condition she was not alarmed. Death came to her while she was asleep but did not find her unprepared. She always manifested a quiet Christian spirit, and was always ready for any good work. She cheerfully relieved the sick and suffering when it was in her power to do so. The funeral services were conducted at Salem by her pastor, Rev. G. W. Holmes, and in the cemetery of that place she was buried in the presence of a large number of sorrowing relatives and friends.

She is gone but not forgotten. Her beautiful life will continue to influence her children and others for good. She is missed by her church, her neighbors, but most of all by her children, for she was an affectionate mother.

Ledford

Mrs. Elsie Ledford, wife of Amos Ledford, was born December 24, 1866, was married Feb. 10, 1886, died Aug. 6, 1913. She had been sick for a long time of consumption. She leaves a husband, four children, three brothers, five sisters, and a great host of friends. She was a member of the M. P. Church. She was laid to rest at Mt. Moriah church graveyard August 6th. The funeral was conduct by Bert Ivester.

A HEAVENLY VISION.

My heart was sad and discouraged,
And lonely, and sick, and sore,
As I thought of the sorrows of millions,
And pondered them o'er and o'er;
Of the sigh of tired women;
Of the groan of discouraged men;
Of the cry of the broken-hearted,
That sounded again and again;
Of the wail of weeping children,
The strife that would never cease;
And I longed for Christ's coming kingdom,
For the reign of the Prince of Peace.
Then a voice came through the twilight
Like the voice of a silver bell,
And it spoke to my heart of sadness,
And this message to me did tell:

Fear not and be not discouraged;
To labor and win is thy part:
Fear not and be not discouraged,
And I will strengthen thine heart.

Then a light broke on my vision;
The mists fell from my eyes,
And I saw a heavenly being
In splendor before me rise.
And he bade me lift the fallen;
To cheer and strengthen the weak;
To comfort the broken-hearted,
And help from above to seek.
He showed me a narrow pathway
That was bordered with love untold,
And he pointed a heavenly city
With mansions built of gold,
And his voice rang in the twilight—
A voice that was firm and clear—
And it healed my drooping spirits
With this message of love and cheer:

Fear not and be not discouraged;
To labor and win is thy part;
Fear not and be not discouraged,
And I will strengthen thine heart.

POLLY'S PIES

You ought to see wee Polly's pies!
She takes a bit of dough
That cook allows her, and she tries
To roll it out "just so";
But she must handle it a lot
Before it fits her pan,
And pie-crust does show every spot
When hands aren't spick and span!
And pies, to be quite flaky, need
The very lightest touch,
The crust is very tough indeed
If it is handled much.
And when wee Polly's pie is made,
She feels a sad surprise
When Cousin May says, "I'm afraid
I dare not eat rich pies";
But Aunt Estella takes a piece
And says, "Is this for me?
You're very kind, dear little niece,
I'll take it home for tea."

A CROW STORY.

People who don't know the crow may find difficulty in believing the following anecdote, though Anglo-Indians will accept it without hesitation.

A dog of my acquaintance, a fox terrier of long Eastern experience, was one morning eating a chicken bone on the veranda, when two crows happened to pass and, observing the dog and his bone, wheeled down and lit on the veranda railing, when they set to work croaking to induce him to drop his breakfast. Under ordinary circumstances an English dog will fly at a crow the minute he appears; but on this occasion Jack simply looked up, growled, and continued gnawing. The crows ceased croaking and consulted together for a moment, then one of the pair dropped onto the veranda a few yards behind the dog, croaked at him again, once more obtaining no answer but a growl. After strolling casually round the veranda for a minute, to let Jack settle down, the bird hopped up silently and swiftly and gave the dog's tail a cruel nip. That was too much. With a howl of pain Jack turned upon his tormentor, and crow No. 2, who had been patiently awaiting this opportunity, swooped down upon the bone and carried it off.

You never saw a dog wear a look of such abject humiliation as Jack wore when he recognized how he had been fooled.—Illustrated Christian Weekly.

A RECLUSE IN NAME ONLY

One of the brightest, most accomplished and best loved young girls of all those in her school and society circles, at the age of seventeen was so terribly injured in a street-car accident that she has ever since been closely confined not only to the same house and chamber, but to the self-same bed; and forty-two years is what "ever since" means. During these years of tantalizing isolation she has seen her young girl friends successfully completing their different school courses, and coming out well equipped for spheres of active usefulness in the world, while the same slowly moving, relentless years marked her own exiled on going from joyous, elate girlhood to dwarfed and aimless womanhood.

Meantime, too, she has lost by death nearly all her near relatives and friends: father, mother, brothers, sisters, aunts and uncles; and of nieces and nephews only one remains.

Most tenderly cared for during many of the first years of her illness by an aunt but little older than herself, who gave up an eligible marriage engagement for the duties of a voluntary nurse, there followed a well-nigh insupportable anguish when this dear aunt, too, was taken away, as also, later, the most devoted and dearly loved of her physicians.

There are things of such exceptional interest in her case that many have taken the opportunity to call upon her.

"And what did you find?" asked a friend of one who had thus called, not from curiosity, but to express his sympathy.

"I found an animating and most spiritually elevating surprise awaiting me," he answered. "First, on the negative side, no trace of impatience or objection, no hint of murmuring or complaining, no finding fault with any person or any thing, no charging Providence with having cruelly darkened her life at the very crisis of her fondest and most eager anticipations.

"On the positive side, a spirit of complete trust in God, and of thanksgiving for a spared life and for the blessings still bestowed upon her; a lively interest in the news of the day and a readiness to join in any proposed subject of conversation; heart-fellowship with her friends in their good or ill fortunes, finding solace for herself in counseling and consoling those in trouble; and all enlived by such a genial humor and quickness of witty repartee as made conversation with her at once a privilege and a delight."

"After nearly forty-two years of prostration and suffering, can I be resigned, peaceful and happy?" the invalid said to her visitor, repeating the question after him. Then she answered in this way: "Yes, 'My faith looks up to Him,' undaunted, never questioning, and at peace. I go plodding on, keeping my eye ever upward, looking for the light and the dawn which, some day, will come to me. I still have patience, although the heart sometimes grows lonely with longing to see my loved ones; then I cry out, 'O Lord, how long, how long!' I am so happy to know that I do not rebel or question; I know that He doeth all things well. Can I not be strong under these conditions? For my part, I never could see how it is that some people make such recluses of themselves!"

Four-year-old Allen: "Mamma, did you know that there are four people who never tell lies?"

Mamma: "No, I didn't know that. Who are they?"

Allen: "Well, there's God, and George Washington, and Abraham Lincoln, and me."

MR. RIIS AS PREACHER

Mr. Jacob A. Riis was speaker at the Sunday Evening Club last Sunday, and ventured to "preach" just like a Methodist exhorter. He told the vast assembly of his own conversion under Rev. Ichabod Simmons, a Methodist preacher of Brooklyn, N. Y., who to Jacob's spoken wish for entering the ministry replied: "No, Jacob, you cannot preach, you can write. God asks you to consecrate your pen." To this consecration Mr. Riis declared he had honestly tried to be faithful. He then told in very simple but graphic terms the story of a comrade of his who, starting life with the brightest promise, ended as drunkard and suicide. His trouble, Mr. Riis said, was that he "lacked backing"; this backing, he continued, was just what all men needed, and it was to be found only in God.—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

"As I approve of a youth that has something of the old man in him, so I am no less pleased with the old man that has something of the youth."

"We do not count a man's years until he has nothing else to count."

"Age is opportunity no less
Than youth itself, though in another dress.
And as the evening twilight fades away,
The sky is filled with stars, invisible by day."

"The spring, like youth, fresh blossoms doth produce,
But autumn makes them ripe and fit for use;
So age a mature mellowness doth set
On the green promises of youthful heat."

Our Sunday school is still good and trust it will still continue to be, for there is a great deal to be gotten out of the lessons we are passing over now.

We expect to have children's exercises next Sunday night; hope it will be successful. Everybody invited to come and help send the gospel to the poor heathen who have not the opportunity that we have.

HAWKINS CHAPEL, LITTLETON CIRCUIT.

Children's day was held here the second Sunday in August. The children did their part well. We had a good short address from our pastor. We thank the people for help in the singing and Miss Susie Luckis for the music. There was a large congregation. The church was full and more outside than there were in the church. In the afternoon our revival service began with Bro. Curry pulpit help. His sermons were good. It was meat and bread to the hungry souls and many were filled. The Christian people worked. We were so glad to see our Sunday school boys and girls coming into the church, accepting Jesus Christ as their personal Savior. The church has been revived and twenty-two souls have started toward the heavenly land. Twenty-two have united with the church. We learned to love Bro. Curry during his short stay with us. Our meeting closed Thursday afternoon.

SHOALS CHURCH, PINNACLE AND MT. ZION CT.

Our special meeting began the second Sunday in August. Were glad to have with us on Sunday our editor, Bro. McCulloch, who preached an excellent sermon. Come again. Bro. D. R. Williams came on Monday and remained till the meeting closed on Friday. Had good sized congregations, good preaching, and a good meeting. About six or eight professions and eight joined the church besides one who transferred his name from another circuit.

Our people and community in general enjoyed Bro. Williams's preaching and would be delighted to have him come again.

HOPE, SILER CITY CIRCUIT.

Our revival began at Hope Church the second Sunday in this month, with two services on Sunday and three a day after Sunday until Wednesday night, when the meeting closed.

The congregation was not as large as usual on account of services at several other churches around, and several were kept away Sunday and Monday on account of the death and burial of Mrs. Willie Evans, who died almost suddenly at her home Saturday night and was buried at Sandy Pond Monday. However, Bro. Bowman gave us two good sermons Sunday and Monday Bro. Millaway, of Greensboro, arrived and began preaching to us, and he certainly gave us some helpful sermons. The members were greatly strengthened, several conversions were made and four were added to the church.

THE CHILDREN'S HOME.

All at the Home were made glad when they received the nice black horse which Mr. C. D. Benbow, Greensboro, N. C., had donated to the Home. It was a most acceptable gift. We were in need of a horse and it came at a most opportune time. It is just the horse we need at this time. The boys can plow it, haul with it, and drive it to town, and none of us are ashamed to ride behind it. All interested in the Home appreciate the generous gift very much.

Miss Martha Parsons, superintedent of the Sunday school, Mitchell's Grove, invited us to come and take part in the Mother's Day program. Through the kindness of Mr. Larkin Kivett some of the family were conveyed to the church. It was a pleasant occasion. There was a liberal offering for the Home, after which a bounteous dinner was served to us.

We reached the Home too late to plant a garden and any vegetables that can be used in any home will be appreciated.

BRO. KENNETT'S PROPOSITION.

I want to say amen to Bro. Kennett's proposition in last week's Herald. For some time I have been thinking that we ought to do something to increase our superannuate fund, and have been wanting some one to open the question through the Herald. Now that Bro. Kennett has done so, I trust that his proposition my be heartily received. By all means we ought to have a larger invested superannuate fund, and if the propeer plan can be devised, I believe we can have it. Our people will put their money into the church if they can see that it is not going into a hole, and certainly when it goes into the superannuate fund society it does not go into a hole, but becomes a permanent paying investment for the church.

I, therefore, heartily endorse Bro. Kennett's proposition. Let's raise our invested fund to $10,000. We have now invested at 6 per cent. interest $2, 640. Let's raise it to $10,000. To do this, I hereby agree to pay one one-hundredth part of my salary annually, provided enough of the brethren will do likewise to make the undertaking worth while. I am sure, too, that a number of our laymen can be induced to make yearly payments to this cause and that they would really be glad to do it if they felt that there was enough in it to make it worth while. What do you say, brethren, to this proposition? If some one else has a better plan for raising the amount named, I am ready to give it my hearty support. By all means let's do something along this line. I hope that somebody will write on this subject if it is only to oppose it.

HOW TO GET PEOPLE TO CHURCH

"A short time ago," says Dr. John Balcom Shaw, one of the successful ministers of Chicago, "we sent out two hundred and fifty postal cards to the new members of the church reminding them of the next communion and asking them to be present." In answer to the question, whether he found it necessary to use any sensational methods to get people to church, he said, "No, we never do anything of a sensational character. We have, of course, our deacons at the door to receive the people. We try to create an atmosphere of goodwill and fellowship. We give a sincere welcome when we see people enter the door. But we not only shake hands at the door with the people coming and going, but we create a genuinely cordial atmosphere.

We have a dignified service. The Gospel is preached in its simplicity; and after the close of every service, I conduct a congregational Bible class directly in front of the pulpit, in which the most practical questions are asked and answered.

How do we get the people to join the church? We go after them. We secure their names in a multitude of ways. Then we visit them. Do you see this envelope here? taking up a large one resting on his desk and taking out numerous slips of paper. "These contain the names of hundreds of new people we wish to bring into the membership of the church. We visit them. We visit them again. We keep right after them one way and another; and the people like it. Recently, when I was in Sioux City for a few days, I wrote forty letters to different people to whom I made a plea to join us at our next communion."

This, he says, is nothing new. It is as old as the Church itself, and he believes it is much better than some of our modern methods. Emotional evangelistic meetings, great campaigns, brotherhoods and movements do not begin to compare in results with this personal work. It is the personal touch that wins men.—Reformed Church.

THE STINGIEST MAN.

The minister's pale little wife grew more nervous still. She had only lately recovered from a severe illness.

Sunday-school was over, and the organist had not yet made her appearance. Pretty, light-haired, thoughtless Kate Wallace held the position, but she came only when fancy or inclination prompted. Consequently in her absence some one had to take her place, and that "some one" was always the minister's wife.

The congregation were filing into their seats—still no organist. It was almost time to begin. Finally the minister's little wife turned again. Old Matthew Gordon, who sat next to her, looked at her.

"Ain't over that sick spell yet, are you?" he said somewhat gruffly. "You're nervous."

The minister's anxious little wife tried to smile. "Am I? I'm so sorry, but the fact is, I keep hoping Kate Wallace will not fail to come to-day."

"Why?"

"Oh, she plays so much better than I do."

Matthew Gordon shook his white head. "She does not," he answered promptly.

"Thank you, Mr. Gordon, but you see, though I have a good musical education, I —I have no piano, and being without one, miss the practice that is so necessary. That is what worries me about playing in public."

Old Matthew Gordon looked at her. He remembered suddenly how little there was in the parsonage parlor. Only a couple of chairs, and a table, and a few pictures. He remembered how pitifully small the salary was, and that it was never promptly paid. "No piano!" Of course, there was no piano!

And yet, as he looked at her, he saw nothing but sweetness on the pale face. There was no bitterness there, no unrest, no lines of discontent. Evidently she did not mind being the wife of an underpaid minister; bless her!

He looked at her slender, well-shaped hands, real musician's hands, and he wondered why it had never come to him before, all that she was missing. The manufactories were turning out thousands and thousands of pianos every year, and yet, for this sweet, delicate, musical woman there was none. He was a close man himself. He gave little away to charities of any kind. He had the name of being the stingiest man in the whole village. He was gruff, he was taciturn; he was not always polite, and he loved his money, and the accumulating of it.

The minutes dragged, and still no organist; then, with a last look at the clock, the minister's little wife smiled a good-bye to the white-haired old man in the pew beside her, and went up into the choir.

Matthew Gordon listened, and he thought to himself that he had never heard her play so well. Somehow his soul rose on wings when she struck the chords of "A charge to keep I have,

A God to glorify,
A never dying soul to save,
And fit it for the sky."

Somehow, as she played the old hymn so grandly, he forgot his sordidness and his love of money, and then it came to him what he would do.

She played the hymns, two of them, and one solo. The minister rose to begin his sermon.

It was the third day afterward. The minister, coming home from a call upon old Mrs. Tulliver, who was sick, and who lived in the country, heard some one playing as he opened his gate.

He stopped. He was at the wrong house, of course—they had no piano! But no, there was the familiar little scarlet geranium in the window, the same curtains

He opened the door, and went in. There in the poor, plain little room that had held only two simple chairs and a table, stood a beautiful piano with shining keys, and before it sat his wife.

Somehow he had not realized before what a wonderfully sweet face she had. Just now it was radiant.

She saw him, and ran to meet him. "Something beautiful has happened," she cried. "Some one has given me a piano! It has been so long since I could practice," she went on, "playing over all my old music."

Her voice broke. "I don't believe I was ever so happy in my life!"

The minister went over and looked at it, touched it, struck a note. Tears came to his eyes. "It is lovely—lovely, Ruth," he said slowly. "Now tell me the name of this 'some one' who has done this?"

For answer his wife put a card in his hand.

He read it, and started. "Matthew Gordon!" he cried; "Matthew Gordon!" The close, austere, old man who attended his church, and who gave to it so sparingly! He could not believe his eyes.

"Ruth," he added, "this is a miracle. He is the last man in the world I would ever have credited with such an act as this—the last."

His little wife looked at him. Her eyes were full of tears. "How little we know," she said softly; and then she added: "Somewhere in the Bible it says: 'The first shall be last, and the last first'—doesn't it?" she said solemnly.—Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

FOREST NOTES.

—Twenty-two states, including Hawaii, now employ state foresters.

—A 115-foot lookout tower on the Sitgreaves national forest, Arizona, just constructed by forest officers, was built entirely of logs and without the use of hoisting machinery other than ropes and tackle blocks.

—In an experimental test track near Janesville, Wis., an inspection just made showed that hemlock and tamarack ties put in the track without preservative treatment were decayed after 5½ years' service. Those which had been treated were practically as good as when first laid.

—Light burning of underbrush to remove forest litter had been practiced in India, with the idea that it improves conditions for teak growing. Now after long investigations forest officials there say that the fires are harmful, that full fire protection must be extended everywhere, and that to be really effective this protection must be continuous.

DENTON HIGH SCHOOL

——OPENS SEPTEMBER 1, 1913——

DENTON is situated on the Piedmont hills of Davidson County twenty miles South from Thomasville on the Carolina and Yadkin River Rail Road. This Railroad connects us with the Southern at Thomasville and High Point on the north and with the Southbound at High Rock on the South. About 350 yards west from the depot on Salisbury Street, nestling among a beautiful grove of oaks, is the home of Denton High School.

OUR COURSE OF STUDY prepares for any College, also for our State University. We give each student personal atention and do everything necessary for their comfort and advancement. A thoroughly competent teacher has been employed for the Music Department, and those who take this course will receive special attention. A High School Business Course will be taught free of charge as to tuition. Special work in Pedagogy for those who intend to teach.

FREE TUITION to ministerial students and children of the ministers of the North Carolina Conference. Cost of all necessary expenses for a year ranges from $115 to $145. We board students in good private homes. Indigent young men can get rooms and board themselves at actual cost. If any one wishes to pay a part or even all expenses by work, write the Principal for particulars. The school uses water from deep drilled wells with pumps, which eliminates all danger from germs in the water. Pure air, pure water, plenty of work; if these do not give health to the student, he will never have it. Write the Principal at Denton, N. C., for any further information.

SINS OF OMISSION.

We are sometimes led to believe that our sins of omission are greater than our sins of commission. We suppose that to every thinking mind who can realize what great value to place upon the proper improvement of our time and talents, the question often arises, Am I living right? Am I discharging faithfully the many obligations that devolve upon me environed as I am with so many opportunities for making this sinning, sorrowing old world better and happier? And how often do we realize what a fearful thing it is to live. Dying is only the closing of life's drama. It is not such a sad thing to die if only we have lived right. How grand, how glorious to pass from scenes of strife and confusion to be forever with Jesus in the realms of eternal rest, but to enjoy that rest we must not be idle here. There are so many lonely aching hearts all about us, their burdens so heavy to bear, that we might quickly relieve. There are enemies to forgive and let them know that we have forgiven them freely and fully; for our probation is short, it will soon be ended. A good and great man has said, "To know the will of God and not to do it is unspeakably awful." And a consecrated Christian lady said when she was taken suddenly and severely ill and thought she was about to pass to the great Beyond, her great regret was not that she had sinned, for she was sure the blood of Jesus had availed for her pardon, but she mourned that she had done so little to alleviate human woe. Oh, let us tell to those about us that there is still a balm in Gilead, that there is still a great Physician there ready and waiting to heal all our sins and sorrows.

A man without hands is at a great disadvantage. Last Sunday we saw a handless man preach. He managed to hold the hymn book and turn the leaves with a stub of his left arm. The right arm seems to be entirely gone. His hands were drawn into a cane-mill, we believe, when he was a boy. He deserves credit for his accomplishments. He is not only a good preacher, but he is president of one of the leading colleges for women in our State, Meredith College, in Raleigh. He is Rev. R. T. Vann and preached in the First Baptist Church, Greensboro, last Sunday morning and evening.

Elon College

For Both Men and Women

Elon College, North Carolina

For a quarter century Elon College has rendered the best families of the South a paragon service in providing young men and young women with the best mental, moral and physical training under positive Christian influences, tho entirely free from sectarianism.

Karl Lehman, of Boston, testifies that "of all the Colleges I have visited as International Field Secretary of Christian Endeavor during six years, the spirit of Elon College appeals to me as most genuinelu Christian." Elon College is situated in the delightful hill country, a section unsurpassed for beauty, with a climate far-famed for its healthfulness. There is no medical fee, for there is no necessity for it. Its campus, comprising twenty-five acres of native oak and hickory, shrubbery, winding walks and driveways, is one of the most beautiful in the South and, with its two unsurpassed gymnasia, provides abundant opportunity for recreation and relaxation.

The splendid equipment of Elon College was only made possible through liberal endowment. It maintains seven elegant new buildings, especially designed and appointed for college work. These are furnished with every known convenience; steam heat, electric lights, running water, baths and sewerage. The College plant is conservatively valued at $300,000.00.

Elon College is distinctly a high-grade institution, though its charges are moderate. Its graduates are admitted to the graduate departments of all the great universities without examination. Its literary and scientific courses are arranged in various departments which lead to the degrees of Master of Arts, Bachelor of Arts, Bachelor of Science, Bachelor of Philosophy, Bachelor of Pedagogy, and a three-years' course leading to the degree of Licentiate of Instruction, designed especially for teachers. This institution affords special opportunities for training in Piano, Voice, Expression, Fine Arts, Normal Training, Physical Culture and Commercial Practice.

The Faculty consists of twenty-one specialists; men and women selected not only for their superior teaching ability, but also for their exemplary character and manners.

The student body numbers nearly four hundred and comes from thirteen states.

The lowest Rates in the South, only $131 to $191 per College session of ten months. Fall Term always opens the first Wednesday in September. For full descriptive catalogue and view-book, address

MEETING OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

The regular annual meeting of the Executive Committee of the Methodist Protestant Church was held in the Pittsburgh Life Building in the city of Pittsburgh, on July 24-25, 1913.

In this building are the new quarters of the Methodist Recorder and the Book Rooms.

The first session was called to order at 10 o'clock, a. m. by the chairman, Rev. Lyman E. Davis, President of the General Conference, who conducted religious exercises. The members of the committee present besides the chairman were, Rev. Rev. W. W. Lineberry, D. D., of Indiana, Rev. D. C. Coburn, D. D., of Ohio, Mr. F. F. Bryerly, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. R. T. Pickens, of North Carolina. Those of the comittee who did not attend were Rev. T. H. Lewis, D. D., of Maryland, and Mr. T. E. Hodges, of West Virginia. Mr. Hodges sent a letter stating that unexpected business matters prevented his leaving home in time to reach the meeting the first day therefore he would not be present. The presidents of annual conferences and educational institutions, and representatives of the Boards and a few visiting brethren composed an interesting gathering. Letters from several presidents expressed regrets at not bing able to attend.

At this point I will say that some of the conference presidents do not attend these meetings because their conference has not expressed any desire to this effect. When the annual conferences come to a full appreciation of the importance of the work to be done at these anual meetings they will not only authorize their presidents to go and participate, but will make some provision to defray the expense. Even the officers and leaders in our church have hitherto had too little intercommunication and association with each other to fully appreciate the value thereof, and the measure of our growth and influence cannot be greatly enlarged without a close fraternal relation and sympathetic cooperation at this point. Segregated and largely independent organizations like our conferences must have a point of contact through which may flow the life currents and inspiring impulses gathered from the whole body in order to reach that height for which the church was destined.

The increasing volume of business brought to the committee makes it imperative that more time be given for holding the sessions. So, it was decided hereafter to begin earlier in the week.

Reports from Boards and Institutions were taken up first. Rev. Haddaway, of Baltimore, was present as a special representative of the Young People's Work and reported for Rev. Hubbell who is in Europe. Dr. T. H. Lewis, President of Western Maryland College, sent written report of that institution stating he was not able to attend. Rev. Geo. R. Brown, Secy-Treas. of the Board of Ministerial Education, reporting therefor requested that the assessment for the support of the work in that department be the same as last year. Mr. Pierpont, representing the Board of Publication, reported the consummation of financial plans that greatly increased the income of the Board. Rev. Mr. Broomfield made report for the Board of Foreign Missions representing Dr. Klein who is in Europe. Dr. Anthony, President of Adrian College, was present and reported for that institution. The Board of Home Missions reported through its Secy-Treas., Dr. C. H. Beck, and asked that the assessment be not less than last year. Westminster College, located at Tehuacana, Texas, submitted a report by letter from the president, J. C. Williams, and agent, T. L. Garrison. The Methodist Protestant Book Concern sent a printed copy of former report to the Maryland Conference. Mrs. D. S. Stephens, Cor. Secy. of the Women's Foreign Missionary Society, sent a written report. A letter from Rev. T. J. Ogburn was read by the Secretary. Dr. Hess, President of West Lafayette College, and Dr. Stephens, Chancellor of Kansas City University and Dr. Elderdice, President of Westminster Theological Seminary, were present and reported for their respective institutions. These reports were all interesting and many of them elicited general discussion. The interest manifested by all present in the general work of the church and the methods and means of accomplishing best results was greatly appreciated by the committee and does much to lighten the task of the members when they go into executive session. Some maters of importance had to be deferred to another meeting.

There was before the committee at its session in 1912 manuscripts setting forth new forms of reports to annual conferences and for church register, and quarterly conference register and record book, prepared by Dr. J. McD. Radford, by virtue of an order of the last General Conference, and these were referred to a special committee composed of the ministerial members of the committee to report to this session. They reported progress but not ready to report in full. Thereupon, the committee was continued with instruction to report to the next meeting. These manuscripts represent much work by Dr. Radford and deserve careful consideration which the special committee report they have not been able to give owing to the members being widely scattered.

Upon the question of personal appeals to the congregations throughout the church by agents and representaties of the Boards a general discussion revealed the prevailing opinion that repeated appeals in person followed by collection are not best, and appeals and special requests not made in order to raise the full assessment laid are to be discouraged. The committee took this view notwithstanding pressing needs in certain departments, but the resolutions are not in my hands at this time, and I will not attempt to quote from memory.

There are other matters of interest I would mention, but this cummunication is growing to too great length.

An hour was set apart for the discussion of he question of "union". The remarks were interesting and instructive, and the time allotted was fully taken up.

THE PASTOR AND SOUL-SAVING.

By Rev. S. W. Taylor at Pastors' Conference.

Follow me and I will make you fishers of men.. Matt. 4: 19.

These words of our Lord to the two fishermen on the Sea of Galilee indicate his idea for the Christian pastor. He is to be a fisher of men. Whether he is an evangelistic preacher or whether his work is along other lines in the Master's kingdom the ultimate aim of his endeavor must be to save sinners. "The Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost" is the way the Master defines his mission to the world, and having committed that which he began to those whom he has saved to be his ambassadors, their mission must also be "to seek and to save the lost."

In the discussion of this subject, so vital to us as pastors, five things are to be considered in this paper; the obligation, the opportunity, the equipment, the method, the reward.

1. The Obligation.

I need not, and I do not, speak of the obligation upon us as Christian ministers to be soul savers by way of calling to our minds any new truth. Every pastor who has heard the divine voice calling him to his holy work, knows that he is called to be a soul winner. He recognizes that his business is to catch men. It is not, therefore, to point out a duty that I speak on this point, but rather to lay more heavily upon our hearts that that we already recognize as an essential feature of our work. Whatever else may crowd in upon our thought and make demands upon our time as rightly belonging to us as Christian ministers, we must not forget that we are "fishers of men", that our high calling is to save the lost and that nothing is to side-track us from this divinely appointed work. And yet I am afraid that we do forget. We do our work in a way. We fill our appointments, visit our people some, go to see the sick, hold special meetings once a year,, and in November go up to Conference feeling that we have done fairly well. But honest, now, have we? Have we done well? Have our hearts been burdened very heavily with the weight of souls, and have we carried about with us in a deep and abiding sense that great and awful truth that God has called us to be real soul winners, and that every gift that we possess and every power that we can command is to be used for that one end?

In a conversation with a brother pastor in Winston a few nights ago on the needs and the opportunities for evangelism in that city, I said to him, "We pastors are playing at our work." I believe that is true, and yet I think that the pastors of that city are as zealous and as devoted as those of any other city. My statement in regard to them is applicable to all of us. The tremendous importance of our high calling is not a burning reality with us and we are not impelled in our work by the awful fact that immortal souls are at stake and that we are called to save them. We need to pray here together that God will lay heavily upon our hearts a sense of our mission and make us to feel continually that we are called into the ministry for the one great purpose of winning souls for our Lord and Master.

2. The Opportunity.

Here again I need not dwell. In every community, in nearly every home and in almost every congregation the unsaved are to be found, many of them, and perhaps most of them are indifferent, but some are interested and really want to be saved. Here is the pastor's opportunity. His work is to arouse the indifferent and to teach those who are already aroused. In this as in other things the Master is both example and inspiration. His opportunity at one time was on the sea shore with a boat for his pulpit and vast multitude of eager hearers for his audience. At another time it was at the well near Sychar, with no audience but a woman covered with shame. Whenever an ear was open or a soul was hungering for the truth, that was His opportunity. So is it ours.

"Every day is a possibility
Of doing things for Christ;
Every hour an opportunity
Whose value is unpriced."

3. The Equipment.

I come now to what I regard the essential requisite to soul winning. There may be a deep sense of responsibility and opportunities may abound, but if the pastor is lacking in equipment, he can not be a successful soul winner. This is just as essential to him as tools are to the workman who constructs a great building. Permit me, therefore, to call your attention to four things that I regard as indispensable to the equipment of a soul winning pastor.

1. The Genius of Work.—No lazy preacher will ever be a soul winner. This fact is poetically expressed by Horatius Bonar in the following beautiful and impressive words:

"Go labor on while it is day,
The world's dark night is hastening on.
Speed, speed they work! cast sloth away!
It is not thus that souls are won."

Jesus was the most tireless worker the world ever saw. Peter was full of energy and enthusiasm. Paul put into his ministry the same energetic, tireless spirit that characterized him as a persecutor of the church. All men, great or small, known or unknown, who win souls must be workers. It takes energy, zeal, steadfastness, the never-give-up spirit to beat back the forces of sin and save the lost. A young pastor said to me a few days ago, "A pastor's life is a busy one." He had learned early in his experience what is true or ought to be true of every pastor. It is, indeed, a busy life, and if the "Genius for work" is lacking, much that ought to be done will be neglected. It takes work to prepare and deliver sermons, and I suspect that some we preach and call sermons would be much more worthy the name if they represented more work. It takes work to plan our work, and work to work our plans. Both physically and mentally the pastor must be a worker. In fact, it seems to me that no field of activity makes heavier demands on one's time and strength than does the ministry, and nowhere is there a more complete failure when these demands are not met. The pastor, therefore, who would be a soul winner must have the "Genius of work."

2. Knowledge of the Bible.—I do not think that any pastor can be a successful soul winner who does not know the Bible. I do not mean that he must have a knowledge of Hebrew and Greek and be able to read the Bible in these languages. He may know the Bible so far as soul winning is concerned without this. What I mean is that he must be able to bring the "sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God" to bear upon the unsaved to convict them of sin and then he must be able to lead them in a scriptural way to Jesps for pardon and peace. I think that it is often the case that we confuse the mind of the anxious inquirer and darken the way by requiring them to fulfil conditions that are imposed not by God but by man. In getting the sinner to Christ the Word is to be our guide and we need and must have, if we are successful soul winners, a proper and clear understanding of the scriptural way of being saved. My observation is that people will listen to what the Bible says and be impressed by that when all the eloquence and persuasive force of men fails. We ought, therefore, to know the Bible, our minds ought to be stored with scriptural passages that teach the way of salvation, and we ought to be able to present these teachings with such clearness and force as to carry to the mind of the enquirer their full illuminating and convincing power.

The Bible is also our means of convincing the unsaved of "sin and of righteousness and of judgment to come". We are to preach the Word. It is the "sword of the Spirit" by which the man of sin is slain. We must be able therefore to bring the teachings of the Bible to the attention of the sinner and to lay them on his conscience with a force born of the conviction that they are the declarations of the God of heaven, declaring the facts of sin, God's love for the sinner, and the awful doom of the unrepentant.

3. A knowledge of men.—It is one thing to know the Bible and be able to put its teachings into our sermons, so that we may go to our pulpits on Sunday with a message out of God's Book; it is altogether another thing to go out Monday morning into the midst of the multitude and know from actual contact with them their thoughts, and the problems and cares and temptations and joys and hopes of their hearts. I can no more minister intelligently and helpfully in spiritual things, unless I know the people to whom I minister, than the physician can minister to the needs of the body till he has seen his patient and made a correct diagnosis of the disease. There is as much justification in the physician ministering to his patients from his laboratory as there is in the pastor ministering to his people in spiritual things from his study. We must know our people if we are to help them by our ministry, and the only way that we can know them is to come in actual contact with them. Jesus was this kind of preacher. He knew men. He threw himself into the midst of the multitude and learned life at its center.

4. A knowlege of God.—What other qualifications the Christian pastor may possess, if he lack this, he can not be a soul winner. Like the Apostle Paul, he must be able to say, "I know Him" and out of that personal heart experience he must speak as one that has authority. Without this personal heart knowledge of Jesus Christ his message from the pulpit will be as "sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal," and his personal appeals, if he makes any, will lack the warmth of love, the intensity of enthusiasm, and the note of personal assurance that convinces and wins. "I know Him," must be the affirmation of every pastor in this presence if ours is to be a soul winning ministry.

4. The Method.

Most of us present at this conference, I suspect, have one method that we rely upon for soul winning, viz., the revival meeting. Once a year at each of our churches we make special effort to get the unsaved converted. This is well. Most of us, I suspect, were converted at such meetings. But there is a danger, I think, of depending too exclusively on the special meeting. First, there is the danger that we as pastors will confine our efforts in behalf of the unsaved to the special meeting; and second, there is the danger of teaching the unsaved that they are to wait till the special meeting in July or August in order to be saved. We lay great stress at the special meeting on such passages as "Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation", and yet all through the year we have been virtually saying to the unsaved, "Wait till the special meeting." I believe in the special meeting, but I also believe that it is a mistake to defer all active evangelistic effort till that time. Many may and will be dead before then. In my own work I am making every Sunday night service evangelistic. The unsaved are urged then and there to give up sin and accept Christ before men as a pesronal Savior. I am not satisfied to do otherwise, and the results have justified the wisdom of such services. This may not be practical on some fields, but where it is I believe it should be done.

Another method of reaching the unsaved is by personal work. Our Savior employed this method effectively. The Twelve were won by personal contact. "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?" was the Master's personal and direct appeal to Peter. Mary sat at his feet and learned the way of life. The woman of Sychar was his only auditor when he declared the greatest fact of his ministry, "I that speak unto thee am He." These are examples that illustrate what was a prominent and fruitful method in the Master's work. Every pastor, like his Master, should be a personal worker. It may be a difficult thing to undertake. Some of us are timid and fearful of our ability to say the right thing or make the personal appeal in the right way. And this feeling is not altogether without foundation. We recognize that personal work must be done tactfully, and if not wisely done, may result in more harm than good. We do not want to make the mistake of one minister of whom I have heard. He was interested in the salvation of a certain man in his town and on passing him on opposite sides of the street would point up by way of saying to his friend, "I want you to be a Christian and go to heaven." That kind of personal work, I dare say, is never profitable. But it may be done so that it is profitable and we ought to school ourselves in this kind of evangelism. After all, every thing does not depend on us. God will add his blessing to our imperfect efforts and make them result in much for his glory.

5. The Reward.

Soul saving is not a money making business. We are not paid so many dollars for so many souls. The work of a minister of the Lord Jesus is not priced in this way, neither is the worth of a soul determined in money values. Our reward, therefore, will not be the money that we receive for our labor, and yet my brethren, I believe that our Heavenly Father will take care of us in this particular if we are faithful in that which is committed to us. His word for it, "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness and these things shall be added unto you." But our reward will be far richer and more enduring than these temporal things. We shall have the strength, the peace, the gladness that comes from the consciousness of divine approval; we shall share in the joy of the angels when sinners repent; we shall go home, when our work is finished, to receive the "Well done" of the Master and to enter upon that heritage, "incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away."

THE RELIGIOUS PRESS

In last week's Herald, in his address on The Religious Press, Dr. McCulloch says:

"At our last General Conference a motion was made to combine the Methodist Protestant and Methodist Recorder into one paper. It does seem somewhat distracting to have two general organs. It seems like the effort to serve two masters. But we think there is a misconception in the case that causes all the trouble. While it is impossible to serve two masters, there is no difficulty at all in having the service of two servants. A man with two heads would be a most uncomfortable monstrosity, but a man with two hands can get along very well with both of his hands and find no conflict between them. Church papers are servants, not masters. We think it would be a great mistake to abolish either the Methodist Protestant or the Methodist Recorder, though it might not be a mistake to make a definite division of territory either by general conference or annual conference action so that pastors in the border conferences would be freed from embarassment."

As I had the honor of writing and offering to the General Conference the resolution in regard to the consolidation of the two general organs, I feel that I should be permitted the privilege of defending the resolution. Before going to the General Conference I took some pains to get statistics in regard to the circulation of the church papers. I found:

1st—That the Methodist Recorder had but one paid subscriber in North Carolina.

2nd—That the Methodist Protestant had 135 subscribers in North Carolina and that about one-fifth of these were ministers and preachers. This means that hardly one-half of our ministers and preachers were reading the Methodist Protestant, and not more than two reading the Recorder.

3rd—That only about five copies of the M. P. Herald go within the bounds of the Maryland Conference.

All this means that the people of N. C. know only about the church in N. C., except 135 who know about the Maryland Conference, and perhaps two something about the Western Conferences by reading the Recorder. The N. C. Conference is hardly known beyond our own borders. One general organ would remedy this very much.

Editor McCulloch says above, "There is no difficulty at all in having the service of two servants." Here I think the editor "falls down." Most of us are too poor to have two servants and most of those who are not are too stingy to have two. There are very few members who can be induced to take both the Protestant and Recorder. There is hardly any copying from one paper into another, and so one half the church does not know what the other half is doing.

Just at this time when the Western Conferences are eager to get us into the United Brethren Church our people who do not read both papers can not keep posted as to the true status of the union movement. Surely one general organ is enough for a church no larger than ours and would be much better than two.

THE PRIMITIVE BAPTISTS

Editor McCulloch says in this address: "I know of no church that does not have its periodicals, unless it be the Primitive Baptists." In this section we have quite a sprinkle of Primitive Baptists, and they prize very highly Zion's Landmark, published in Wilson and edited by Elder P. D. Gold. I think the Landmark has a wide circulation among the Primitive Baptists.

Again Dr. McCulloch says: "I appeal to the pastors of our Conference to use more freely the columns of the Methodist Protestant Herald to awaken in the minds of our people an intelligent appreciation and apprehension of the principles of the Methodist Protestant Church and of the doctrines it holds."

I think he is quite right in this appeal. I have long felt that if our pastors would write more for the paper it would increase both its popularity and its usefulness.

Since writing the above I have referred to the Minutes of the General Conference and find the following in regard to the consolidation of the general organs:

Your Committee on Publishing Interests offers the following report:

1. There have been referred to us reports of the Board of Publication; the reports of the Pittsburgh and Baltimore Directories; a memorial from the Ohio Conference; a resolution introduced by W. F. Kennett and others; and a recommendation from the Maryland delegation; all of which are herewith submitted.

6. While we believe that legal and other complications involved in the proposed consolidation of the General Conference Organs and publishing interests make it impracticable, if not impossible, yet the end sought seems sufficiently desirable to warrant a careful investigation; therefore we recommend that this whole matter be referred to the special committee on the consolidation of the various general interests of the Church already ordered by this Conference, and that that committee shall secure legal advice, and report their findings to the next session of the General Conference.

I believe a very large majority of the members of the General Conference favored the consolidation of the papers.

THE PILGRIM WAY

EMMA A. LENTE

A weary way? Oh, yes; it is but narrow,
And leads up rugged hills, through deserts drear
And forests dark, but we who trace before us
The footprints of the Master need not fear.
A weary way? Oh, yes; but for refreshing
Sometimes we come upon a cooling spring,
And zephyrs wafted from the hills beyond us
Revive our dagging steps, and glad birds sing.
A weary way? Oh, yes; but then at nightfall
We spread white tents of peace, and rest secure,
Knowing that when these tabernacles fail us,
The many mansions shall for aye endure.
A weary way? Oh, yes; through hostile countries,
With manifold temptations on each hand,
But at the end, for those so blest to reach it,
A balm for hurts, a rest, a promised land.

THE NOTABLE WELCOME TO THE RETAIL LIQUOR DEALERS' CONVENTION OF IOWA BY THE WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION OF THAT STATE

GENTLEMEN: A welcome to a city should be representative, and since the welcome accorded your association by the Mayor of Cedar Rapids represents the thought of but a portion of its citizenship, it seems fitting that the entire community should communicate to you its sentiment. Hence, in behalf of those not represented by the Mayor, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union extends this greeting.

It is quite usual in greeting a body to enumerate its acomplishments and tell of its worth and standing. Courtesy to the individual somewhat embarrasses us here. Shall we greet you as those who wreck homes, debauch manhood, prostitute womanhood, disgrace and impoverish childhood? Shall we greet you as those who place upon the taxpayer the heaviest burden in caring for the results of your traffic?

Your position in a community is quite peculiar. We fail to find a city that enumerates among its advantages its saloons. The commercial club of our city advertises our manufacturing plants, our churches, our schools and colleges, but never once have the thirty-two saloons of the city been advertised as a reason for industries to locate here.

It is said by some that you help a town. Do you make better fathers, husbands, sons, and so raise the standard of citizenship? Do you bring comfort and happiness to mothers, wives and children? Do you add to the efficiency of the laborer or business man, and so add to the material prosperity of the place?

Any business is judged by its results. Some time since Cedar Rapids had a Manufacturers' Week. Every business in the city save yours exhibited its wares. Yet your ambition is to be classed as a line of legitimate business. The packing house and Quaker Oats mills showed their splendid products ready to feed the world. The pump manufacturers and wood finishing concerns exhibited their contributions to comfort and esthetic pleasure. The clothing manufacturers gave evidence of prosperity. Did the saloons of Cedar Rapids use their windows or were those of other places loaned to exhibit their finished products? No, you find these in the penitentiary, where eighty-five per cent. of the inmates are your graduates. Seventy per cent. of the insane are others. Ninety per cent. of pauperism is another class. The great burden of private charity is due to the saloon. The taxpayer pays the enormous cost of caring for your product. But only the Father of us all knows the blight of manhood, the shame of womanhood, the wreck of home, the heartbreak of the innocent. Ah, no, gentlemen, you are not welcomed to Cedar Rapids by its homes and social interests.

Yours is not a legitimate business, so declared by the United States Supreme Court. Our stores open at their pleasure, closed only on the day of rest. But in self-defense a community limits you as to times and seasons. If your places of business are so demoralizing that they must be closed on election days and holidays, and so dangerous that they are closed in times of fire, riot or other occasions of excitement, how can a city welcome you at any time?

It is passing strange that the political power you wield can stultify the officials of nation, State and city. But it is not long to be so. Not many more times will you be accorded a welcome to any city. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, with men and women of sober, earnest purpose, is steadily working for that day when the God of heaven shall say to you, "It is enough." You know, with us, that the time is near.

GREAT, WORLD-INFLUENCING, ABIDING

The World's Sunday School Convention which brought together here in Zurich, Switzerland, 2600 delegates from practically all parts of the world, closed last evening under inspiring conditions. I cannot now give details except that the children of Scotland gave £1600 for a Sunday School Secretary in India, $125,000 was given for the Association's work, and plans for advancing the work in many countries were adopted.

The reports of the Commissions to the Mission Fields of the world, the statements by representatives from nearly every land, the informing and heartening addresses by foremost thinkers and workers, the intense interest sustained during the eight days, together with the marked spiritual character of the proceedings, made it a convention great in the reported achievements accomplished for the children of the human race, and in vision, purpose and plan for further conquests throughout the earth.

It was preeminently a convention in behalf of the children and youth of all nations to be reached, saved and trained for service through the missionary operations of the churches of Christendom represented more especially by their Sunday schools.

One could not but be impressed by the fact that the great company of thoughtful people was responsive to the mighty appeals which were presented from so many lands, and that from this high place of privilege and blessing the delegates, with larger vision, higher resolve, and fuller consecration, would carry information, influence and power to their widely scattered schools and churches over the earth to enlist them more heartily in the enterprise which, God-ordained, is the greatest and most beneficent known to men.

The close of such a convention must signalize the inauguration of more aggressive efforts by those who, enriched with the inestimable riches of the Gospel, will find their highest joy in propagating its saving truths.

I count it one of the great privileges of my life to have been permitted to attend this memorable assembly, for it has given me a deeper insight into the work and the coming triumphs of the Kingdom, fired my heart with holier zeal, and fitted me for more effective work in enlisting the whole church in our foreign missionary artivities. More anon.

OUR OWN FOREIGN WORK

Word from home today gives me the gratifying information that the receipts for the first two months of this fiscal year are considerably above those of the same period last year.

Rev. Dr. C. E. Wilbur and Mr. H. J. Heinz have expressed to me here in Zurich only commendation of our excellent corps of workers in Japan, and cordial approval of their important and extensive operations.

The sober judgment of these two brethren who are returning from their great tour around the world as members of the Commission to the Orient, and who had excellent opportunity to look into our Japan work, and took special pains to do so, ought to convince all our people that the work of the Board of Foreign Missions deserves their fullest support as an enterprise whose success has been limited only by the inadequate support which the church has given to it.

It is recognized as an important factor in the religious life and work of that Empire.

Our problem is to have all our own people fully appreciate their personal obligation to give the Gospel to the heathen, and that the success for which we prayed, gave and labored necessarily means that a larger income must be provided for enlargement of the work in Japan largely through native agencies, and for extension into other heathen lands whose great needs are God's call to us.

INTENDENT OF MOUNTAIN MISSIONS

MRS. M. O. EVERETT

Madam President, Dear Sisters and Friends of the Woman's Board of Home Missions of the Methodist Protestant Church:

It is with profound gratitude to the giver of all good, our loving Father in Heaven, that we review the work of the past year. It is He that hath made all our "dreams come true." He has graciously smiled on our society and given us the splendid Orphans' Home in North Carolina and the Industrial School in Pine Ridge, Ky. We should be encouraged to trust Him more and serve Him better with a loving, joyful heart.

The beautiful school building on the mountain top in Kentucky stands as a monument to the consecration and zeal of those who respond to the call of their Lord in behalf of his neglected little ones there.

You are interested and anxious to know all about it, no doubt. It is substantially made of the best material. There are four large, light, well-ventilated school rooms planned with a view to the health and eyes of the pupils. In each room the light comes from four large windows on one side, so the pupil will not face the light and no cross lights or shadows fall on the desks. Two rooms on each side of the hall. A large closet for lunches and wraps, with a window in it, is in each room. There is also ample black-board space.

A wide hall runs the length of the entire building. And from each side of the center of the hall two easy stairways, with hand rails, leads up to the beautiful auditorium, where we hope to have all of you at our next annual Board meeting; where our hopes center for the abiding presence of our God in that room. May the Holy Spirit fill the room, and His Power be mightily felt in the conviction and conversion of sinners and the training of Christians.

This room is large with a high ceiling. Three Sunday school rooms, 15 ft. square, may be made a part of the main room by opening the folding doors. From the middle one of these rooms we go up the narrow winding stairway to the observatory above, the bell tower, surmounted by a flagpole. Here we get a fine view of the forests, farms and near by cliffs and mountains.

We made a makeshift flag to do until some of our kind friends presented us a flag. July 1st we received one sent by Mrs. Mamman of Pittsburgh, Pa., in time for our Fourth of July Celebration.

On the front of the bell tower is to be the name of the school. Mrs. Lizzie Copp, of Richwood, Ohio, made the school a pos sibility by her gift of $2,000, and she was given the privilege of naming the school. It is to be called "The Alven Drew School of Industry" in honor of her father, a teacher and friend of education.

A large, light basement is under the whole house. It is here we expect to have our Manual Training and Domestic Science departments. The girls and women are hoping to have some sewing and cooking classes this summer. If we only had the necessary appliances and time we might do so. The most pleasant room in the building is the southeast Sunday school room, where we had placed shelves for possible gifts of books. The man who put them up said we would never have them filled with books, not in 25 years. But already they are full and books piled around the room on the floor. We have the largest library I have seen in any mountain mission school. The R. I. Ave. S. S. at Washington, D. C., gave us their library of between 300 and 400 volumes, and others have sent gifts of books. Some of our little neighbors are already enjoying the books.

To be able to read and listen to an interesting book is a new and delightful experience of these mountain people, while others will have to be taught to love reading.

We have had several visitors during the year. Dr. Beck and Mrs. Dixon, Mrs. Jones and son Howard, of Washington City, and Miss Eliza Richards, who, as a young girl, had her first experience of mountain mission work along with us in "Ebenezer Home" at Del Rio, Tenn., six years ago. Since then she has been fitting herself for this work of the Lord. She visited at the Hindman School of Industry in Breathitt County last summer, and Miss Pettit told Mr. Harper that she considered her one of the most rarely gifted for this work and she hoped to secure her to take charge of the new W. C. T. U. enterprise at Pine Mt. when she graduates this spring from Dr. White's Bible School in New York City.

We have had very little preaching during the year. Dr. Beck and Mrs. Dixon preached for us, and Bro. Garrison three times and good old Bro. Honaker stirred our souls to their depths by his homely eloquence as he pleaded for his Master to have His way with us. The entreaty and warning, the illustrations and incidents, were original and powerful, backed as they were by the Holy Spirit. A student of Berea School of Industry spent his vacation traveling through the mountains holding revival services as he passed along. He was with us three nights. The young people where he had been followed him and we had very interesting services. There were several conversions and more since as a result of his preaching. An occasional sermon by others. We have had reason to rejoice as we see the steady growth and interest manifested in the S. S. and prayer meeting. Last Sunday the Meadow Branch S. S. visited us in a body, and after S. S. we had a beautiful song service. We have promised to return soon and have Brother Harper preach in Meadow Branch Church. Our school building cost more than we expected; I believe buildings usually do. Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell has been building a "Fisherman's and Seaman's Rest" or Institute at St. John's. He says: "The Institute has cost more than the best architects and committees expected, and to enable us to get out of debt $10,000 is needed badly. In every business when there is no more money the work can stop. All work is seriously hampered if those who have the daily tasks, the real work to do, are constantly in a condition of nerve strain because there is no money. Christ's workers are in physical bodies. Ought we in the Master's business to carry such a strain for lack of letting others know of our needs?"

During the year we have had losses and disappointments. But considering how favorable our Lord has been to us, they should not be mentioned. In the 105th Psalm, speaking of the trials of Joseph in Egypt, in the 19th verse it says "The word of the Lord tried him." So the Lord has tried some of us. It seems to be circumstances or people, but it was really our Lord making us usable and pliable in His hands. This experience has given us a stronger faith, a larger vision, a greater love for our great Lover, who has answered our prayers when there was no other helpers. He has increased our sympathy and tenderness for His helpless and wandering ones, "as sheep without a shepherd on the barren mountains." We solicit your prayers for them. Pray God to send us a mighty revival that they may be prepared for the school He has prepared for them. That we may start right. Pray that the teachers and workers may be filled with the Spirit, with a greater love and patience for the ones they have come to help, and that our church may be aroused to her duty and privilege in helping give the school the support and extension God's Providence points out as His purpose to accomplish.

Our heartfelt gratitude to all who have so generously helped this year with benefits too numerous to mention. May we meet another year—if it is His will—to tell a more wonderful story; not of a building but of a school to His name's honor and glory.

Owing to the illness of my mother I have been unable to prepare this report for publication in the church papers as ordered by the W. B. H. M. at their meeting last May.

Your sister and servant,
Mrs. M. O. Everett.

POPULAR TALKS ON LAW

WHEN THE BANKER CASHES YOUR CHECK

By Walter K. Towers, A. B., J. D., of the Michigan Bar

John Sommers was keeper of the general store at Elmwood. Allan McPherson was owner and head of the Elmwod Savings Bank. The relations between the two men were far from friendly, but as there was no other bank near at hand Sommers maintained a commercial account in McPherson's institution. One Tuesday morning he purchased a load of potatoes from Clyde Webb, a prominent farmer of the vicinity. Sommers paid Webb immediately, giving him a check for twenty dollars properly drawn on his account in the Elmwood Savings Bank. Webb took the check to the bank and presented it to McPherson, who was in the teller's cage.

"What did you do, go and sell that load of potatoes to Sommers?" inquired McPherson.

"Yes; why not?" replied Webb.

"Well, you might have given me a chance at them. You know I'm buying produce, as well as banking."

"That's no reason why I shouldn't sell to John Sommers."

"Well, I'll show you you're a fool to sell to him," angrily asserted the banker. "He paid you with a check, didn't he? And you took it; and it ain't no good at all, see!"

"What's the matter?" asked Webb.

"Why, he's no good financially, and you can't get any money on it."

Webb returned to Sommers, and Sommers hastened to the bank, knowing that his balance stood close to four hundred dollars. After a heated discussion at the bank Sommers traveled to the office of his legal counsellor. As a result action was begun against the banker because of his failure to cash the depositor's proper check, and substantial damages were recovered because McPherson's action had injured Sommers' standing and credit in the community.

This case illustrates what is perhaps the primary duty of the banker to his depositor—to pay all proper checks drawn on him against adequate deposits. If the banker fails to do this, either willfully or through mistake, he must answer to his depositor. If the depositor whose check was wrongfully dishonored suffered any damages he may recover the amount against the banker. Injury to credit and business standing are the damages usually complained of in such cases. The banker is entitled to a reasonable time after presentment in order that he may examine into the state of the account against which the check is drawn. Good bankers have their affairs so arranged that this is a matter of seconds rather than minutes.

When Sommers sued McPherson, McPherson defended his action on the ground that while Sommers did have a balance of about four hundred dollars the bank held Sommers' note for five hundred dollars, which was to fall due within a week. The banker insisted that he had a right to retain Sommers' deposits to insure payment of the note when it should fall due. His position was not justified in law and furnished him with no effective defense. A banker may set-off an indebtedness that is due by the depositor to the bank against the deposit, but he may not set-off one not yet due. Sommers could not be required to pay the note until its maturity, and until then it was not an effective obligation against him.

It not infrequently happens that the holder of a check for say ten dollars, will present it at the bank for payment and discover that the depositor has a balance of but seven. Often the holder of the check would be glad enough to get the proportion that the deposit would cover then and there. But the bank need not make part payment. This is because it is entitled to the check for use as a voucher in settling with the depositor.

When the bank pays a proper check it has a right to charge payment against the depositor. It may be that the bank will choose not to dishonor the check for ten dollars when a balance of but seven remains and will accommodate its depositor by paying the check in full. This is what is known as an "overdraft," and while contrary to the printed rules of most banks is still frequently done in ordinary commercial practice. If the bank allows an overdraft, in effect advancing money for its depositor, it may recover the amount from him.

Bankers do not take time to investigate a depositor's account for every check that is presented to the bank for payment. They depend upon memory, and confidence in the depositor, in many instances. So it sometimes happens that a bank will pay a check under the belief that the signer has an adequate balance on deposit, when such is not the case. On discovering its mistake banks have sometimes endeavored to recover the money paid the person who presented the check, but they have not been successful. In one sense of the word the bank paid under mistake, and mistake is sometimes ground for recovery of money paid, but not by a bank under these circumstances.

Sometimes after a person has signed and delivered a check he wishes to recall his action. He immediately gets in touch with his bank on which the check was drawn and instructs it not to pay that check when it is presented. This is known as "stopping payment." Stopping payment ends the bank's duty and also its right to pay the check when presented. It not only need not pay the check, but it must not pay it. If it disregards its depositor's instructions and pays the check on which payment has been stopped it is the loser as it may not charge that payment against the depositor's account.

A. L. Sullivan owed James P. Long $47.00, but by mistake he filled out the check to James A. Long and mailed it in an envelope addressed to James A. Long, and a James A. Long received it and cashed it at a bank. The bank lost the money it paid out on the check. This was because a bank is bound to make certain that it is paying the check to the proper party. In law the middle initial is not part of a man's name and so the check was payable to James Long.

If there are two persons of the same name it becomes the duty of the bank to pay it to the person of that name who rightfully may receive it. So it is that bankers will cash checks only for responsible parties known to them.

Thus we have illustrated an extreme case under the general proposition that a bank paying a check must do so only to the proper party. If anyone steals or finds a check, or forges an indorsement, and so secures payment from the bank, the bank must stand the loss. If a check has been indorsed in blank, or was drawn in such form that it is payable to bearer, any bearer may receive payment on it and a bank is justified in paying it to any bearer, unless there are some special circumstances to cause it to believe that the bearer is not the rightful owner of the check and not entitled to receive payment on it. When you draw a check payable to "the order of John Smith," you are entitled to the assurance that the bank will pay it to no one other than John Smith or parties to whom he may transfer it by valid indorsement.

Paul Greer, in Chicago, signed a check for $900.00, directing his local bank to "Pay to the order of Leon Young." Leon Young received the check in St. Louis and endorsed it as follows, "Pay to the order of the Copper Exchange Bank, Leon Young." He handed it to his clerk, together with a deposit slip, and told him to take it to the bank and deposit it. The clerk tore up the deposit slip and told the bank teller that Mr. Young wanted the cash. The cash was given to him and that was the last that was heard of the clerk or the $900.00. Again the bank was the loser for the check was endorsed to the bank and not to the clerk, nor in blank by Leon Young so that the bearer might receive the money. If Young had simply written "Leon Young" on the back of the check he would have been the loser. So if you are to send a check to a bank for deposit, and do not trust your messenger absolutely, indorse it to the order of the bank and not in blank —then the bank will not deliver it to the bearer except on your written order.

In the case of forgeries the banker also bears a heavy responsibility. No other checks may be charged against the account of a depositor than those he actually signed, and which have been paid to the proper party. If the bank pays a forged check it is the loser, unless the depositor in some way contributed to the fraud practiced on the bank and so is not in the position of an innocent party. In the case of raised checks the banker also must bear the loss, again with the proviso that the depositor who signed the check in no way contributed to the fraud. If he drew the check so carelessly as to make the fraud possible, or in any way conspired with those who raised the check, his position is not so favorable. We have before noticed that the bank loses if it pays a check to a party not entitled to receive payment of it and that this is true though the fraud be accomplished by a forged indorsement. Of course a bank paying money to a party claiming his rights through a forged indorsement may recover from that person— always provided it can catch him.

Such are the rights of the depositor against his banker. Remember that the banker bears these heavy responsibilities and if in dealing with him he insists that you comply with formalities that to you seem useless remember the strict requirements made on him. Handle all your checks in a business-like manner.

—Beginning August 15, the parcel post service will be extended. The maximum weight will be raised to twenty pounds and rates in the first and second zones will be reduced. The new rate in the first zone will be five cents for the first pound and one cent for each additional two pounds. In the second zone, five cents for one pound and one cent for each additional pound. There will be no change in the size or form of the package admitted.

The Executive Committee passed the following resolution on the subject of union:—

1. We rejoice in the progress made toward union between the Methodist Protestant Church and the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, and are specially glad to find throughout our denomination so favorable a sentiment toward this union.

2. We commend the steps thus far taken in the negotiations of the joint-commission, and we approve of the syllabus adopted at Columbus, subject to such changes as may be agreed upon in the joint convention of the two denominations.

3. We express the hope that, in the final union of the churches, the individuality and autonomy of the annual conferences may be clearly preserved.

4. We endorse the further line of proceedure as outlined by the commission as follows:

1. To overture the annual conferences on the subject of the union, as authorized by the last General Conference.

2. In connection with this overture, to call a special session of the General Conference, as provided by the discipline; this call to take effect at the earliest date possible after a favorable vote by the annual conferences of the two denominations.

3. To leave to our General Conference, and the General Conference of the United Brethren Church, the work of completing and consummating the union so auspiciously begun.

—Rev. W. D. Fogleman is at Mt. Vernon Springs for his health, and hopes to derive benefit, in which hope many friends will join him.

—Rev. J. E. Pritchard and his wife are both in the grasp of malaria. We wonder if they are convinced of the correctness of the late theory that the only way to be infected with malaria is through the bites of mosquitoes. We are not yet convinced that that is the only way. We believe there are other ways, for instance, drinking water, and that people ought to be on their guard against all the ways of malaria. We hope Bro. and Mrs. P. will take quinine enough and not too much to overcome the trouble. Quinine is said to be a specific for malarial poison, one of the very few specifics known to the doctors.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

CALDWELL

I left Asheville on No. 36 for Glen Alpine, Burke County, where I expected Bro. Garmon to meet me; but he made arrangements for Bro. C. E. Devoult to take me to his home, where I met Bro. Garmon and we spent the night. At 8:30 we met the first appointment on this field at Pleasant Grove; not a very large attendance, but orderly and attentive. The membership is small and scattered, and there is not a very encouraging outlook for us in this section.

On the morning of the 18th the pastor and I made a 21 mile drive to his home near Conley Springs. Preaching at Shady Grove at 8:30, I spent the night with Bro. Garmon. This church is near the home of the pastor, and when completed will be a very good church. There seems to be some life and hope here.

Saturday morning we drove to Burk's Chapel, a distance of ten miles. At 11 A. M. there was a nice little audience present for preaching. After service we ate some dinner. This field is a problem. Only three appointments, and they are weak numerically and financially, and no opening so far as I could see or learn of for other profitable appointments to be established to ever have a self-sustaining charge, and it is utterly impossible for any pastor to get a support on this field. He is compelled to supplement in some way, and the most of it is supplemented if I learned things correctly, and I am certain I am in possession of the facts of the situation, for I made it my business to find out. There may be new developments in the future for our cause in this section; if not we had best spend our time, energy and money elsewhere.

Bro. Garmon has been and is doing his best; but no one can do unless they have something to do with. My claim overpaid.

LINCOLN

Bro. J. A. Wright met me at Burk's Chapel and took me to Laurel Hill, where I held Bro. Waldrop's third quarterly conference. There was a good attendance and the conference seemed to be of interest to all in attendance. Bro. W. D. Reed was present and other visitors; glad to have them. Conference over, Bro. R. and I spent the night with Bro. Allwran.

Preached at Laurel Hill 11 A. M., Macedonia 2 P. M., Hebron 5 P. M. Good attendance and helpful servicee I trust at all the churches. Macedonia ought to be painted, and the Hebron people ought to build a new church, and this would be an ideal field as to churches, territory and distance. No appointment over ten miles from the parsonage.

Bess's Chapel has recently been painted and the parsonage partially painted, and steps were taken by the quarterly conference to complete the job. This completed my work west of Greensboro and I am at home taking a few days' rest. Will start east the 6th of August. Claim overpaid on Lincoln. Thanks to Bro. Waldrop and his people for their kindness.

FROM OUR PASTORS

Fallston Circuit.

After a long silence I will write a few lines to let the the readers of the Herald know that I have not been idle all the time. On Saturday before the second Sunday in July I went by request of brethren in Gaston Co. to Carolina School House about midway between Crouse and Bessemer City and preached seven times for them. On Sunday a Sunday school was started with an enrollment of 47, using our literature. They expressed themselves as wanting another meeting some time in the fall when they can see their way clear to organize a Methodist Protestant Society and proceed to build a church. There are 17 M. P.'s in the community and they are some five or six miles from any church of their own. With the limited acquaintance I have of the people and community, I cannot say as to the advisability of trying to organize and build there now, but think I can say later.

On Wednesday night after the second Sunday in July Bro. Honeycutt, of the M. E. Church, South, and I began a special meeting at Lawndale and continued it till Tuesday night after the third Sunday, with no visible results.

On Saturday before the fourth Sunday I held my third quarterly conference at Fallston. We licensed Bro. Joseph D. Morris to preach. I reported making 95 visits, preaching 28 times and holding 2 special meetings and receiving on salary during the last quarter $63.72 and baptizing two children. This meeting was protracted. I had no engaged pulpit help, but I pressed Bro. Morris, whom we licensed on Saturday, into service. He is doing very well as a beginner, being already an acceptable preacher. He has been good help to me. This meeting closed this evening with the result that the church was revived, 8 professions and two accessions, with others to join in the future. Large congregations attended every day and nearly every one present was a member of some church, so there were very few unconverted present.

Bro. Thomas B. Richard, of Lawndale, is delegate elect to Conference, and Bro. R. A. Lackey, of Fallston, is alternate.

ROANOKE CIRCUIT

President's Appointments:

Thursday, Aug. 14, 8:30 P. M., Roseneath.
Aug. 15, 11 A. M., Whitaker's Chapel; Quarterly Conference in afternoon.
Aug. 15, 8:30 P. M., Enfield.

FORSYTH CIRCUIT

Our people have been so busy with their crops that not much has been done toward finishing our parsonage for a while. However, the roof has been put on.

Bro. S. T. Kiger, or King, who has been quite sick, is convalescing.

Sister Annie Sullivan, who has been visiting her uncle in Pennsylvania for the past two months, is expected to return home on next Saturday.

Our series of evangelistic services will be held at Maple Springs, to be begun on August 3rd. Brother Stubbins is to assist us.

On the second Sunday in August Bro. Hutton will be with us at Hickory Ridge, to assist us in a series of meetings at that church. On the third Sunday in August it is our purpose to begin a series of meetings at Tabernacle. Bro. Austin is to assist us there. A. O. Lindley.

Asheville.

The Juniors held a Penny Sale on Saturday afternoon in front of Bro. Havner's shop; and when they counted up the pennies at the "close of business" they found that there were six hundred and fifty of them. Just a little before the sale ended, one of our good friends, whom many of you know, but whose name I refrain from giving, stopped at the stand and enquired how much still remained to be sold. He was told that seventy-five pennies would about cover it, whereupon he pulled out a bill and bought it all, and treated the children with it. The money from this sale and all other sums that the Juniors raise, is to be divided into three equal parts: one part is to be given to foreign missions, another third is to be given to home missions, and the remainder is to be used for the local work. It is the desire of the superintendent to cultivate in the children an interest in the work of the denomination, as well as to interest them in the work of the local church.

Yesterday the pastor gave out to all the members of the Sunday school who would take them dimes, that are to represent talents, a dime to a scholar. These are to be increased by the efforts of the holders, and returned at the end of six weeks, multiplied as many times as possible. The money realized is to be a part of the Sunday school offering to the building of the new church. It would do your heart good, to see the way the folks, big and little, are going at it, and to hear the many schemes they have for making their talents grow.

Well, the new property is ours! We completed the first payment—$1,100—on Tuesday morning of this week, and the papers were turned over to us. The balance of the purchase price is in two equal annual instalments of $500 each, but we anticipate no difficulty in taking care of these amounts without an appeal for funds for that purpose. So that, so far as the property is concerned, we are now ready to proceed with building.

The Board of Trustees, which constitutes the building committee, held a meeting at the parsonage Monday night. All the details of the construction of the building were gone into—cost, material, and so forth—and a committee appointed to see contractors and submit the specifications, and get estimates from them. These men will be seen this week, and if the estimates meet with the approval of the Trustees, the contract will be let, and the work begun within the next three weeks. It was decided that the maximum cost of the building must not exceed $5,000. This we think will give us a building at once attractive and ample, and at the same time one that will not impose any burden on the membership, or be impossible to finance.

Don't forget us up here. This is the most important work the North Carolina conference has undertaken in several years, a work that is to mean much to the charges west of the Blue Ridge, and that cannot help but have its effect upon the whole conference. Pray for us that we may plan wisely and build well.

THE POSTAL CARD.

W. F. Kennett, Editor.

Our special meetings for Palestine and Flat Rock were both successful. The churches are revived, and one accession at Palestine and six at Flat Rock. The preaching by Revs. T. A. Williams and S. W. Taylor was greatly appreciated by all.

We begin tomorrow at Bethel. The pastor is now making a canvass for funds to make the final payment on our splendid parsonage property and is meeting with phenomenal success. About ninety persons have been approached and not one has failed to respond. That we will pay the debt this fall is a foregone conclusion.

BROWN SUMMIT

Our third quarterly meeting convened at Brown Summit Saturday, July 26. All churches represented except Liberty Grove.

The business of the meeting was attended to with a good degree of concern. The Sunday schools were reported as progressive. The report on finances was encouraging.

Bro. J. W. Curtis of Liberty was declared elected delegate to the next Annual Conference. The class meeting was spoken of as the only real remedy for many defects in the church.

ST. PAUL

Preached there yesterday at 11 o'clock to a very attentive congregation. One man was received into the church.

G. F. Millaway.

REIDSVILLE

The third Sunday in July I was at Bethany beginning our special meeting, and Bro. Amick, of Elon College, kindly consented to preach for us in Reidsville. I am sorry I could not be there and Bro. Amick was no more delighted with our church and people, than they were with his most excellent, edifying and uplifting sermons. It was so kind of him to come to us; it will ever be an ever green oasis in our memory, and we hail the day when he can come again. We are glad he found it pleasant. We are not large, but young and willing. I am glad to say our church went up without any "isms or schisms." We would consult, decide and move right on, and now we have no past divisions to brood over.

Bro. Suits of Concord came to us at Bethany on Monday. We had worked together there some fifteen years ago. He said I was about the only thing that looked natural; nice new houses, two stores and a number one school building had sprung up, the church newly painted, was inspiring. The congregation had changed very much. He did some plain, solid, good, practical preaching and many were benefited, several reclaimed and four converted. We hope to receive some into the church.

We held our quarterly conference on Wednesday. Bros. John D. Baynes and Bro. Geo. D. Williams were declared elected as delegates to Annual Conference. I FIDELIA'S TEA AND COFFEE VENTURE.

Fidelia Shephard had run up to Clara Finch's for an hour's play. The two friends lived only a block apart, and they were generally having fine times together. Lately there had been a little less careless happiness on Fidelia's part, because of the way matters were going at home. The family purse was growing thin, and mother was growing thin, too, for there was no one except her to fill it. Fidelia and her younger brother, Owen, wished that they could earn money. It was pretty hard for mother, dear, frail mother, to earn enough for all three. But today mother's head did not ache, and Fidelia was playing at housekeeping with a joyful heart.

Clara's house was in one corner of the dining-room, and Fidelia's in the corner opposite; but when Fidelia wished to call upon Clara she went into the hall and through the living room, to knock at the door that was nearest to Clara's play house. So now she dressed her doll in its best, and, putting on her own coat and hat, took the roundabout way for a visit.

Clara's mother and her uncle—Mr. Bacon, of New York—were in the living-room, talking together, but they paid no attention to the caller.

It happened that Clara, as soon as Fidelia disappeared in the hallway, suddenly took it into her head that it would be fine sport to play she was not at home, so she skipped off into the kitchen.

The visitor knocked and waited, then she knocked again. Meantime she could not help hearing what Uncle Oliver was saying.

"I wish you knew of a good person I could get to act as my agent here. There is nothing difficult about the business—anybody can do it—just selling those packages of tea and coffee, no weighing or measuring. Only I must have somebody that is active and honest, and there's the rub! Folks don't want to work—that is, some folks, and even our goods won't sell themselves. For one who can hustle, there's a first-rate living in it."

Fidelia forgot to knock the third time, she forgot the visit she had started to make. "Active and honest—anybody can do it"—this was running in the little girl's head. She drew near to the man at the window, and as soon as he stopped speaking she began:

"Oh, sir, I'll do it, if you'll let me! I sold a dozen hat pins and a dozen picture puzzles, last spring, and I 'most know I could sell tea and coffee!"

Mr. Bacon's eyes grew wide during this speech, and then he laughed.

"Well," he hesitated, "you're rather young to go into business," and he cast an amused side-glance toward Clara's mother.

"But you said it only needed somebody that was active and honest," pleaded Fidelia, "and I'm both of those."

"I see I'm caught with my own words," and Mr. Bacon tapped the chair-arm thoughtfully.

Clara now ran in, to see what it was all about. "Come! I'll be home this time," she urged.

But Fidelia had lost her interest in the play.

"Mayn't I try it?" she begged. "I do want to earn some money for my mother!"

"I'll see, little one," he replied. "It is such a very novel idea I shall have to think it over awhile."

When Fidelia went home she carried some wonderful news to mother. Clara's uncle had promised to let her have a dozen packages of tea and coffee to sell, and if she succeeded in disposing of those he was to appoint her as his agent—if Mrs. Shephard did not object.

"And, O mother! won't it be beautiful?" Fidelia concluded. Mrs. Finch is coming to talk it over with you, and she thinks we might keep the stock up in the attic room, and you can 'tend to customers when I'm at school, and Owen can carry the things home, and, maybe, we shall have enough trade so we can have a telephone, and she says till we do we can use theirs, and Clara can just as well run down and tell us who wants anything. The tea is in quarter-pound and half-pound and pound packages, and the coffee in pound and two-pound cans, and you needn't embroider now any more evenings, and make your head ache, and you will have time to go out doors and get well, and—O mother, why don't you say it'll be splendid?"

Mrs. Shephard was scarcely less pleased than Fidelia with the new scheme, although she had a few fears as to how it would work. Would people buy? That was the most important question.

Fidelia easily sold the trial dozen, and then eagerly awaited her first shipment of goods. No little girl could be happier than she, when she unpacked the boxes.

The new lot, however, did not sell quite so rapidly as the others. The nearest neighbors and intimate friends were already supplied, and strangers or mere acquaintances did not appear to be in any hurry to transfer their trade from a reliable grocer to a little girl of whose goods they knew nothing. Some looked unfavorably upon the venture, a few going so far as to tell Fidelia that it was all nonsense, and they should think her mother would know better than to let her attempt such a thing.

"Mother," she said, one night, after hearing such a remark, "I guess those folks wouldn't think it was 'all nonsense', if they could drink some of the tea and coffee would they?" For Mrs. Shephard had declared that they were the best she had ever tasted.

The mother laughed, and went on stirring her bread sponge.

Suddenly Fidelia spoke up: "Mother! I've just thought of it! Why can't I give Mrs. Sherwood and Mrs. Pratt and Miss Hotchkiss just enough tea to try, or coffee? Then perhaps they'd like it so well they'd want to buy some."'

"A good idea!" agreed Mrs. Shephard.

And before Fidelia went to bed she had a whole dozen neat little packeges ready to distribute in the morning.

The scheme worked well, and Fidelia went on giving away samples, and thereby winning customers.

But one hapless day the little girl made a mistake in change, giving a woman ten cents less than was due her, and although the matter was quickly made right the patron went away in a bluff, saying that "such a child" had no business to be "keeping a store."

"You must learn to make change," said mother, "and learn to make it correctly."

So for the next week or two Fidelia spent most of her playtime in counting out money for imaginary customers, until she declared that she could "make change backwards without a mistake."

The business prospered, till some of the grocers tried to get hold of the Bacon teas and coffees, one man even taking a trip to New York in hopes to promote his own cause by being on the spot. But the merchant was true to his unwritten contract, and gave the same answer to all. He said that as long as Fidelia continued to handle his goods satisfactiroly he should give her the exclusive sale of them in her own city.

The Shepard's friends who had heard what was afoot were glad of this decision, but Fidelia and her mother and brother were the very gladdest of them all.—Emma C. Dowd, in Zion's Herald.

—Austria not only sells timber but timber products from its forest lands, and disposes of about 1,500,000 railway ties a year. There is no provision in the United States by which the national forests can dispose of manufactured lumber, though the policy of selling standing timber is well established.

AN OBSTACLE.

I was climbing up a mountain path,
With many things to do,
Important business of my own,
And other people's, too,
When I ran against a Prejudice
That quite cut off the view.

My work was such as could not wait,
My path quite clearly showed,
My strength and time were limited,
I carried quite a load;
And there that hulking Prejudice
Sat all across the road.

So I spoke to him politely
For he was huge and high
And begged that he would move a bit
And let me travel by.
He smiled, but as for moving!—
He didn't even try.

And then I reasoned quietly
With that colossal mule;
My time was short—no other path—
The mountain winds were cool.
I argued like a Solomon;
He sat there like a fool.

Then I flew into a passion,
I danced and howled and swore.
I pelted and belabored him
Till I was stiff and sore;
He got as mad as I did—
But he sat there as before.

And then I begged him on my knees;
I might be kneeling still
If so I hoped to move that mass
Of obdurate ill-will—
As well invite the monument
To vacate Bunker Hill.

So I sat before him helpless,
In an ecstasy of woe—
The mountain mists were rising fast,
The sun was sinking low—
When a sudden inspiration came
As sudden winds do blow.

I took my hat, I took my stick,
My load I settled fair,
I approached that awful incubus
With an absent-minded air—
And I walked directly through him,
As if he wasn't there.

GETTING EVEN.

"I'll get even with him. You see if I don't."

Uncle Jim looked up from the article he was writing. "Who is it you are going to get even with?" he inquired, smiling quizzically into Fred's frowning face.

"It's Frank Lane. He's always playing some low-down trick on us because we won't let him play on our nine. We were using my ball today—it was a dollar ball, too—and Harry batted it clear over the fence. Frank got it and threw it as far as he could out into the lake.", Fred's eyes were flashing.

"And you want to get even with such a low-down trick, as you rightly call it," Uncle John said slowly.

"I will, too. I know what I can do."

Uncle John's pencil had been moving swiftly over the paper as they talked. Now he motioned Fred to step nearer. A few lines had marked out a high road and near it a low, marshy ground. "If a fellow does a low-down trick he lowers himself. He must be down here," Uncle John explained, making a mark for a figure down on the marshy ground. "Now, if you are up here, what will you have to do to get even with him?"

Fred's face grew thoughtful as he studied the sketch. "I suppose I'd have to get down as low as he is," he said slowly.

"Exactly. Now, tell me, wasn't that just what you intended to do—to do something just as mean to him as he has done to you, in other words, to lower yourself to his level?"

"Yes, it was," Fred admitted.

Uncle John said no more. He had a way of leaving a fellow to think things out for himself.

Two days later, Fred came in, his eyes dancing. "Well, Uncle John, I got even with Frank," he announced.

Uncle John looked surprised. He turned sharp eyes on the laughing face.

"It was just this way, you see; I got to thinking how I'd feel if the boys wouldn't let me play on the nine, and I made up my mind I'd feel just as Frank did. And likely as not I'd throw their old ball away, too. So day before yesterady I told Frank he could play in my place. He wasn't going to do it at first; he seemed to think it was some kind of a trick. Then he went into it, and say, but he can play ball! He made more home runs than anybody else. Charlie Strong is going away next week and Frank is to have his place. But what I started to tell you was that Frank came and brought me a new ball tonight—just like the other one. He went out into Mr. Nelson's field and pulled mustard all day yesterday and today to get the money to pay for it with. So, it seems to me, he is up on the level again, and we're even up there. And I tell you, it feels a lot better than getting even the other way."

Uncle John's face had lighted up. "I should say it was better. Shake hands on that, young man. I'm proud to shake hands with you."—Deaconess Advocate.

" 'And when Delilah cut Samson's hair, he became mild as a lamb'. Can you understand it?" asked the Sunday school teacher.

"Well," said little Tommy, reflectively, "it does make you feel 'shamed when a woman cuts your hair."—Harper's.

AN INTERESTING MATHEMATICAL FALLACY

The following, published in the Scientific American Supplement, illustrates the fact that even ordinary mathematical operations must be performed cautiously or intelligently. Have we some readers that are mathematicians enough to point out the false step taken? We would be glad to hear from them.

To prove that all numbers are equal.

Let a and b be any two numbers. Let

$$a-b=c.$$

Multiply each side by a—b.

$$a^2-2ab+b^2=ac-bc$$

By transposing terms, we find

$$a^2-ab-ac=ab-b^2-bc$$

Hence $a(a-b-c)=b(a-b-c)$.

Dividing by a—b—c,

$$a=b.$$

Hence all numbers are equal.

An old woman walked into a bank in Inverness, threw down her deposit book, and said she wished to draw all her money. Having got it, she retired to a corner of the room and counted it. She then marched up to the teller and exclaimed: "Ay, that'll doe, ma man; jist pit it back again. I only wanted to see if it was a' richt."—Dundee News.

TO KEEP OFF TYPHOID FEVER

The State Laboratory of Hygiene will soon be making typhoid vaccine for the State at greatly reduced prices. This vaccine, until recently, sold at abnormally high prices, but it has now been reduced so that the vaccine itself costs about $1.50 per person. In the interests of humanity, economy, and public health, the Laboratory will make it and sell it at cost price. This will probably not be over fifty cents for the vaccine, and perhaps even less. At that price the average man will feel able to protect himself and family from the disgraceful scourge of typhoid.

Typhoid vaccine is a recent discovery in preventive medicine, and as yet it is not definitely know just how much protection it does give. It has not been used long enough to determine this point. Here are some figures, however, that are interesting along this line. Eighty-two thousand United States soldiers were vaccinated up to July 1st a year ago. The typhoid rate dropped from 3.03 per 1,000 in 1909 to 0.3 in 1912—a reduction of 90 per cent.

Not only does typhoid vaccination reduce one's chances of taking typhoid at least 75 to 90 per cent, but it also reduces the danger in those that do contract the disease. From the best data available it appears to reduce the death rate of vaccinated people that contract typhoid to about one-seventh the death rate of unvaccinated persons that contract the disease.—State Health Bulletin.

am sorry to say some went to stripping off tobacco leaves on Wednesday, and the threshing machine came right in on us Thursday, and threshed us out of the community. Will it ever come to pass that people won't take time to be sick? Will they put off death? Well; Hezekiah's life was prolonged fifteen years, but he went to the temple. I actually believe the day is fast approaching when people will have to be held over a yawning hell or held down on a sick bed that we may talk to them a few minutes about salvation and a future home. We tried to talk to them as we met them, but they were in a hurry. Of course there are exceptions; some were there every service. Well, I have left my text; please excuse me, but these facts hurt.

All were glad to have Bro. Suits, and he said to me a number of times he certainly had enjoyed his visit and work with us. While the present results were not what we had hoped for, we have the command to sow the seed and He will take care of the results. I am sorry to say Brother Sam Walker is quite feeble and says he can't stay with us much longer, but he is ready and waiting the summons. That is glorious. Fraternally,

FROM LOCAL REPORTERS

SHADY GROVE, TABERNACLE CIRCUIT

We held our special meeting the fourth Sunday in July. Rev. G. F. Millaway was Bro. Johnson's pulpit help, and he did excellent preaching all the time. His sermons were presented in such a plain, forcible way that even the little children could understand and were benefited by them. The members were greatly strengthened and the spiritual condition of the church was much improved.

The Jefferson Township Sunday School Convention was held here on Saturday before the fourth Sunday in July. A large crowd was present and every one greatly enjoyed the old-fashioned picnic dinner. The table, although very large, was too small to hold the dinner that had been prepared for the occasion. The six Sunday schools in the township were represented, and interesting reports were read from each school. The principal speakers for the occasion were Rev. A. W. Cranford, R. E. Redding, W. G. Cobb, Dr. Chas. W. Byrd, and J. Norman Wills. The Round Table which was a very interesting factor, was conducted by Mr. Wills. Many useful and helpful suggestions were learned from this discussion. The Sunday school was greatly benefited by the convention and we trust will now try to do better and work and will be more loyal to their special tasks in the school.

We are going to hold our Children's Day exercises the second Sunday in August. We hope to have a large congregation and a good collection.

That we may grow in grace, continue to be faithful and that our church and Sunday school may be a blessing in the community is the wish and sincere prayer of the writer, Frances B. Lineberry.

MT. CARMEL NO. 1, PIEDMONT CIRCUIT

We are having Sunday school every Sunday. It is not as good as it ought to be, but we are doing very well and by the help of divine power will keep pressing onward. Our pastor preached for us the first Sunday in July a splendid sermon, as he always does. Our special meeting will commence the second Sunday in August; hope he will have a good congregation. I think we will have plenty of dinner for all. We are going to take a day or so and clean off the church yard and fix up right much for that time. Hope the different churches around will unite with us and pray that much good may be accomplished, as we feel the need of it so much. We are also going to work our church road so you can come in your automobiles, if you want to. Will be glad to see any body come and take a part with us.

Charlie Royal's wife has fever. I am very sorry for her, as she has little children, but hope she will soon recover. Mrs. Filmore Briles does not seem to get much better and has been sick so long. We all ought to pray for her. I think she is such a good woman. Her neighbors all think so much of her and I know they miss her at her church. She always attended when she was able.

Mrs. S. J. Kennedy, Reporter.

HARMONY

Our special meeting began fourth Sunday in July with Bro. Casto as pulpit help. He did most of the preaching. While there was no great demonstration, there was a spiritual uplift in the church and community. Am not sure as to the exact number, but think there were about fifteen converted and restored. There were six additions to the church, two of them by letter.

Am sure there has never been more real gospel preaching in the same length of time in this community. Bro. Casto won the respect and admiration of our people and we are already looking forward to his coming again.

Prof. Leslie, of Easley, S. C., presided at the organ and led the singing. We appreciate his faithful services and believe many were blessed by his singing. I believe Bro. Lamar did everything a man could have done for the meeting. Am sure he will be rewarded abundantly for his untiring efforts.

The meeting closed Friday night. Preachers and singer left for Yarborough's Saturday where they were to begin a meeting. We trust they will have a great meeting.

Dear Herald: Our special meeting commenced the fourth Sunday in July. We had a good meeting. I think there were eighteen conversions and sixteen joined the church. Bro. H. L. Powell helped our pastor, Bro. Ashburn, and they both did faithful work. Our Sunday school is moving along very nicely now. With best wishes for the Herald and its readers. A. J. Dixon.

A Birthday Celebration.

Sixty-seven of the friends and neighbors of Bro. Jno. M. Nicholson met at his home three miles south of Mebane, N. C., and gave him a surprise birthday dinner. Bro. Nicholson was eighty years old Aug. 3, but his children and friends thought best to have the 80th birthday celebration on Saturday the first. The dinner was abundant and good. The crowd enjoyed the day and everything conspired to make the occasion very enjoyable. Of his immediate descendants there are nine children, forty-two grandchildren and nineteen great-grandchildren. He went to the war in 1862 and got home in June 1865. The last year or so of the war he was litter bearer on the field of battle, and as such, often having to go beyond the line of battle to bring away the wounded, he was exposed to greater danger than those in the regular line. On the field of blood and death Bro. Nicholson was true to every duty regardless of his personal peril, nor has he been less reliable in the affairs of civil life. His hand has ever been outstretched and his heart and purse open to the call of the church. Doubtless he has made much of the hopeful conditions of Hebron church possible. All his children are honored citizens in the communities where they live and it is easy to see the sterling merits of the worthy sire in the sons and daughters he has worked so hard by precept and example to train. He is well preserved and can walk three or four miles about as quickly as a young man. Before separating, prayer was offered and several songs were sung, closing with "God be with you till we meet again."

It was good to be there. May there be many happy returns. Wellis.

Flat Rock Items.

Our special meeting closed on Thursday. Six accessions. Rev. Mr. Taylor of Winston did all the preaching. The older sinners here are hard to reach, as they will not attend much except at night.

His sermons were very uplifting, buoyant and hopeful. Of gentle spirit, kind and good, we consider him an honor to our beloved church and its blessed ministry. It is interesting to note how differently our annual help through a series of years (Revs. Ashburn, Stowe, Williams, Fogleman, Millaway, Suits, Lowdermilk, Moton and Taylor) present the gospel. Backed by a different personality, it seems new and so unlike, yet like.

God bless all of these who have endeared themselves to us by their earnest labors of love here. May Mr. Taylor, honoring the Holy Spirit, and abiding in the Savior, remembering "All power is given unto Him in heaven and in earth," obtain almost limitless power

His weapons mighty, to the pulling down of strongholds, swaying the seemingly incorrigible and intractible world of youth about him; and the converted, held in tact, an earnest of heaven, building churches, upbuilding their membership, advancing the interests of our church at large, and awake our conference to more aggressive lines of activity. "God being his strong habitation whereunto he continually resorts."

Bethel, Alamance Circuit.

Children's day was held at Bethel last third Sunday. The children rendered their parts well; song service was good and we had an interesting and instructive address on the life of Joseph by Mr. J. Albert Holmes, which was very much enjoyed by all. Collection amounted to $7.76.

Our special meeting will begin the third Sunday in August with Rev. E. G. Lowdermilk as pulpit help. Let us all pray that we may have a good meeting and a glorious out-pouring of the spirit of God.

Mr. Linden Stuart is teaching school at Bethel. Mrs. J. N. Wood, who has been visiting in our neighborhood, has returned home.

We were very sorry to hear that one of Mr. Rufus Woody's triplets died last week, also that Mrs. Woody is very sick. Hope she will soon recover.

Since my last report our special meeting has been held. We had a great meeting. There were quite a number of conversions and twelve joined the church. Rev. H. L. Powell assisted our pastor, and did some fine preaching. The meeting lasted five days, beginning Sunday, the 20th. We had prayer meeting every morning before preaching. We are still holding our Sunday school every Sunday, are having a very good Sunday school. We recently distributed our children's day pieces and intend to have it soon.

Dear Editor:— Please allow us enough of your valuable space for a few words from Paint Fork Church, as a reminder that we are neither dead nor sleeping, but very much alive, and around us floats a wave of progressiveness.

Our pastor, Bro. Hatley, gives us a very able and uplifting sermon on each first Sunday. Yesterday he filled his regular appointment with a sermon from Roman's 12: 1. His theme was "A Christian Life." I feel sure that each one present has a wider knowledge of what a Christian life should be. Not merely confessing a faith in Christ and joining the church; but that there is a broad field of work for each one to do. And those of us that are worth while in the army of the King are going to make this field of work the starting point in life.

Though we may be persecuted, let us think of the many martyrs who have even perished in the flames of persecutions. But the echoes of their agonizing cries have crystalized into an almost universal religious liberty.

At this appointment one was added to the church, Mrs. Sam Angel.

We feel that Bro. Hatley is doing a great work here, and we are confident he is the right minister in the right place. And we are hoping and praying that he will not make the first year his last, but that he will continue his well begun work with us.

With best wishes to the Herald and its readers, I am, yours for success,

—The editor expected to occupy Bro. Davis's pulpit in Burlington last Sunday, but a late train prevented. Bro. J. G. Rogers kindly took us to his home and made the day very pleasant for us. In the afternoon he and little James took us in a buggy to Glen Raven to Sunday school and to hear Bro. Curry preach. We found the day restful and helpful.

—Glen Raven is a new church for which Rev. D. M. Loy deserves credit. He was living in the community and saw the need of a place of worship. He solicited help and built a church and preached in it for some time. Our Burlington people were inspired by what he had done to lend a hand, and they ceiled the building. We believe the Board of Church Extension helped a little also. Lately Bro. Hornady and family and Bro. Scott and perhaps others have joined at Glen Raven to help out in the work, and the church is gaining groud. There were over fifty present in Sunday school and preaching service last Sunday, and the interest seemed to us good. But there are many families in the vicinity not yet reached, and this church has a real work to do.

—Bro. Curry preaches in a conversational tone—the easiest to listen to—says what he has to say, and then quits We enjoyed his sermon last Sunday, and were pleased to think that he had succeeded in making so much of himself since we first knew him as a struggling young man.

—Read the good news from Asheville in Bro. Bates's report. We congratulate him and our Asheville people on their good prospect.

—We were glad to see Bro. H. W. Braswell in our office yesterday. He had been visiting his sister, Mrs. Rev. J. L Giles, of Winston.

—New York has a new law, which went into effect July 1, which forbids the employment of women in factories between the hours of 10 P. M. and 6 A. M.

—Robt. Bain, deputy sheriff, was shot and killed at Pomona last Saturday by a negro he was trying to arrest. The funeral was conducted by Bro. Andrews on Monday. This death has shocked our city as few others have recently. The negro is still at large, but is much hunted and will almost certainly be caught.

Later.—The negro was caught yesterday near Kernersville by Sheriff Stafford.

—Rev. T. J. Ogburn is assisting in a meeting at Tabernacle, Bro. Johnson pastor.

—Rufus Newsom, of King, who had taken shelter in a tobacco barn, was killed by lightning on August 1st. He was driving a team for Bro. S. T. Keiger. This team also was killed. Bro. Kiger is recovering from sickness. He is one of our leading church workers, and he as well as the family of Newsom have our sympathy.

DENTON HIGH SCHOOL

——OPENS SEPTEMBER 1, 1913——

DENTON is situated in the Piedmont hills of Davidson County twenty miles South from Thomasville on the Carolina and Yadkin River Rail Road. This Railroad connects us with the Southern at Thomasville and High Point on the north and with the Southbound at High Rock on the South. About 350 yards west from the depot on Salisbury Street, nestling among a beautiful grove of oaks, is the home of Denton High School.

OUR COURSE OF STUDY prepares for any College, also for our State University. We give each student personal atention and do everything necessary for their comfort and advancement. A thoroughly competent teacher has been employed for the Music Department, and those who take this course will receive special attention. A High School Business Course will be taught free of charge as to tuition. Special work in Pedagogy for those who intend to teach.

FREE TUITION to ministerial students and children of the ministers of the North Carolina Conference. Cost of all necessary expenses for a year ranges from $115 to $145. We board students in good private homes. Indigent young men can get rooms and board themselves at actual cost. If any one wishes to pay a part or even all expenses by work, write the Principal for particulars. The school uses water from deep drilled wells with pumps, which eliminates all danger from germs in the water. Pure air, pure water, plenty of work; if these do not give health to the student, he will never have it. Write the Principal at Denton, N. C., for any further information.

DIED.

Robt. Hughes and wife, of Burlington, formerly of Randleman, brought their little two-year-old girl to Randleman last Saturday for burial in Mt. Lebanon cemetery. Bro. Hughes and his companion are members of Mt. Lebanon church and are good people. They have quite a large family of children and this one, little Bertha May, was their first one to be taken from them. The parents have our deepest sympathy. It was a sweet little girl and no doubt was the sunshine of the home. J. B. O'Briant.

Lucy Harriet Grabs.

Our departed sister, Lucy Harriet Grabs, (maiden name Spainhour) was born August 28, 1825. She was married to Lewis Edwin Grabs April 8, 1847. This union was blessed with seven children, three of whom, with their father, have passed over the River.

She has fourteen grandchildren living and two dead, and one sister living. She joined the Methodist Protestant Church when young. In 1855 she with her husband joined the Moravian Church. And now, that she has passed from among us, we pause and thank God that he gave us a sister and mother who united in herself so many of the graces which adorn a Christian character.

While devotedly attached to her own church, her house was the home of all God's servants. But she is gone and the community in which she lived and moved will sadly miss her—and while there is one more saint added to the church above, there is one less in the church below. She was "a woman that was wise in the ways of her household' and a mother ready to give the best of advice. She was blessed with a remarkable degree of health which seldom failed her. For the past year her health has been failing her. She was constantly calling, praying and begging the Lord to take her home.

On the morning of July 8, 1913, she passed away without a struggle, fell asleep sweetly in the arms of Jesus. Her age was 87 years, 10 months and 20 days.

The funeral was preached by Rev. J. F. McCuiston. Mr. McCuiston preached

BROWER

An old veteran of two armies has answered the last roll call. Wesley Dugan Brower was born Nov. 18, 1836, passed to his reward July 10, 1913, aged 76 years, 8 months and 22 days. When the rights of the South were invaded and a resort to force was necessary, Bro. Brower did the next noblest and bravest act of his life. He shouldered arms and marched to the front in defense of his country. He was in the battles of Seven Pines and Gettysburg. A pine tree top cut off by a cannon ball fell on him and wounded him so badly that he was sent home for a while, but went back as soon as he was able for duty and was in several more battles no doubt. He was a brave soldier in the lost cause but right nevertheless.

But the bravest and most noble act of his long life was when he enlisted under the Great Captain whom he served faithfully unto the end. When he surrendered to the Master he joined Bethel M. P. Church. His seat was seldom vacant when divine service was held in his church. He was liberal in supporting the Lord's cause and of course the Lord was liberal with him in the same way. He leaves, besides a host of friends, his devoted companion, six children, fourteen grandchildren and nine great-grandchildren, to mourn his departure. No one who knew him in his latter days has any doubt as to his admission into the world of bliss. May the blessings of the Lord rest abundantly upon those who cared for him so tenderly and lovingly in his last days. Funeral by his pastor.

HOW TO PURIFY WATER

The best thing to do with polluted water is to keep it out of your mouth and wait until you can get some pure water. Of course, a man might starve to death in some places following that advice, so here is the next best thing to do. Disinfect the dangerous water. Here is the way to do it.

Dissolve a teaspoonful of chloride of lime in a cupful of water, making sure that all lumps are thoroughly broken up, then add three more cupfuls of water. Stir the mixture well and allow to stand for a few seconds in order that any solid particles may settle. This mixture, if kept in a tightly stoppered bottle, may be used for four or five days, when a new solution should be prepared. Add one teaspoonful of this milky looking solution to each two gallons of water to be purified and stir thoroughly in order that the weak chlorine solution will come in contact with all the bacteria which may be present. Allow this to stand for ten minutes. This will give approximately one-half part of free chlorine to 1,000,000 parts of water and will effectually destroy all typhoid and colon bacilli or other disease germs in the water. The water will be without taste or odor and the trace of free chlorine will rapidly disappear. This method is one which is now recommended in the health literature of the country. On account of its simplicity, effectiveness and small cost, it is particularly well adapted for use by private families, campers, and those living in summer resorts.

Water so disinfected is not dangerous so far as the chloride of lime is concerned, if allowed to stand for ten or fifteen minutes after applying. The chief danger is that not enough disinfectant will be applied to render the water safe in all instances.—N. C. State Board of Health.

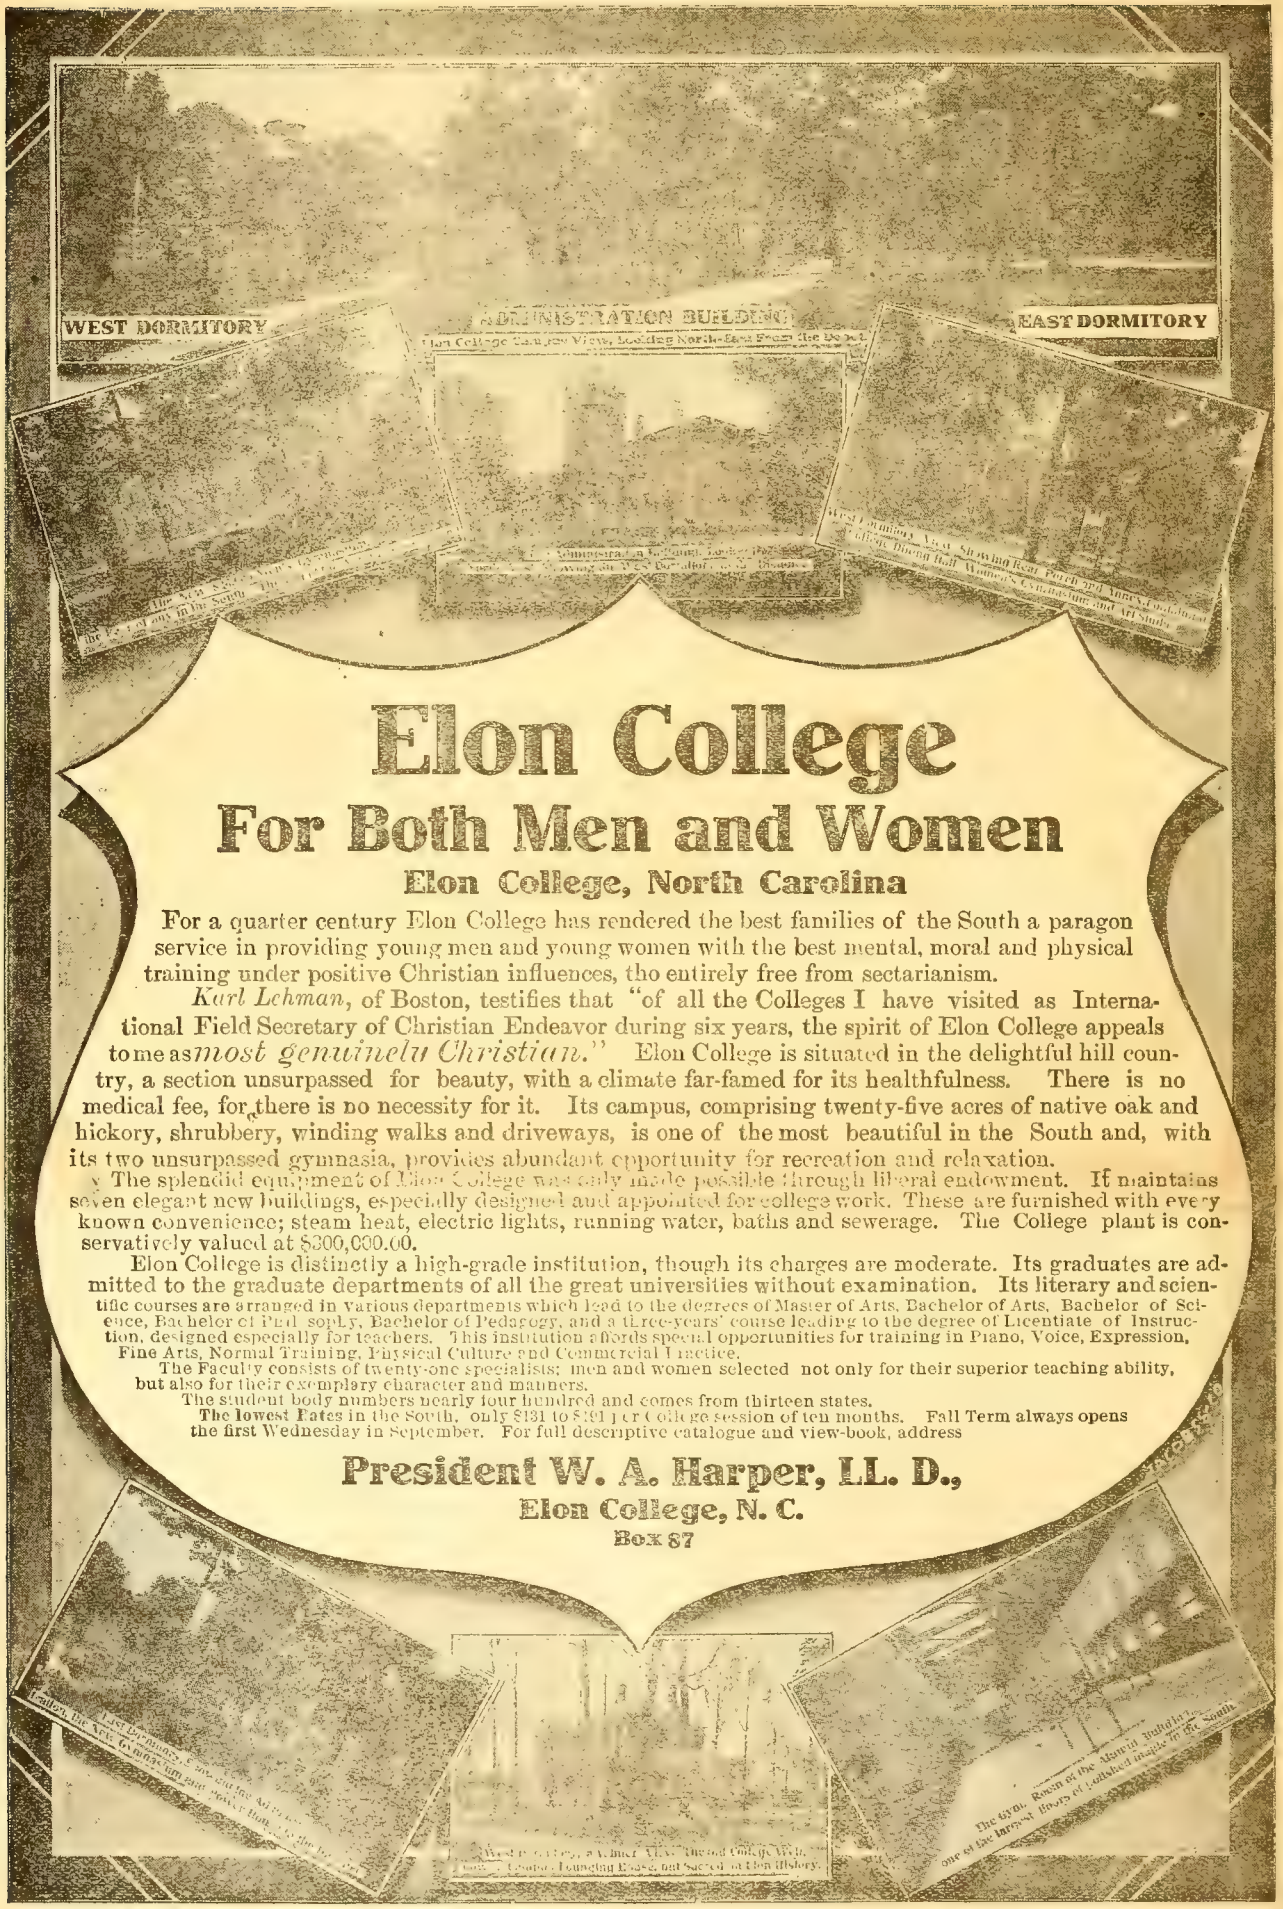
Two Kinds of Primaries.

There are two kinds of primaries—direct primaries and indirect primaries. Indirect primaries mean the old delegate system by which the Bosses nominate all the candidates for public office. Direct primaries mean that the voters will nominate all the candidates. That is the difference between the two.



Elon College

For Both Men and Women

Elon College, North Carolina

For a quarter century Elon College has rendered the best families of the South a paragon service in providing young men and young women with the best mental, moral and physical training under positive Christian influences, tho entirely free from sectarianism.

Karl Lehman, of Boston, testifies that "of all the Colleges I have visited as International Field Secretary of Christian Endeavor during six years, the spirit of Elon College appeals to me as most genuinely Christian." Elon College is situated in the delightful hill country, a section unsurpassed for beauty, with a climate far-famed for its healthfulness. There is no medical fee, for there is no necessity for it. Its campus, comprising twenty-five acres of native oak and hickory, shrubbery, winding walks and driveways, is one of the most beautiful in the South and, with its two unsurpassed gymnasia, provides abundant opportunity for recreation and relaxation.

The splendid equipment of Elon College was only made possible through liberal endowment. It maintains seven elegant new buildings, especially designed and appointed for college work. These are furnished with every known convenience; steam heat, electric lights, running water, baths and sewerage. The College plant is conservatively valued at $300,000.00.

Elon College is distinctly a high-grade institution, though its charges are moderate. Its graduates are admitted to the graduate departments of all the great universities without examination. Its literary and scientific courses are arranged in various departments which lead to the degrees of Master of Arts, Bachelor of Arts, Bachelor of Science, Bachelor of Philosophy, Bachelor of Pedagogy, and a three-years' course leading to the degree of Licentiate of Instruction, designed especially for teachers. This institution affords special opportunities for training in Piano, Voice, Expression, Fine Arts, Normal Training, Physical Culture and Commercial Practice.

The Faculty consists of twenty-one specialists; men and women selected not only for their superior teaching ability, but also for their exemplary character and manners.

The student body numbers nearly four hundred and comes from thirteen states.

The lowest Rates in the South, only $131 to $191 per College session of ten months. Fall Term always opens the first Wednesday in September. For full descriptive catalogue and view-book, address

THE CHILDREN'S HOME AND THE PASTOR'S CONFERENCE

The Conference opened at the Home on Tuesday P. M.

High Point people kindly conveyed pastors and visitors in automobiles from the station to the Home, Captain Rankin, Dr. Reitzell, and others lending the use of their machines. Bro. Dixon was on hand to act as escort.

The following pastors were present first day (and others expected later): Andrews, Bates, Bethea, Bowman, Burgess, Braswell (D. A.), Cecil (President), Curry, Davis, Dixon, Holmes, Gerringer, Hulin, Hutton, Johnson, Lassiter, Lindley, Lowdermilk (E. G.), Matthews, McCulloch, Ogburn, Pritchard, Self, Stowe, Stubbins, Swain, Waldrop, Williams (D. R.), Williams (T. A.). Visitors: Prof. Amick, Prof. Forlines, Rev. J. F. Dosier, Rev. C. H. Beck, Rev. Mr. Fitzwater.

We found Bro. W. P. Pickett and Mrs. Pickett, Mrs. Welch and Mrs. Dixon looking after the preparations for our coming and entertainment.

The Home exceeded our expectations in its ample commodiousness and in the splendid quality of its finishings. The Building Committee have built into it good materials. A man engaged in putting in the steam heating system remarked that it would cost comparatively little to keep the building up.

There is immense room in the basement for storing supplies. The first and second floors are divided up into large halls (where the children can romp) and into large rooms and numerous closets for the various uses of the Home. The ceilings are high, and walls and ceilings are plastered. There is a large room on the third floor which can be turned to good account, when needed.

This is one of the largest and best buildings our denomination has erected for any purpose anywhere. We have not many buildings that cost more. This cost more than was expected, as is generally the case, and the building committee will have to have some more money, but we believe our people who see the building will approve, not only the building of a large building, but also the use of good materials, which are cheapest in the long run.

At the appointed hour, the pastors assembled in the assembly room for their conference. After an opening song led by Bro. Bethea and a prayer led by Bro. Taylor, Bro. Andrews made a short address, expressing his gratification with the number present, and his hope of good results from the meeting together. A deeper sense of fellowship and a higher mutual appreciation are part of the end sought. He stated that Bro. Dixon had arranged so economically for our entertainment (thru' the kindness of High Point people) that the expense per capita would be only about $2 for the three days.

It was regretted that the sickness of Mrs. J. D. Williams prevented his being present. Prof. Forlines made the address of the afternoon, the first of a series of three addresses on different types of piety. Intellectual Piety was treated in this first address. He defined piety as devotion to God; intellectual piety as devotion to God as revealed through the intellect. (Emotional piety and volitional piety are two types to be discussed in later addresses.) In some communities, one type is dominant; in others, another.

He discussed at some length the relation of mind and body, showing the dependence of mind upon body, and hence urging the importance of attention to bodily conditions. The new science of eugenics was referred to, and examples given to show the importance of heredity as a factor in mental and moral life.

The processes of the intellect were described—sensation, perception, reasoning. He pointed out the unreasonableness of the rationalists in refusing to employ sufficiently the power of clear perception and sensation to investigate fact.

The necessary use of the intellect in receiving Bible truth was pointed out. The Bible is not yet fully comprehended. The Holy Spirit in guiding us into a perception of the truth does so through our use of our intellects.

Kant by his effort to destroy knowledge and make room for faith really led to skepticism. Berkley by a similar process led to atheism. Faith involves an intellectual element as well as an emotional element, growing out of what we know. We believe in God because we know God.

Bro. Johnson asked the difference between the faith of a child and the faith of an adult. The professor answered that the faith of a child is instinctive, like a mother's love, while that of an adult is based on knowledge resulting from experience.

Bro. Fitzwater asked whether faith be not dependent on will. The professor replied that there is a faith which is a result of volition.

Bro. Taylor called attention to the distinction between knowing God and knowing about God.

Orthodoxy came in for a word. When it means loyalty to truth, it is all right, said the professor; but when it means simply loyalty to the past, it is a mistake.

In concluding, the professor stated that one object in discussing the different types of piety is to make men of each type more charitable in their judgment of men of different type.

The professor's address was followed by an intermission of an hour or so. Then came supper in the spacious Dining Room of the Home. Bro. Ogburn acted as host, calling on Bro. Cecil to ask the blessing. Mrs. Dixon had interested herself especially in the preparation of the meal, and we voted her part of the program a decided success.

Soon after supper, we assembled in the portico, and during the twilight hour sang some songs and heard Bro. Taylor deliver a most earnest address on Soul Saving. The time, the circumstances, Bro. Taylor's solemn tones, brought to mind camp meeting scenes, and we felt that it was good to be there.

Dusk coming on, we repaired to the Assembly Room where a choir from High Point rendered some stirring songs. A number of visitors from High Point met with us in this evening session. Prof. Amick's address on The Church and the Social Problem followed. He opened his address by relating the legend of the god of summer. This god had been put to death, and all nature was in gloom and mourning, wrapped in an icy shroud. Another god was sent to the abode of the dead to bring back the god of summer. Consent was given that he return only on condition that he remain but part of each year. When he returns, there is universal gladness and the upspringing of new life. This the speaker used to illustrate the coming of Christ's influence into human society. Only by that power can evil be removed and the social problems solved.

He indicated a number of social problems to be solved. The home, the relations of capital and labor, of the rich and the poor, the institutions of the business world and of the educational world, all have their social problem.

Some political economists teach a let-alone policy. But Christ is our teacher and example, and he teaches that we must interest ourselves in our fellowmen in a way to help them.

Force may be employed to keep from wrong-doing, but inside reformation is the great thing to be sought.

He referred to the great number of divorces of late, and urged that the church must teach more clearly the true view of marriage. It is not a mere civil contract. It is a divine institution. Divorce is contrary to the divine intention.

In the business world, the Bible conception of stewardship is that which will ultimately heal the schism between capital and labor. Men are not their own. They belong to God; and what they have belongs to God. They hold from God as His stewards. A realization of this fact will make a wonderful difference in the actions and attitude of men in relation to property.

(The editor had to leave to take a train home before Prof. Amick had concluded his address.)

CORRRECTING A HUSBAND.

A colored woman went to the pastor of her church the other day to complain of the conduct of her husband, who, she said, was a low down, worthless, trifling fellow. After listening to the long recital of the delinquencies of her neglectful spouse and her efforts to correct them the minister said: "Have you ever tried heaping coals of fire upon his head?"

"No," was the reply, "but I done tried hot water."—Metropolitan Magazine.

WORLD'S SUNDAY-SCHOOL COMMISSION.—VI.

The Commissioon entered Korea April 11 and 12 at Fusan, the nearest port to Japan.

The Koreans are distinctly a farming people, not a manufacturing or commercial people, and the approach to them was entirely different from that to the Japanese. They could be reached only through the missionaries and the mission stations. During two weeks and in four working groups nearly all these stations were visited. The great crowds of children and adults, so characteristic of Korea, greeted the workers everywhere. The missionaries greeted them with their wonted cordiality, and welcomed any contribution that they might make to their efficiency in the Sunday-school work. Public meetings and conferences were everywhere held.

The greatest meeting of the visit was the great Sunday-school rally, held in Seoul, the capital, on the afternoon of April 19. Here on the grounds of one of the old kingly palaces, more than ten thousand children and adults met to greet the Commission. It was probably the largest assembly produced by Christianity in any missionary land, and it greatly impressed the Japanese and the non-Christian Koreans. Here also the Commission was entertained by the governor-general, Terauchi, and by the American consulate; and every public courtesy was extended.

Korea has had a checkered political history. The earliest records go back to B. C. 1122, when Chinese colonists carried thither Chinese arts and politics, and it became a dependency of China. The Chino-Japanese war (1894-95) made Korea independent of China; the Russo-Japanese war (1904-05) left Korea nominally independent, but under Japanese protection. In August, 1910, Korea became formally, as it had been practically, a dependency of Japan. It has thus reached what its geographical position makes its natural destiny.

Christianity in Korea.

Christianity has had a remarkable growth in Korea. The Chinese invasion already mentioned, broke up the bonds by which the Koreans were bound to their own religious institutions, but there was not missionary power enough in the Chinese religion to force itself upon them. Hence, when the Christian missionaries went to Korea, they found a people without very strong religious attachments. Christianity, coming with force and cogency, found ready access to the hearts of the people, and has made a remarkable growth; so much so that for the year 1910-11, the missionaries and native Christians took up the cry, "A million converts this year."

Just now the Christians in Korea are passing through trying experiences. For a time it looked as though there was to be a martyr church in Korea. While the country was passing under the power of Japan, there were some assassinations of Japanese officials at the hands of some misguided Korean patriots; and the Japanese were greatly aroused. Their feelings culminated at the report of a plot to assassinate Count Terauchi, in September, 1910. He was the governor-general of the country. The Japanese thought that the native Christians, and even the missionaries, had some part in these assassinations and plots. In 1911 arrests of natives to the number of 157, mostly Christians, were made. Of these, 125 were brought to trial, nine were exiled without trial, three died as a result of torture, and twenty were released. The result of the trial was the conviction of 105, the acquittal of seventeen, and one, a sick man, was placed under suspended sentence. There is no reasonable doubt as to their innocence, but their conviction was secured by means of confessions obtained by the infliction of tortures as severe as any ever inflicted by the Inquisition in the height of its power. The attention of the Christian world was called to the injustice of their treatment.

While the Commission was in Japan the result of the second trial was announced. Ninety-nine of the one hundred and five were acquitted, and six were sentenced to six years of penal servitude. Among those convicted is Baron Yun, one of the most highly respected Christians in Korea. An appeal was taken to a higher court, and while this is being written, preparations are being made for the third trial. Intense interest and excitement prevail among all classes—Koreans, missionaries and Japanese. The latter begin to feel that they have pressed the matter too far, and that they are being put in the attitude of defying the sentiment of the Christian world, with a part of which—England, on account of close treaty relations, they are anxious to remain on good terms. So they, of course, are trying to find some method of "saving their face," as they call it. The missionaries are doing all in their power by intelligent effort and prayer to secure justice for their brethren in distress.

No other incident on any mission field in modern times has aroused so much interest, either on the field or at home, and it is not fair to leave the subject without making a suggestion as to the cause of the action of the Japanese in the case. The Japanese are intensely patriotic, devoted to their emperor and country; but here, in the members of the Christian churches in Korea, are a body of men and women that are related, not first of all, to their country, but to a foreign organization—the missionary society and the Christian church. This is something entirely diverse from Japanese thought. When the assassinations took place, they naturally suspected this body that had a foreign allegiance. The missionaries cautioned the native Christians not to let their love of country sweep them into a hopeless conflict with the Japanese authorities. They said, for substance, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and unto God the things that are God's." This advice was taken by them as a whole, though there may have been some ardent patriots not Christians that were led into questionable courses. The incident may teach the Japanese—a lessoon they need to learn in Japan as well as in Korea—that a supreme spiritual allegiance to Jesus Christ is not inconsistent with a true love of country. This they ought to have learned in the attitude of the Japanese Christians in their war with Russia, but they did not appear to learn it.

There is no doubt that the present government in Korea has been unfavorable to Christianity, but public men have been charitable enough to attribute this disfavor to the provincial government at Seoul, not to the imperial government at Tokio. This oppposition is not shown from a distinctively religious angle, but from a political one. The Japanese are very anxious to crush the national spirit in Korea, and so reduce it to a province of the empire; but they know that the tendency of Christian education is to produce an independent spirit; so they fear that it may keep alive the fires of Korean patriotism. This is, perhaps, the root cause of all the difficulty; and by a characteristic oriental method they go about seeking their ends by extreme indirection, not knowing what they do.

Korea at Present.

While the result sought for a few years ago in the cry, "A million converts this year," has not been reached, remarkable results have been attained. It is now estimated that there are 125,000 baptized members, and as many more probationers and adherents, The excitement of the great revival has died away, the chaff has been blown from the wheat, and the work is now on a solid basis.

The Koreans are still reaching out their hands for the gospel, and there are more open fields than the present missionary force, large as it is relatively, can enter. The Koreans are naturally spiritually minded. They readily take up the work of the teacher and the evangelist; and it has been suggested that in the providence of God, they are to become the evangelizers of the Orient.

The following incident told the writer by the chief actor in it will show how readily the Koreans receive the gospel. The missionary and his native helper were belated one night among the islands, and put ashore for the night. They preached to a chance crowd that gathered to them at the landing, evening and morning, left tracts and a manual showing how to conduct services. In a year the missionary returned and found a congregation of one hundred and fifty gathered. There is now at that place, three years after, a church of 125 members, and a congregation of 300. Forty-eight were baptized at one time. This is not an unusual incident.

New Lines of Work.

The work of opening and sustaining preaching places has largely been done by the missionaries; and so great is it that in many places they can visit the people but twice a year. The conviction is growing that the missionaries should give their time more largely to training the native teachers and pastors to go out among their own people and enter the many open doors. The plan of those most active in this method of work is to teach a class of twenty for a month and send them out; while they are out, another similar class is taught and made ready to go on their return. This process is to continue as long as necessary or possible.

But the very latest phase of work is with the heathen children. This began in the south, and is rapidly extending over the whole country, promising very much. Heretofore, the missionaries have given their attention almost exclusively to the bringing in of the adults, and the Sabbath-schools have consisted almost entirely of the children of native Christians. The new movement collects the children of heathen parents, under the general supervision of the missionaries, but under the immediate care of the native church. The church sends its own members among the heathen of its own city and into the surrounding villages, and opens a school. The members actually go into the heathen homes and lead the children to the school, remaining at the service to assist and support the teacher. Some churches are conducting from six to eight of these schools on the sabbath, of from sixty to two hundred. One group of missions added 2,200 scholars to its rolls in this manner in a year. The children first are won and then the parents.

Japanese in Korea.

Since Korea became a part of Japan, the Japanese are flocking thither in great numbers. It is estimated that there are now 250,000 in the country, and they are entering rapidly. It is generally agreed here that the material results of Japanese dominion, and even the distinctively educational, will be good; but that the spiritual results will be bad. Of course, Christian workers can do nothing in regard to the political supremacy of Japan, but they are doing what they can to bring the Japanese in Korea to Christ, so that their personal influence will not be detrimental. Several churches have been organized among them in the larger cities, and they seem to be more readily reached than their brethren at home, being separated from their friends and relatves.

The great importance of this work in Korea will be recognized when it is pointed out that these Japanese are the most important personages in the cities in which they are located, being political, financial, and industrial leaders. This work should haave the encouragement of religious leaders.

A PLAIN MAN'S SOLUTION OF A PLAIN MAN'S PROBLEM.

Part 3.

By Prof. C. E. Forelines.

Theology is the science of religion. It is to religion what astronomy is to the heavenly bodies. When the Copernican astronomy superseded the Ptolemaic, it made no change in the stars or in the solar system. When Newton discovered the law of gravity not a planet changed its course. A new astronomy does not in the least modify the heavenly bodies. A new theology does not mean a new religion. Calvinism is being superseded by Arminianism, but it is making no change in the sovereignty of God or the free agency of man. Whether the commercial theory of the atonement, the moral influence theory, the satisfaction theory, or the governmental theory prevails, there will be no change in the fact of the atonement. In the future, as in the past our conceptions of the Bible may change, but the Bible changes not. Our doctrine of the Person of Christ may be modified, but He is "the same yesterday, and today, and forever."

There is a constant in religion, and there are variants. The constant is essential; the variant, non-essential. They are not easily differentiated. A table may be square, oblong, oval, or round. These are variants, neither of which is essential to a table. What is the constant, that without which a table would cease to be a table? You will find it difficult to answer. And yet in your mind there is a working distinction. You would not think of insisting that a table, in order to be a table, must at the same time be both square and oblong and oval and round. It is possible that you would recognize as a table an object which has neither of these forms. The constant is that without which there would be no table. The variants are those qualities by virtue of which there are varieties of tables. So it is in religion. The constant is that without which religion would cease to be religion. The variants are those things by which one religion is distinguished from another.

The constant, or essence, of religion is consciousness of relation to superhuman Power. In this consciousness all the religions of the world are united. Their differences are due to different conceptions of that relation. One's conception of the nature of man and the character of Deity will determine very largely his conception of the relation between them. What is a constant in one religion may be a variant in another. In a round table there is an essential element, which does not as such, belong to a mere table. It is roundness. Without this form a round table would cease to be a round table, it might still be a table. In Christianity there is an essential element which does not, as such, belong to mere religion. It is consciousness of filial relation to the Father. This and much more is essential to Christianity.

Christianity is life made possible by the vicarious sufferings of Jesus Christ; entered into, through faith, by being born of the Spirit; continued in the consciousness of a filial relation to the Father as he is revealed through the Son; expressing itself, in accordance with the dictates of a conscience enlightened by the Holy Spirit and the Bible, through beliefs and institutions, forms of worship and acts of service; and progressively realizing through the continual co-operation of the ever-present Spirit, God's two-fold ideal, the individual, as it is revealed in the manhood of Jesus, the social, as it is revealed in Christ's conception of the kingdom of God.

This statement of the necessary content of Christianity is not in every respect satisfactory, but let us hope that it will answer the purpose for which it is made. It recognizes the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit; that in Christ is revealed both the Father and the ideal man; by implication, that the natural man is out of filial relation to God; that for entering into this filial relation the atonement is the necessary ground, faith the necessary condition, and the Holy Spirit the necessary agent; that Christian life must express itself in beliefs, institutions, worship and service; that in expressing itself the conscience, enlightened by the Holy Spirit and the Bible, is the standard; that the Christian life is progressive; that the goal for the individual is conformity to the image of the Son; and that the goal for society is the Son's conception of the kingdom of God.

Christianity is neither a system of thought, a peculiar emotional experience, nor a particular kind of activity. It is a life. Christ came that we might have life and that we might have it more abundantly. Christ is the life. They who have him have life. This Christian life is eternal life. Eternal life and immortality are not synonymous. Both the sinner and the saint are immortal. Only the saint has eternal life, and he has it here and now. Neither the sinner nor the saint can divest himself of immortality, but the saint can forfeit eternal life. The essential thing in immortality is its everlastingness. The essential thing in eternal life is likeness to Christ. It is not what men believe, experience, or do, the institutions to which they belong, the forms which they observe in worship, or the kind of service which they render, that constitutes them Christians. He who is a Christian is Christian by virtue of the fact that he has the spirit of Christ. Whatever else he may have, if he lacks that, he is no Christian. Whatever else he may lack, if he has that, he is Christian. He has life eternal, Christian life.

This life has a three-fold power—the power to know, the power to feel, and the power to will. A man must have life before he can know. He must have knowledge before he has emotions, and he must have emotions before he have volition. All this is true of the natural man. The natural man, however, cannot discern spiritual truth, that must be spiritually discerned. Christian truth must be comprehended by Christian intelligence. With the Christian man the psychological order is the same as that of the natural man. There must be first Christian life, then Christian intelligence, then Christian sensibility, and finally Christian volition. These three faculties, the intellect, the sensibility, and the will, are not always symmetrically developed, or harmoniously active. In one person the intellect is dominant; in another, the sensibility; and in still another, the will. This leads naturally to different types of religious experience, and consequently, to three different theories of piety, the intellectual, the emotional, and the volitional.

The intellectual theory holds that religion is essentially knowledge of divine things. Men of the intellectual type are prone to be impatient in the presence of mystery and emotions. They seek to construe all mysteries by means of rational categories. What cannot be thus construed they are inclined to deny. Before rationalism every mystery must disappear, if it cannot be comprehended, then it must be denied. Such is one extreme of intellectualism. The other is what is known as orthodoxy. Orthodoxy has no patience with intellectual errors, it is inclined to punish more severely any departure from its standards than a departure from the standards of morals. Good men have been burned at the stake because their doctrines did not accord with those of the orthodox. Orthodoxy professes to be in sympathy with all investigation for the discovery of truth, but if anyone announces the discovery of a truth contrary to its standards, he may expect to be denounced as a heretic. But there is a sane intellectualism. It knows the true place and function of reason, it also knows its limits. It opposes neither mystery nor emotions. It knows that there can be no religion without knowledge, but at the same time it is aware that knowledge is but one element of religion. It does not profess to be omniscient, and it refuses to be called agnostic. It recognizes the importance of a living orthodoxy, but it also knows that the orthodoxy of one generation may be the heterodoxy of another. An orthodoxy that would survive must be progressive. We need standards of belief, but it should be recognized that our fathers had no monopoly of the truth. It is equally certain that wisdom will not die with this generation. The treasury of divine truth has not been exhausted. In the midst of truth we seek more truth.

In the emotional type of religion the feelings are dominant. This, like the intellectual type, swings to two extremes, quietistic mysticism, and ecstatic mysticism. Both of these extremes are due largely to ignorance. Hence they are both opposed to intellectualism. To the first of these extremes belonged many of the monks of the middle ages. It was their delight to contemplate the mysteries of deity. In mysteries they reveled. The greater the mystery, the greater the emotion excited. Religiously they knew no intellectual difficulties except those in which ignorance gives way to knowledge. They worshipped is no knowledge there is no mystery, there must be knowledge. Where there is no knowledge there iss no mystery. It is also true that where there is no ignorance there is no mystery. There is mystery because we know, but know only in part. So it is not what he knows about God, but what he does not know, that excites the admiration and receives the devotions of this class of mystics. Like the Samaritans, these mystics worship that which they do not know. The intellectualist knows what he worships. The mystic's altar is erected to the unknown in God. The intellectualist erects his to the known. The mystic loves the Bible because of its incomprehensibility. He uses the Bible as a means of stirring his emotions rather than as a means of instructing his intellect. He is guided, not by truth, but by feeling. This class of mystics, may, about some things, be very intelligent, but their religion is a sentiment based upon mystery. The second class of mystics are much more demonstrative. To this class belong the "holy rollers" and many of the "holiness" people. Here the emotions are not usually stirred by a presentation of the truth or by contemplating the mystery of godliness. Loud speaking and vigorous jesticulating, together with vivid descriptions and exciting stories, these stir the emotions of this class. Familiarity with this kind of emotionalism makes it unnecessary to describe it more fully. There is a sane emotionalism. It is dependent upon sane intellectualism. What the intellect knows of divine things, excites the emotions and moves the soul to action. Its love is rational, so also is its hatred. Sane emotionalism is emotionalism dependent upon and controlled by sane intellectualism. Neither ignorance nor superstition, but Christian intelligence is the necessary background of Christian emotionalism.

Voluntaryism finds the seat of religion in the will. With it, religion is neither thought nor feeling, but action. Of it there are two forms, ritualistic and ethical. The first form is represented by ritualistic religions. It is usually more insistent upon forms and ceremonies than upon good morals. When a man has observed these, whatever else he may or may not do, his salvation is assured. It is religion without morality and requires but little knowledge. The second form is represented by humanitarian morality. The highest duty it knows is that which we owe to man. Its God is humanity; its religion, humanitarianism. It knows no service but that which is rendered to man. It inculcates honesty, temperance, purity and charity. It is a patron of learning. So far as it goes, it is good, but it does not go far enough. It would reform humanity without regeneration. It is religion without godliness. Each of these forms exalts works above faith. There is a sane voluntaryism. It knows that faith without works is dead, and it is just as certain that works without faith are dead. It is humanitarian and it is godly. It recognizes the two great commandments. It serves both God and man.

Such are the types of piety. Higher criticism is a method of intellectualism. Like intellectualism it may swing to either of two extremes. If there is an insane higher criticism, there is also a sane higher criticism. The sane and the insane should not be indiscriminately condemned. Since a sane intellectualism is a necessary element in the Christian religion, Christianity and sane higher criticism cannot be incompatible. But Christianity involves belief in the Bible as the word of God and worship of Jesus Christ as the Son of God. It follows, therefore, that a higher critic may be a believer in the Bible as the word of God and a worshipper of Christ as God's Son. The sane higher critic is a devout seeker after truth. This is both legitimate and necessary, but such investigators are exposed to great dangers. Let us pray for them. I suggest as a model the following prayer taken from the "Biblical World.":

O God, Father, Savior, and Revealer, sanctify all those who in the midst of truth seek more truth. As they question the authority of the past, increase their loyalty to the things which are eternal. May liberty of thought leave unsullied the simplicity of their trust in Thee. As the steep ascent of truth reveals the ever-widening horizon of Thy thought, lead them in the narrow path of humble and sacrificial service. Enable them to share the joy of their emancipation without weakening other men's faith in the God of their own experience. May pride of learning never chill the warmth of prayer. May opposition and misinterpretation arouse within them no bitterness or plans for retaliation. As by Thy grace they are led into deeper sympathy with their Lord, may they give to the world their new assurance of the triumph of His kingdom rather than the agony of their struggle with doubt. And ever amid the clash of argument may they find the peace that passeth understanding in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

WHO WILL EXPLAIN?

The following comes from a Pittsburgh man who says a doctor of philosophy of Harvard University was puzzled for two or three days by it. We will be disappointed if we do not receive an explanation of it from some of our readers before we go to press next week.

$$16-36=25-45$$

$$16-36+20\tfrac{1}{4}=25-45+20\tfrac{1}{4}$$

Extract square root of each side:

$$4-4\tfrac{1}{2}=5-4\tfrac{1}{2}$$

Therefore $4=5$

Where is the erroneous step leading to the false result?

—Bishop Wilson, of the Methodist Episcopal church, says: "The religious press of the country had more to do with the passage of the Webb-Kenyon temperance bill than any other influence."

NOTES FROM THE FIELD

I visited Haw River Circuit on the 28th and 29th of June. Bro. J. M. Weatherly met me at Brown Summit and took me to Friendship at 11 A. M. A small attendance on account of sickness, forgetfulness, neglect and indifference. The few present gave good heed to the word, and I enjoyed the service. The Friendship people have a splendid house of worship, and when they get the balance of their seats and paint it on the inside it will be nice. This I trust will be done real soon.

Bro. J. M. Jones met me at Friendship and he and I took dinner with Bro. Wm. Maxwell. We reached Mizpah about on time. There was a fair attendance of women, but a small number of men present. This was one of the most busy trips with the people that I have found since I have been traveling the District.

The people at Mizpah need a new church, and I hope the membership will soon see and realize the fact, and will at no distant day build a church in keeping with their ability. I am aware they have lost some of their good substantial members by removal and otherwise; but they have some good men, women and young people in the church left, and if this or any other church expects to hold their young people they must have a neat, nice attractive church in order to do so.

Bro. Dillon Moore took me to his home to spend the night on my way to Midway, which I did very pleasantly. His son conveyed me to the church Sunday A. M., where I preached to a splendid congregation.

I took dinner with Bro. L. R. Dixon, and he and I drove to Fair Grove for 3 o'clock service. Here we had a splendid attendance and extra attention. These people have improved their church recently, also Midway since I saw them last.

This is a splendid field of labor. I am real sorry Bro. Fogleman had to give up this field; but I feel and the people know we have succeeded in filling his place by securing Bro. Ashburn as a supply. I bespeak for him the cooperation and help of every member on the charge.

I took supper with Mrs. I. R. Troxler. Preached at Brown Summit Sunday night.

Will write up S. Paul charge soon. Claim over paid. C. A. Cecil.

PIEDMONT CIRCUIT

Things are moving along very well on this part of the work. Our congregations are growing at all the services, and this is an encouraging feature. Children's Day was observed at Mt. Pleasant on last Sunday and a large crowd was out to see and hear the program rendered. The children all carried out their parts well, and we are sure it was enjoyed by all. The offering was not what it ought to have been, but we are thankful for it just the same. Our special meeting will begin at Union Grove the third Sunday in July, and we ask the prayers of the Christians that we may have a glorious revival. Bro. Hulin will be the pulpit help. The third quarterly meeting for this work will convene at Canaan on Saturday before the first Sunday in August. Preaching at 11 o'clock, and the business of the conference in the afternoon. Official members will take notice and act accordingly. Fraternally,

A. D. Shelton.

Sandy Ridge, Oak Ridge Ct.

Since my last report, Bro. W. R. Lowdermilk has filled his regular appointment with two fine sermons which were enjoyed by a fair sized coongregation. All seem to like Bro. Lowdermilk's preaching. Our special meeting will begin the first Sunday in September with Rev. D. A. Braswell as pulpit help. If we can succeed in having a Holy Ghost revival, I believe that our church will be in as good shape as it has been in several years. There seems to be a better interest manifested in the Sunday school work than usual. I believe that if we can get those 45 bright eyed little boys and girls of the primary class filled with the fundamental principles of God's eternal truth there will be a bright day for Sandy Ridge. The materal is there; if we can only get it worked up it will mean a bright future for our church. I ask the readers of Herald to pray that God's Holy Spirit may operate on the hearts of unsaved fathers, mothers and the young people that they be converted and saved into the kingdom of God. I deem it a grand privilege to solicit the prayers of the Christian people through the Herald. When I find a request for prayer, I stop reading and breathe a prayer to God asking him to grant or bless the object in view and I gain strength thereby.

Our Children's Day service will be held the second Sunday in July. Program is short, therefore a missionary sermon by the pastor will occupy part of the day. All are cordially invited to be present.

The community were made sad by the death of Yancey Clark, one among the oldest of our members. Last Monday morning about five o'clock he was paralyzed, being unable to speak any more; he lingered until about twelve o'clock Wednesday night, when his spirit took its flight. Bro. Clark at one time served as a class leader and Sunday school superintendent at Sandy Ridge and was very active in the service of the Lord. Funeral service on Thursday at eleven a. m. conducted by Rev. W. R. Lowdermilk. He leaves a wife, two sons, two daughters, one daughter having preceded him to the glory world. He was laid in the Sandy Ridge Cemetery to await the resurrectioon morning. We commend the bereaved ones to God who is able to bind up the broken hearted. Success to the Herald and its readers.

FROM REV. D. A. BRASWELL

The Board of Trustees of Denton High School has ordered me to collect $500.00 to pay balance due on property and to complete improvements already begun. Knowing things as I do at Denton, I am sure this is a worthy cause. Our cause at Denton not only will succeed, but has succeeded, and we now want to push it on to greater success. The school offers free tuition to ministerial students and to the children of ministers. Surely we as a church ought to show some appreciation by paying for the needed improvements on the building and grounds. I want to ask every reader of this who is interested in the progress of our church to send me whatever amount they feel like giving. I wish 500 of our friends would send us $1 each. Some will pay more and some less, but by all means pay something. The foundation work of any enterprise is most important of all. This school is engaged in laying foundations upon which many of the future ministers of our Conference are to build. If it should meet the approval of the church this school can begin the work of the College, so that when the College is located we will have students ready to enter College and complete their work. Any one wishing to give any amount to this worthy cause will please send it to me at Concord, N. C. Who will be the first to send us any amount?

Yours in the work,

D. A. Braswell.

A TONGUE-TWISTER.

Try this on your vocal organ. Say it over several times, and say it fast: "A rat ran over the roof with a lump of raw liver in his mouth."

Mrs. Highbrow—Don't you find the Stone Age interesting?

Mrs. Lowbrow—Yes, indeed! Willie's just that age now; but it's awfully hard on the windows.—Brooklyn Life.

THIS IS WORTH CONSIDERING.

If you have a sum of money you purpose giving to God's work, but still need the income therefrom, it would insure you a dependable income during your life, if you would now give the money to the Board of Foreign Missions, and receive its bond which stipulates what interest you will receive annually, and at your death, without any contest, expense, delay, etc., your money will be applied to our foreign missionary work.

You thus become your own executor, and have the satisfaction, in that case, of knowing that your money will go where you want it.

The Annuity Fund of the Board of Foreign Missions is now definitely established by the gift of Five Thousand Dollars from a worthy brother and Two Hundred Dollars from another previously, and others are considering the matter. All money now given to the Board of Foreign Missions on the Annuity Plan will, by its potential value, help to guarantee the future growth and success of our foreign missionary work. Write to me for particulars.

Every Sunday school is under obligation to impart right teaching and training to all the scholars so as to lead them to Christ and fit them for Christian work. The Board of Foreign Missions yearly prepares and sends free to our schools its Children's Day service complete.

Its educational value lies in its special messages from the President of the General Conference and the Board, latest facts and figures from our Japan work, illustrations of our workers and phases of the work, etc., besides the regular features, music, recitations, etc.

This is the twenty-eighth year for the Service, and while more schools thus far have ordered the supplies than the last two years during the same period, there are many schools that have not sent me their order.

It is not too late for your school to hold the Service, for orders are reaching me daily. Send your order at once. Do your part now in helping the Board maintain the successful work in Japan. The help of every school is urgently needed. Do not fail us at this critical time.

A BIT OF ROYAL DISCIPLINE.

The following story relates to a bit of insubordination on the part of King Edward when he was a child.

One day at Windsor Palace he stood at a French window looking out upon the gardens when he should have been studying. His governess remonstrated with him, but to no avail. Finally she told him that if he did not learn his lessons she would have to put him in a corner.

"I won't learn," answered the youngster; "and I won't stand in a corner, for I am the Prince of Wales!" At this he kicked vigorously at the window and broke two panes. The governess at once sent for his father, the Prince Consort, and told him the whole circumstance.

"Sit down there," said Prince Albert to his son, pointing to an ottoman, "and wait till I return." When he came back, he carried a Bible. "Listen now," he admonished the boy, "to what the holy apostle Paul says to you and other children in your position." He then read Galatians iv. 1, 2: "Now I say, That the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all; but is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father." "It is true," continued Prince Albert, "that you are the Prince of Wales; and if you conduct yourself properly you may become a man of high station, and even after the death of your mother may become King of England. But now you are a little boy who must obey his tutors and governors. Besides, I must impress upon you a saying of the wise Solomon in Proverbs xiii. 24: 'He that spareth his rod hateth his son: but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes.' " At this he gave the heir to the British throne a tingling chastisement, after which he stood him up in the corner, saying: "You will stand there and study your lesson till Miss Hillyard gives you leave to come out. And never forget that you are now under tutors and governors, and that hereafter you will be under a law given by God."—Pacific Baptist.

OF INTEREST TO FARMERS.

Atlanta, Ga., June 26.—In the effort to encourage Southern farmers to raise more hogs, the Southern Railway, through its Live Stock Department, has issued a booklet entitled, "Hog Production and Conditions for Success in the South," a copy of which will be furnished on request by F. L. Word, Live Stock Agent, Atlanta, Ga.

The booklet contains much practical and valuable information as to the care and feeding of hogs, selection of breeds, treatment of diseases, and cutting and curing meat. Chapters on each subject have been supplied by expeerts.

That the South consumes more pork and raises less than any other part of the United States despite the fact that pork can be produced more cheaply in the South than in the North or West, is a well known fact and a condition that greatly impedes the progress of the section. The long open season and the great variety of food crops at his command give the Southern farmer the opportunity to make more money raising hogs than is possible in any other territory.

The Live Stock Department of the Southern Railway devotes its efforts entirely to stimulating interest in live stock raising in the territory along the Southern Railway and the services of its experts are available without charge of any kind to any farmer or other person interested in live stock.

—The practice of chewing gum has often been deprecated and not without good reason, it must be admitted. The experience of a girl in Arkansas, however, furnishes argument on the other side of the question. This girl stumbled over a stone and fell down. Imagine her horror when she saw within a few inches of her face a huge rattlesnake. Fortunately she was chewing gum. When she fell her gum flew out of her mouth and landed square in the snake's mouth. The snake closed his fangs on the gum and while he was thus occupied the girl sprang up and killed him. The snake had 16 rattles and a button.—The Pathfinder.

On the second Sunday in June our president was with us and at eleven o'clock preached an excellent sermon. We were more than glad to have him with us in our church and in our homes as well. In the evening Bro. R. L. Yokley closed his singing school at this place.

Our Sunday school is getting on finely and the prayer meeting continues every Wednesday night. We are so glad that our pastor, Rev. A. D. Shelton, is with us and can be in the prayer meetings and in our homes. We are always glad to see him come. Let us pray God's richest blessing to rest upon him that he may preach the gospel and not falter by the way.

The death angel visited our community June 22, and claimed for its victim Miss Nannie Clodfelter. She had been in bad health for some time, but did not forsake her Master. She was faithful to the end; she said she wanted to die and go home to heaven, and asked her friends and loved ones to meet her there. Dear mother and loved ones, I say, weep not, Nannie is not dead, but has has just begun to live. She has been a member of Canaan M. P. church from the time it was organized until she died. We as a church feel our loss, this being the first death that has come to us since we organized. Her funeral was conducted by her pastor, Rev. A. D. Shelton, and the body was gently laid to rest in Bethesda grave yard to await the resurrection morn. May the grace of the great of the great Divine comfort the bereaved mother and family and may we all prepare to meet her are not felt.

Harmony, S. C.

Our pastor, Brother Lamar, was here in full trim last Sunday. He preeached a good sermon to an attentive congregation. He seems to be growing in favor with all the people. I would boast a little, but for fear of getting our delegate into trouble at Conference; will refrain at this time and another thing I might get Uncle Peter Slewfoot on me, but I don't think him to be very dangerous if kept full of ham and chicken.

Our Sunday night was taken up by the children and the service was real nice. The children did act and sing their pieces so well, and we had the best of order. The ladies had prepared for the occasion, getting a new lamp and the lights were readjusted so we had good light. Bro. Lamar had to compliment us for our good behavior and made the remark that this was one children's service he had enjoyed. Tell Uncle Peter please close his ears and eyes and let me boast a little bit.

It is a very busy time with the farmers down here and most of our children work on the farm and the larger children had no time to practice for the children's service, so the most of the program was carried out with the wee tots and it is surprising how Mrs. Nannie Balentine and Miss Sudie Medlock can teach them to act, with Miss Joe Balentine at the organ to teach them how to sing.

There was a large, attentive congregation, with a collection of about eight dollars. Tell Brother Bethea we want to hear more of him as to that fish. Tell him to back and come again.

BURLINGTON

Last Sunday was Re-union Day in our Sunday school. The attendance was not as good as expected. There were 215 present and the offering was $3.80. The scholars in Miss Ila Stafford's class, who are among the smallest children in our school, took part in the opening exercises, rendering special selections and repeating the Lord's Prayer in concert.

On Sunday night we held our Children's Day Service, which was well attended. The children did splendid work, considering the short time in which they practiced their songs and recitations. The choir, under the direction of Bro. G. L. Amick, rendered some splendid selections appropriate for the occasion. Quartets were beautifully sung by Messrs. G. L., T. A., and C. B. Amick, W. E. Crutchfield, and Miss Alene Amick. The entire seating capacity of the church was filled and part of the annex used in accommodating the audience. The offering taken at this service, which goes to the Board of Home Missions, amounted to about $15.00.

Last Wednesday evening, June 25th, the Twenty-first anniversary of our church was held under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid Society. It was a most delightful occasion and one long to be remembered by Burlington Methodist Portestants. The church and Sunday school rooms were very beautifully and tastefully decorated with various decorations, presenting a scene of rare beauty. The evening was spent in a sociable manner, with the exception of a short period of time devoted to the anniversary exercises, which consisted of quartets by Messrs. Amick brothers and W. E. Crutchfield, and a paper giving the organization and history of the church by Bro. R. F. Williams. Piano music was furnished by Miss Flossie Loy and others. Light refreshments were served by the ladies. It was an evening of real pleasure and sociability to those so fortunate as to be present.

GET THE HABIT

Here are some excellent hints on habit forming which we feel sure will be profitable.

One of the habits that we deem desirable for the children is that of church attendance; but it is an exceedingly rare junior boy who has a spontaneous or natural tendency to go to church. Some persons think that they find a solution to the problem when the compel their children to attend the church service, and they do thus secure the repetition of the outward act; but that does not of necessity produce the habit.

When there can be an appeal to the elemental instinct of affection it is the most powerful stimulus. But there are many children who cannot at first be influenced solely in that way to undertake the regular doing of things which are not in themselves in line with their native interests. We know that it is vitally important that the child shall attend Sunday school regularly and punctually, that he shall establish a habit of giving systematically to the church, and of attending the church service.

We wish him to bring his own Bible for use in Sunday school, and to use it in the home every day, following the directions in his Work Book. The question is not, how can we make each child do these things, but how can we make him wish to do them?

Fortunately for us, the instincts of ambition, emulation, imitation, pugnacity and pride develop and strengthen in the junior period. It is easy to see that each of these, if untrained, might become a menace to the character; but the encouraging fact is that in appealing to these natural tendencies to assist in establishing right habits, we are training the instincts themselves to the higher plane where they become allies of all that is noble and honorable. Take, for instance, pugnacity. Our ordinary conception of the word would leap to the supposition that pugnacity must always find expression through the fists, whereas it is the force, which, when rightly directed, makes people fight to gain the victory over every hard task and keep up the struggle until they win.

In every Junior Department there should be an honor roll on which to place each month the names of the pupils who have gained a certain number of credits during the preceding four or five weeks. In order to insure absolute fairness, a record of credits must be kept in each class and the honors awarded on this record. If the pupils are permitted to decide by vote how many credits shall be required for a place on the honor roll, an additional benefit will be that their sense of justice and power of self-government will be developed.

TIPS FOR TEACHERS

Here are some splendid points for teachers, given by an active pastor, which we are glad to pass on.

The teacher must keep in mind that a single truth well learned is better than a whole lesson skimmed over.

Love is the great moral force of the universe and he who loves most conquers all things, even bad boys.

Even those truths which have been fairly learned are not sure to be retained in the memory without reviewing.

Love is after all the chief attraction in Sunday school. It is the only power which reaches every scholar alike. Try it.

In the winning of scholars to Christ there are many agencies and helps, "but the greatest of these is love."

Not all teachers have, or can have, every qualification for a teacher's work, but every teacher can love and be loved.

Whenever a strange answer comes to the teacher's question, the teacher should see if it is not a fair answer, even though it be an unexpected one.

A question from a scholar often discloses more of his thoughts and his needs than would appear from a score of questions from the teacher.

Many a scholar who fails to recognize the love of Jesus as it is told in the class and in His Word will see it, and rejoice in it, when it is shown reproduced in its living beauty in the character of a loving teacher.

We want to give one more point, join a Teacher Training class, or better yet, start one yourself. Now is the time.

Remember the Board has an excellent book, Training the Teacher, paper 35c., cloth 50c. Send all orders to C. H. Hubbell, Adrian, Michigan.

SUNSHINE WORK FOR ENDEAVORERS.

Try forming a sunshine club among the members of your Christian Endeavor society. The following plan for such club has been found to be very successful with the society members in one church.

A leader was chosen, whose duty it was to secure the addresses of shut-ins, invalids, and others in need of help and cheer. The address was then given to the other club members, each of whom sent a card, letter, dime, or other token previously agreed upon.

These visits may be made weekly, monthly, or as often as the club-members feel able to do so. If your society is a large one, several members are required as leaders. Such a Sunshine Club may also be organized among the members of the Church.

Birthday and Wedding Celebration.

Mr. J. A. Walker celebrated his 63d birthday June 29th, also celebrated his 38th wedding day all in one. There were 33 relatives and friends present. He had all of his children and grandchildren with them. The refreshments were at 12:30 o'clock. The table was beautifully decorated with flowers and was filled to its capacity with good things to eat; all present seemed to have a day of enjoyment. In the afternoon we sang several hymns and about 5 o'clock we all left for home, leaving Mr. and Mrs. Walker alone, wishing them the blessings of life. A Friend.

Mrs. Mary Field Coble.

On June 12, 1913, the soul of Mrs. Mary Coble was called from earth to everlasting rest and joy. She was born near Climax, Dec. 5, 1846.

She is survived by a husband and ten children, Mrs. Kirkman, Mrs. Burough, Mrs. Hearst, Mrs. Jackson, and Miss Fannie, Fred, James, Alford, Charles, and Addison, two brothers, Logan and Roddy Field, and one sister, Mrs. Woodburn. After years of suffering day and night the conflict ended and in the dawn of a June morning the silver cord was loosed, and she passed into the presence of her Master beyond the stars. Her faith shone bright and clear amid all the gloom of suffering. The earnest longing of her heart was to depart and be with Christ. She passed through a sea of suffering, but she always kept her eye on the other shore, where she saw the King in his beauty and the land that is very far off. "Made perfect through suffering," the beauty of holiness was in her face, living; and the peace of heaven on her brow, when dead. Therefore she is before the throne of God and in his presence for evermore. Like another Mary, of whom the Bible tells, she very early "chose that good part which shall never be taken away from her," uniting with the M. P. church at Tabernacle, of which she was a faithful member at the time of her death. Her Christianity was of the quiet, unobtrusive kind, always making its genuineness felt in home and in church circles. It is hard to part with those we love, but as one after another passes to the other side—

"Heaven seems more real day by day,
The glad home-land, not far away,
Where none are sick, or lone,
The place where we shall find our own.
And as we think of all we knew,
Who there have met, to part no more,
Our longing hearts desire home, too,
With all the strife and trouble o'er."

Her niece,
Ida Woodburn.

Matthews.

Debbie Matthews was born Oct. 10, 1889, departed this life June 18, 1913. She leaves a husband, father, mother, two sisters and four brothers. She had been suffering off and on for ten years. She bore her suffering patiently, and in the last months she was quiet and patient, and said if God called her she was ready to go; told her husband to meet her in heaven.

May God's blessing comfort the bereaved ones. And may each one of us be ready to say when we come to die, that we are ready to meet him who doeth all things well.

Sain.

Plato Sain was born Feb. 26, 1892, departed this life May 29, 1913. He leaves a mother, father, four brothers, and six sisters. He was a son of Mr. and Mrs. Joe Sain, who live near Laurel Hill church. His remains were placed in the cemetery at Laurel Hill, May 30, 1913.

RESTORING LIFE AFTER DEATH.

If medical science keeps progressing in the future as it has of late years it loooks (to use a Hibernianism) as if death may almost become an unnecessary event in the life of a man. At least it may become possible to prolong life for a much longer period than can be done at the present time. Dr. Soresi, of the Flower hospital, New York, has been performing a number of experiments lately in transfusion of blood and the results are truly amazing.

In discussing some of them Dr. Soresi said that a certain pneumonia patient was entirely without respiration from all known tests applied, and therefore dead, when he made a transfusion of blood from a normal man through the jugular vein of the patient." He adds: "The return to life was prompt and recovery followed in due course. If such transfusions could be made promptly the loss of life could be materially lowered."

The doctor told of a dog from which he had pumped all the blood. The heart stopped beating and the animal was dead as the proverbial door-nail for 15 minutes. Then the dog's blood vessels were connected with those of another dog and the fresh supply of blood was permitted to flow into them. In five minutes life had returned and the dog was yelping in a perfectly normal way.

In cases where death has resulted from accident without injury to any vital organ and where there is no organic disease, the doctor thinks it will be possible to restore persons to life after it has been extinct for half an hour, provided that some way is discovered to connect directly with the left side of the heart. Restoration, he thinks will be possible in cases of gas or drug poisoning, hemorrhages and such diseases as typhoid and pneumonia.—The Pathfinder.

THE SKILL OF A MOUSE.

One day a naturalist lay motionless on a fallen log in the forest and silently watched an animal at play in the grass near by. This was a large, brown-backed mouse—a meadow mouse, that had come out from his home under the log, and, when tired of play, had sat up to make his toilet. Using his forepaws as hands, the mouse combed the white fur on his breast and licked himself smooth and sleek. Satisfied at length with his appearance, he began to search for food.

He did not have far to go, for a few stalks of wheat grew among the thick weeds near at hand. The mouse was so large that he could probably have bent the stalk down and brought the grain within reach. If not, he could certainly have climbed the stalk. He did not try either of these plans, however, for these were not his ways. Sitting up very straight, he bit through the stalk as high as he could reach. The weeds were so thick that the straw did not fall its full length; and the freshly cut end settled upon the ground, with the straw still erect and the grain out of reach. The mouse again bit the straw in two, and again the upper portion settled down. In this way he bit off five lengths of straw before he could bring the grain within reach of his paws. These forepaws were very skillful little hands, and he deftly husked a grain and ate it, sitting erect and holding it to his mouth as naturally as a boy would hold an apple.—Our Animal Friends.

BILLY.

A dozen or more boys were off on a tramp. They had traversed several miles of woods and fields, shouting, racing, climbing trees and rocks and every hill they came to, fling stones at marks and even at a derisive, scampering squirrel, and having what they jubilantly called "a gay old time." At length they emerged from a thick place of woods, skurried through a large apple orchard, and found themselves at an old-fashioned cider press. A number of barrels were lying near the press. Several of the boys sprang forward.

"Hooray!" one of them yelled; "it's old Jobson's press. I heard that he'd been making lots of cider. This must be old enough now too have on a good sting. We're in luck, fellows. Old Jobson lives 'most a mile off, and we can stay and drink as long as we like. There are plenty of straws, and we can slip the bungs out easy. Come on."

But one of the boys held back.

"O, come on, Billy! What are you holding back for?" the leader called derisively.

Then all the boys laughed. Billy turned red and dug his bare feet in the sand. All the other boys had shoes on their feet, and their clothing was mostly good. Billy's were little more than tatters. Billy's father was a common drunkard, and he had only two brothers who were little better than their father. Often his only lodging was a box or a corner of some barn. He knew why they were laughing. They thought it funny, that he, of all boys, should hold back from a drink of hard cider. But as he dug his bare feet in the sand he was thinking of a man who had once placed a hand upon his shoulder and looked down compassionately into his eyes.

"Billy," he had said, "you have a terrible struggle ahead, more terrible than those who go out on the field to do battle, or those who go out on the sea to fight storms. You will have this craving for drink as your inheritance, and you must not only fight your natural weaknesses, but this great evil which your people have thrust upon you. It will be a long, hard fight, Billy, which will never end. If you do not wish to be like your father and brothers, you must keep it up always. You must call on the Lord to help. There is no other way."

Billy did not know much about prayer or much about anything except his squalid home and the hard things he had learned upon the streets. But he did not want to be like his father; he would rather die. And with an unutterable loathing at the thought and that mocking, "What are you holding back for?" ringing in his ears, he dropped suddenly upon his knees in the sand and cried, "Lord, help me! Lord, help me! Lord, help me!"

Some of the boys began to laugh. Two of them caught up things to throw. One hesitated a moment as though doubtful what to do. Then he sprang forward and grasped an uplifted arm.

"Stop that, Tom!" he cried. "Billy's right, and we all know it. He's better than the whole lot of us. No hard cider for me today." He turned abruptly and struck back into the orchard. Several followed him. Then those who had caught up missiles looked at each other shamefacedly, hesitated, dropped what they had picked up, and turned and followed the rest. Billy's prayer for help had been answered.—Frank H. Sweet, in American Messenger.

BENNY'S ROSE

"Say, teacher, are the fuzzy lines the mountains?"

"Yes, Benny. But you must remember not to speak without holding up your hand for permission first."

"Yes'm, and the wavy lines are the seas, ain't they?"

"Yes, the wavy lines are the sea."

Jane, the young teacher, sighed as she took up the papers on her desk. Sometimes it was very hard to be patient with Benny. Of all the children in her schoolroom he was the most trying, although he was always smiling and docile. The teacher had to explain every detail of his work to him over and over again, and she often wondered whether he could ever pass on into the next grade. It seemed to Jane that another year of Benny would be hard to bear.

"Teacher, did you say the fuzzy lines is sea?"

"No, Benny, and what did I just tell you about speaking without holding up your hand?"

"Yes'm, I know, and the wavy lines, they're mountains, ain't they?"

"Now, Benny, listen. The wavy lines show where the water is, and what you call the fuzzy lines are the mountains."

"Yes'm, I thought so," replied Benny, with his inevitable smile. But later, when Jane gathered together the maps that her pupils had been working on, she felt a hysterical annoyance when she saw the strange sea-growing mountains and inland oceans that Benny had drawn upon his paper.

"To-morrow," she thought, "I'll have him sit right by my side, and I'll just make him understand." But the next day Benny was not at school, and after two days Jane hunted out the wretched little flat where Benny lived. A draggled bit of black and white crape on the door made her shudder with sudden dread as she knocked.

"You was his teacher, wasn't you?" asked the sorrow-stricken woman who let her into the bare little room.

"Yes."

"He was talking about you yesterday. He wanted to see you, but there wasn't nobody to send. It was terrible quick, the croup, you see." The mother spoke with a stolid calmness that made Jane's heart ache. "He was always telling me what nice clothes you wore, and he said you talked soft, like a rose. I laughed at him, but I know now what he meant. He was saving up to buy you a rose for Christmas. Here's the pennies he'd got." Benny's mother took seven coppers out of a cracked teacup on the bureau and handed them to Jane. "I guess he'd like it if you'd buy yourself a rose."

She drew back the sheet that covered the small, still figure on the bed, and Jane's eyes overflowed as she saw the little lips curved in the same smile that had so often baffled her in the schoolroom. "Bless him, now he understands," she murmured, kissing his brow.

A few minutes later, when she stood in a florist's shop, selecting a rose to put in the little hand, her tears fell on the pennies in her own hand, and she said to herself, "Oh, I wasn't worthy, I wasn't worthy of Benny's love."—Youth's Companion.

POPULAR TALKS ON LAW

THE LAW OF GROWING CROPS

By Walter K. Towers, A. B., J. D., of the Michigan Bar

John Skinner planted a row of apple trees on his own land, some six feet from the boundary line. The trees flourished and eventually the branches extended over Neighbor Wilder's property and the roots, being no respecters of legal titles, pushed across under Wilder's soil. In a fall of big fruit crops the sight of so much fine fruit hanging over his property aroused Wilder. He bethought himself of the principle of law that a man's property extends indefinitely unward and indefinitely downward, got his ladder, and leaning it against the branches above his own property, picked the fruit that dangled there. He kept entirely on and over his own land in harvesting the fruit.

Skinner sued Wilder for unlawfully taking his apples and recovered damages. The court ruled that though the apples dangled over Wilder's land they grew on a tree the main trunk of which was exclusively and entirely on Skinner's land, that it was Skinner's tree and all of the fruit on it Skinner's property. It was Wilder's right to keep limbs from extending over his property by cutting them off, but he had no right to take any of Skinner's property because it extended past his line.

In cases where trees are planted on the boundary or so close that the main limbs extend directly into the other parcel of land, the general rule is that the owners of the adjoining lands are proprieters of the tree as tenants in common and so must share its produce. If either should injure the tree the other may have his remedy against him.

Generally speaking, whatever is attached to the earth is real property and so remains as long as it is so attached. This applies to grains and grasses as well as to the fruit upon trees and bushes. This should always be kept in mind in selling cultivated lands of any kind. All crops growing thereon, being a part of the realty, will pass under the deed to the new purchaser, unless they are specifically reserved. In some jurisdictions certain annual crops may be reserved orally, but it is always best, and usually absolutely necessary, that the reservation be a written clause in the conveyance. Crops that are unharvested at the time of a mortgage sale, being still attached to the land, are realty and pass to the purchaser under the mortgage sale. So, too, one who recovers land by ejectment secures all the growing crops attached to the land, as in view of the law they are part of it and so pass to the successful claimant of title.

When you lease land have an eye to the title of your landlord, or you may lose your crop while it is still growing. You secure no better rights than the man from whom you lease and if there is a mortgage due and he does not pay it the land may be sold and the growing crops pass to the purchaser. So, too, the landlord might not have good title and a successful claimant in ejection would also oust you.

Langdon Cummings owned forty acres on the River Road. The land was heavily mortgaged and Cummings was troubled with a load of other debts. Saulson, a large, unsecured creditor, secured a judgment against Cummings and sought to enforce it by levy. Cummings had a fine patch of blackberries and another of wheat. Both the berries and the wheat were levied upon. The levy upon the berries was defeated; that upon the wheat allowed. The reason was that the levy was effective only against personalty and the court regarded berries as realty but wheat as personalty, and this though both were still attached to the soil.

Though all crops are realty as long as they remain physicaly attached to the land for certain purposes as pointed out above there are other points of view from which certain crops are regarded as personalty and others as realty. This important distinction is the one the law draws between what it refers to as fructes naturales and fructes industriales; and it matters not to the law that the fruit grower feels that his are rather the products of industry than of nature. But the law provides a different classification for those crops which are produced annually year after year from the same root, as the fruits of trees, vines and bushes and grasses. Crops, on the other hand, that result from annual planting, fertilizing and cultivation, are regarded as different. The former are fructes naturales and are viewed as real property at all times. The latter are fructes industriales, or emblements, and while realty so that they pass with the land when title is transferred, they are viewed as personal property in regard to matters of sale, levy, etc. It is to be borne in mind that the former class, fructes naturales, become personal property as soon as they are detached from the realby cutting or harvesting.

Emblements, the annual, cultivated crops being regarded as personal property for purposes of sale, may be transferred by oral sale as they stand in the fields, while a writing is generally required in the transfer of fructes naturales. Emblements being realty may be levied on as such. If harvested before a mortgage sale is consummated they are not transferred with the property under mortgage sale.

One who wrongfully or carelessly damages the growing crop of another is legally liable to make good the loss in damages. The owner of the growing crop may always vindicate his right that it be not injured. If the crop be totally destroyed the damages are the value of the crop at the time and place it was destroyed. Partial damage is estimated upon the same basis. The owner of the crop may not take as the measure of damages what he expected to get for the crop when it was all ripe and harvested. The law doesn't encourage counting one's chickens before they are hatched. Neither may the wrongdoer escape by paying merely the cost expended upon the crop to the time of injury. The evidence of those familiar with crops and conditions is secured and the damage based on the value of the crop at the time and place it was injured—how much the owner could have sold it for as it stood at that time.

Many disputes arise between landlord and tenant about crops. If a tenant pays a cash rent for the land upon which he grows his crops and plants only crops which mature before their term ends—no difficulty occurs. The tenant owns the crops produced. But if a tenant for a definite term plants crops which mature after the end of that term, he is generally not entitled to return after the end of his term and claim the crop, though a few states have a different rule. Generally if the term is uncertain as to time the tenant cannot know that any crop will ripen before the term may be terminated and he is allowed to secure all crops which have been planted, returning to care for them after the term shall have been unexpectedly ended. The statutes of some states give to the landlord a lien on the crops of his tenant for the rent due.

One who occupies and farms the farm of another upon the shares becomes his tenant and the crops produced are their common property. If no fixed time has been set for dividing the shares division is due when the crop is harvested. In the case of a season cropper who simply comes upon the acreage to cultivate it, not living upon the premises or occupying them, the crops are at all times the property of the landlord and the cropper has no transfrelandlord and the cropper has no transferclaims have been satisfied.

The motorist emerged from beneath the car, and struggled for breath. His helpful friend, holding the oil-can, beamed upon him. "I've just given the cylinder a thorough oiling, Dick, old man," said the helpful friend.

"Cylinder!" said the motorist, heatedly: "that wasn't the cylinder. It was my ear!" —Selected.

THE DAWN.

For every soul there is a sun—
Behold it shortly after dawn!
That sends its rays of light abroad
And touches darkness—and it is gone.
Whene'er the veil is raised from off
The heart of man, entrapped in sin,
It scatters all the shades of wrong over yonder where pain and sickness
That group around the life within.

Just as the brilliant morning sun
Drives all the dark of night away,
So will the sun of righteousness
Pierce deep the sin of human prey.
Then paths, where human feet must tread,
Will all be bright and safe and clear,
And through the vale to yonder goal
There'll be no danger and no fear.

To seek the better ways in life,
And journey forward in the right,
Unveil the sinful darkened heart,
And let shine in the holy light.
Then selfishness, and jealousy;
Injustice, hate, and envy, gone,
The great beatitudes of God
Will come, like sunrise after dawn.

DENTON HIGH SCHOOL

——OPENS SEPTEMBER 1, 1913——

DENTON is situated in the Piedmont hills of Davidson County twenty miles South from Thomasville on the Carolina and Yadkin River Rail Road. This Railroad connects us with the Southern at Thomasville and High Point on the north and with the Southbound at High Rock on the South. About 350 yards west from the depot on Salisbury Street, nestling among a beautiful grove of oaks, is the home of Denton High School.

OUR COURSE OF STUDY prepares for any College, also for our State University. We give each student personal atention and do everything necessary for their comfort and advancement. A thoroughly competent teacher has been employed for the Music Department, and those who take this course will receive special attention. A High School Business Course will be taught free of charge as to tuition. Special work in Pedagogy for those who intend to teach.

FREE TUITION to ministerial students and children of the ministers of the North Carolina Conference. Cost of all necessary expenses for a year ranges from $115 to $145. We board students in good private homes. Indigent young men can get rooms and board themselves at actual cost. If any one wishes to pay a part or even all expenses by work, write the Principal for particulars. The school uses water from deep drilled wells with pumps, which eliminates all danger from germs in the water. Pure air, pure water, plenty of work; if these do not give health to the student, he will never have it. Write the Principal at Denton, N. C., for any further information.

WORLD CONFERENCE WITH A VIEW TO CHRISTIAN UNITY.

The Protestant Episcopal Church in October, 1910, appointed a Commission to bring about a Conference for the consideration of questions as to the faith and order of the Christian Church, in the hope that such a Conference will promote the cause of Christian Unity. That Commission is inviting all Christian Communions throughout the world which confess our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour to unite with the Episcopal Church in arranging for and conducting such a Conference. More than twenty such co-operating Commissions have been appointed, including all the leading Communions in the United States and the Church of England in England and Canada. Invitations are now being sent to the other leading Communions outside the United States as fast as the names and addresses of their officers can be obtained. The Episcopal Commission is publishing leaflets, explaining the scope and methods of the Conference, and giving a list of books on Christian Unity, and those leaflets have been circulated all over the world. The Commission is glad to send them free to any one who will apply for them to the Secretary, Robert H. Gardiner, Gardiner, Maine. He has received probably ten thousand, or more, letters on the subject, coming from every part of the world and from members of every Communion, Protestant and Catholic. Persons applying are entered on a permanent mailing list, so that they will receive all future publications.

The Episcopal Communion is trying to carry on the undertaking in the spirit of Bishop Brent, who urged at the meeting when the Commission was organized, that the side of organization shall not be made too prominent, but that we shall seek spiritual power. The first step shall be, in a new and full and deep way, to rededicate ourselves to God, free from past prejudices, in order that, so losing ourselves, we may have a spiritual power simply compelling.

Ministers and lay men and women in North Carolina to the number of 124 have already been brought together, at least to the extent of enrollment on the list, which is arranged geographically so that those who are interested enough in Christian Unity to apply to be placed on the list may obtain the names of others in their neighborhood also interested, with whom they can meet for united prayer for the reunion of Christians and for conference as to how it can best be brought about. The list includes Disciples of Christ, Congregationalists, Baptists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Moravians, Reformed Church in the U. S. and Roman Catholics. The Executive Committee of the Commission of the Episcopal Church, of which the Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Rector of Trinity Church, New York, is Chairman, has recently issued a circular letter urging such local conferences. The World Conference may not be held for a number of years, for it will be a long undertaking to get the approval of all the leading Communiones all over the world, though the project is being received with great cordiality.

"THE SPEECH OF ANTICHRIST," AND OF AN ENEMY OF THE STATE

Separation of church and state is a priceless boon. By conviction and training, I am led to view with alarm any attempt to bring about an unholy union where Christ has not joined but put asunder.

"My kingdom is not of this world." The Church of Rome has never repudiated its ancient antagonism to this principle. Rather, having grown in power, she reasserts and proposes to rule boldly, asking her followers to help change our most cherished institutions. Political rule is outside the province of any church, and Rome's rule has always meant ruin. When the Roman hierarchy asserts that "the Church will not come to her own until there are more Catholics in Congress," as a Lutheran I say "it is the speech of Antichrist," and as a citizen, "it is treason."—Rev. Walter Koenig, St. Paul's Evang. Lutheran Church, Paterson, N. J.

—"Bishop Gilmour in his Lenten Letter, March, 1873, said: 'Nationalities must be subordinate to religion, and we must learn that we are Catholics first and citizens next. God is above man and the church above the state.'

"When the Jesuits were driven out of Berlin, they declared that they would plant themselves in the western territories of America. And they are there today with empires in their brains. Expelled for their intrigues even from Catholic countries, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Mexico, Brazil and other States, they are free to colonize in the great West, and are there gathering and plotting to Romanize and control our Western empire. Lafayette, himself a Romanist, was not wholly blind when he said: "If the liberties of the American people are ever destroyed, they will fall by the hands of the Romish clergy.' "—Selected.

HOT WEATHER HYGIENE

First of all, be clean. Keep clean, inside and out. A daily bath is just as essential as the daily breakfast, if not more so. An all-over bath in the morning and a sponge bath at night are none too much. The morning bath will put you in good condition for the day's work, and a sponge bath at night will enable you to sleep better.

Drink plenty of water, but don't drink ice water to an excess. Most soda fountain beverages are palatable and harmless, but being sweetened they tend to produce thirst. Just plain, clean, cold water is the best of all summer drinks.

Excesses of all kinds should be avoided. If you have any regard for your physical welfare, shun indulgence in alcoholic drinks.

As to what to eat and how much to eat in summer—too much is worse than none heating. Most people eat too much meat, heat ing. Most people eat too much meat, anyway. Cut it out, and cut down expenses. Eat ripe fruit, but don't let it be overripe. Eat vegetables well cooked. Don't indulge in rich, heavy pastries.

Heat has killed more people than cold—therefore dress lightly. Don't wear heavy clothing. Don't follow the fashion unless fashion prescribes light, cool garments.

Last, don't hurry. Start a little sooner, and you won't have to run.

Between the twenty-third of June and the third of July the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution will make the same journey that Washington made in 1775, when he went from Philadelphia to Cambridge, Massachusetts, to take command of the Continental army. Going by the same route that Washington took they will stop at various points in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts, and dedicate tablets and other memorials.

Few men of any time have been so distinguished among their contemporaries for so many things as the late Lord Avebury, better known as Siir John Lubbock. He was a noted and successful banker; he was alive in improving the condition of the wage-earners by legislation limiting their hours of work and increasing the number of holidays; he urged Parliament to create playgrounds for children in the cities; he was an archeologist, a botanist an entomologist, and the author of many popular books on scientific and other subjects. Although a man of great wealth, he won the affections of the working people. and men of science respected him, although his his pursuit of science was only an avocation.

—A union Christian college is planned for Manila, to be under the direction of seven Protestant missionary societies. The Filipino Conference of the United Brethren Church is advocating a union of Christian churches in the Philippine Islands in one United Protestant Church.

—One hundred and twenty mission representatives in China (two-thirds of them foreigners) met with John R. Mott in a four days' conference in March. It was found that great areas are still unevangelized, and it was voted that no mission should hereafter enter any occupied district without the full consent of the forces already on the ground. It was recommended that all churches should discard every distinctive name and assume only the single title, The Chritian Church in China. A caution was given to the churches of Christendom as to missionary candidates. No candidate should be considered qualified for any form of mission work in China unless he is regarded as capable of assured success in similar work at home. Several of the Chinese present in this conference speak English fluently.

The ice box is often a source of trouble in hot weather. It can not be kept too clean. A frequent scouring with a cleanser containing a good percentage of some alkali, as soda, will keep it in good condition and sweet. Bad odors are disgusting, and they are an indication that something is wrong.

A wonderful human record of Chinese conditions past and present is Charlotte E. Hawes' book, New Thrills in Old China, published by George H. Doran Company. Miss Hawes' narrative is a running commentary on recent Chinese history as well as an account of missionary activities from the time of the final subjugation of the Boxers to the birth of the republic. Here again her views on Chinese conditions are invaluable. Throughout the narrative the reader is given a story of missionaries, as romantic as that of Livingstone; woven through it unconsciously is the personality of the persistent, God-fearing, courageous woman who thinks so little of giving up her entire life to the cause of Christ.

Illustrations from photographs, taken on the mission field, lend added interest to the volume.

—The figures show that illiteracy in the United States has decreased from 10.7 to 7.5 per cent. in the past ten years.

—It is claimed that Miss Susan Steed of Middletown, Conn., holds the world's record for Sunday school attendance. She has been present to answer to her name in the roll call of the Sunday school of the North Congregational church every Sabbath for twenty-five years.

—The Word and Way begins an editorial note with: "The 'apostles' creed' is faulty". Yes. We do not know any creed that is not faulty and very faulty. None of them have anything to say about missions or "teaching them to observe", or the Kingdom of God.

Hurried Eating and Constipation.

Hurried eating is a common contributing cause of constipation as well as other ills. When the food is not properly masticated more energy is required in the upper part of the alimentary canal to reduce it to condition necessary for complete digestion, and in cases in which the vitality is depleted this may so seriously cripple the activity of the lower part of the alimentary canal as to contribute largely to the atonic condition, which is a large factor in such cases. When the food is not fully masticated it is held back in the small intestine as well as in the stomach, and this also has a tendency to establish a sluggish action, which contributes to the condition favorable to constipation. While thorough mastication will not cure those cases which may be largely due to bad mental condition, excessive mixing of food, lack of exercise, overwork, too concentrated food, or some physical defect of the intestine, it is an important factor, and more careful mastication will contribute to improvement in all cases.

This warm winter kept many flies alive and we will have to begin swatting earlier, and more persistently this spring than last. Swatters are of little value except where there are a comparatively few flies. Swatters are just the things for those flies that wintered over. Swat now, for it will be a hopeless case in six weeks.

A MOTHER'S CREED.

I believe in little children as the most precious gift of heaven to earth.

I believe that they have immortal souls created in the image of God, coming from him and to return to him.

I believe that in every child there are infinite possibilities for good or evil, and that the kind of influences with which we surround them in early childhood largely determines their future character.

I believe, too, in work suitable to childhood, and that the joy in doing such work should come to the child largely from the doing of it well.

I believe in freedom, but not in license.

I believe in wisely directing, rather than stifling activity.

I believe in regularity, accuracy, punctuality, industry, and application.

I believe in prompt, cheerful obedience, self-control, and self-forgetfulness.

I believe that in all this my example counts for more than my precept.

I believe in cultivating the intellect and the will, and I believe, too in soul culture; and that out of this cultivation comes the more abundant life, bringing forth the fruits of the Spirit—kindness, gentleness, joy, peace, truth, hope, faith, love, reverence for God, respect for age, consideration for one another, and thoughtfulness for all God's lowly creatures.

I believe that the calling of motherhood is the holiest and should be the happiest of all earth's tasks.

I believe that Christ, who was himself a child, born of a human mother, is the one never-failing Source of help for perplexed, discouraged, or wearied motherhood.

Since to this work, Father, thou hast called me, help me to give it all that thou hast given me of understanding and wisdom and strength and love and gentleness and patience and faithfulness.—Prepared by the Mother's Circle of the Bedford Presbyterian Bible School.

CHILDREN'S HOME
WHERE PASTORS' CONFERENCE WILL BE HELD

SUMMER CONFERENCE NEXT WEEK.

All things are fast getting in readiness for the Conference next week. A letter from Rev. A. G. Dixon, who has kindly undertaken to get the building in readiness for us, says that already beds for 44 have been laced in the home, and that a range will be sent out, also organ, pulpit, chairs, etc., from High Point church. That sounds mighty good to me.

I have just received a letter from Dr. C. H. Beck, our Home Missionary Secretary, saying that he will attend our conference. He will hold a conference with the pastors one afternoon and we hope to arrange for him to make an address on some phase of Home Missions.

We are expecting a fine attendance have heard from 23 already who expect to be present, we are lookking for that many more.

The program as published recently will be carried out, all speakers expect to take the parts assigned them. But the time for two topics was confused in publication. The Address, The History of Preaching, is from 9:30 to 10 a. m., and Best Methods for Promoting a Successful Revival from 10 a. m. to 11:30.

Some Personal Remarks. The writer had thought and planned within himself for several years for such a conference, once a resolution was written and signed by himself and another member of Conference, but after more mature consideration was not introduced, that our Annual Conference establish just such a conference as has been arranged for. Bro. T. M. Johnson and myself have discussed this project often; early in the present year we decided to try to arrange for it. Brother Bethea was in this community and being much interested in the project also, we three met, mapped out the plan, and undertook the consummation of our plans, but not till the whole scheme had been laid before our President and received his most cordial support. In doing this we do not claim any precedence over some others of our Brother Pastors, who, we have since learned, had thought of doing the same thing. Our heart has been set on some scheme for getting our fellow workers together when there is time for fellowship, worship, and meditation and the laying of wiser plans for personal help. We have often felt the need of such a conference; we believe that this conference has an immense possibility for us all. While our speakers have been wisely chosen, we were conscious that there were many more of our brethren who were fitted by experience and training to speak to the edification of us all than could possibly be placed on a program of a few days. We are proud of our list of speakers, we know that you will admit that every man, with one exception, is competent to speak upon the subjects assigned. And we are also proud of the fact that we could arrange another program quite as long and supply it with speakers who could do equal credit to themselves and our North Carolina Conference.

Let every pastor come, we can arrange to accommodate every one, only let us know you are coming a few days in advance. Make this the vacation week when all pastoral cares are left behind.

Be sure to arrive in High Point not later than noon Tuesday. Train from east connects with S. A. L. at Durham at 9:45 from Henderson; those coming from other points can learn from local agents schedule, etc. Arrangements will be made to convey all out to the Home in time for first subject on the program. Please notify Rev. A. G. Dixon or myself that you are coming, unless you are on program, we already have your promise.

Do not forget to pray for the success of this conference. We shall greatly need the help of the Spirit if the conference shall be the best possible.

Fraternally yours, R. M. Andrews.

A PLAIN MAN'S SOLUTION OF A PLAIN MAN'S PROBLEM

Part 2.

BY PROF. C. E. FORLINES

From dogmatism through skepticism to criticism is the course of intellectual development. In early life we were all dogmatic. It is then the tendency to believe both the possible and the impossible, the true and the false. It is the time of credulity. We believe without questioning and affirm or deny without qualification. But no one with growing intellect can long remain an unqualified dogmatist. Soon his experience will contradict some of his beliefs. Then will begin a period of skepticism. He will question either the trustworthiness of his experience or the validity of his beliefs. Rationally he is prepared to do neither. His experience is too limited and his judgment too immature. The danger is that he will be as irrational in his doubts as he has been in his beliefs. Frequently what cannot be tested by his own experience will be discredited. He forgets his limitations. But if he is intellectually honest he will finally begin to discriminate. The true will be differentiated from the false. The process through which this is done is criticism. Through criticism some become confirmed skeptics, but their skepticism is now a critical skepticism. Most men through criticism return to faith, but it is a faith for which they can give a reason.

A man may prefer an implicit, unquestioning faith, the faith of childhood. But he who would have such faith must understand as a child, must think as a child, must be a child. His certitude will be just as great as that of the man who has passed through criticism to faith, but he will be unable to discriminate between the true and the false. If anyone would pass from unquestioning faith to rational faith, he must pass through skepticism and criticism. Almost every great intellectual awakening has been followed by a period of skepticism, and each period of doubt has been followed by a return to faith.

The words "critic," "criticise," "criticism," "criterion," and "certain" are each derived either directly or indirectly from the Greek word krinein. This Greek word means, (1) to discern, discriminate; (2) to inquire, search into, investigate; (3) to judge, decide. Criticism involves at least six things, the critic, the object criticized, the act of criticizing, the standard according to which the criticizing is done, the judgment or criticism made, and the degree of certitude felt in regard to that judgment. Ultimately there are four standards according to which criticisms should be made. When the objects to be criticized are facts, ideas, conceptions, and judgments the standard is the true; when they are actions, the standard is the right; when they are ideals, the standard is the perfect; and when they are ends of pursuit, the standard is the good. The judgments or opinions formed in accordance with these standards are, respectively, factual judgments, ethical judgments, æsthetic judgments, and value judgments. Accordingly, Webster's New International Dictionary thus defines a critic: "One who expresses a reasoned opinion on any matter, as a work of art or a course of conduct, involving a judgment of its value, truth, or righteousness, an appreciation of its beauty or technique, or an interpretation of its meaning." By the same authority criticism is thus defined: "The rules and principles which regulate the practice of the critic." Of course there is a secondary meaning of the word. The just critic condemns defects and praises excellencies. But human nature easily forgets praise, but cannot forgive censure. Hence another meaning of criticism is "harsh or unfavorable judgment." This kind of criticism should never be confused with scientific criticism.

Since there are several classes of facts, factual criticism may be subdivided. One of its subdivisions is called historical criticism. This division of criticism has for its objects all sources of historical information, such as monuments, traditions, fokelore, legends, and literary documents. Its function is to discover and verify historical facts. The Bible is one of the many literary sources of historical information. It is the indispensable source of information concerning the historical Christ and the founding of the great historical religion—Christianity. The study of the Bible for the purpose of discovering historical truth is Bible criticism.

Of Biblical criticism there are three divisions, lower criticism, higher criticism, and exegetical criticism. In each of these divisions the method of investigation is purely inductive. Facts and phenomena are ascertained, collected, and classified, and then such opinions are formed as the facts justify. The purpose in each division is to discover the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth in regard to the objects investigated. In no one of these branches of criticism has the purpose been fully realized. All the facts have not yet been collected and classified. Many of the conclusions are provisional, some of them have been too hastily drawn, and others are positively unwarranted. Some of the methods are defective, and some of the critics are irreverent. A little learning is a dangerous thing, but the remedy is not less learning. So it is with Biblical criticism. Defective and ireverent criticism must be replaced by a more perfect and reverent criticism. Even then, in each of the three divisions of Biblical criticism, the result may be the overthrow or the modification or the confirmation of traditional opinions.

"Lower criticism, textual criticism, is the criticism which aims to reconstruct the autograph texts of the Bible" (Webster's New International Dictionary). It does not seek to interpret the text, nor to ascertain its origin. Its one purpose is to construct a text corresponding exactly to the autograph text. Of no book in the Bible have we the autograph manuscript. There are many manuscript copies, but among these there are a great number of variations in the text. By comparing these manuscripts, very early translations, and quotations from the very early Christian writers, the lower critic constructs a text which approaches more nearly the autograph text than does that of any existing manuscript. Since the King James Version was made a number of the most valuable manuscripts have become accessible to scholars. Several very old manuscripts have been discovered since the making of the Revised Version. All such discoveries assist the lower critics in constructing a text more nearly approaching the autograph texts.

"Higher criticism, criticism of the Biblical writings which aim to ascertain chiefly by internal evidence (peculiarities of style, historical allusions, dominant ideas, etc.), their authorship, dates, and general character" (Webster's New International Dictionary). "The higher criticism is the discovery and verification of the facts regarding the origin, form, and value of literary productions upon the basis of their internal characteristics and contents" ("The Elements of the Higher Criticism," by Andrew C. Zenos). Higher criticism has a purpose and a method, involves certain postulates, and through those postulates is related to science, philosophy and archæology.

The purpose is to discover the origin, form, and value of literary productions. Concerning origin the main question is: When, where, and by whom was the production composed? The time, the place, the author, any information about these is valuable to the interpreter of literary productions. But such information is not absolutely necessary. Some writings have but little of the local and temporal elements in them. Into them the author has put but little of his individual peculiarities. It makes but little difference to us who wrote the Long Meter Doxology, or when, or where it was written. It strikes a universal note. Neither the time nor the place nor the author's individual peculiarities are discoverable in it. Such is the case with much of the Bible. Everywhere in it there are discoverable truths universal and eternal, but in most cases these truths are clothed in a peculiar language of a peculiar people living in an ancient time under peculiar circumstances. There is great danger of confusing the form in which the truth is expressed with the truth itself. We should not confound the temporal and the eternal, the local and the universal, the letter and the spirit. In order that we may avoid such errors it is very important that we know the author, if possible, his personality, his qualifications, his point of view, his habits of thought, the age in which he lived, and the peculiar circumstances which called forth hsi production. The rewhich called forth his production. The religious value of a literary production is not origin as of its historical value. Some historical students are, therefore, inclined to magnify the importance of this phase of criticism, and some religious students are prone to minify its importance.

Having done what it could to settle the question of origin, the next question of criticism is concerning the literary form of the production. Here the fundamental questions are: To what form of literature does the production belong? Is it literature of description or literature of presentation? Is it prose or poetry? In descriptive literature the author expresses thoughts and describes events in his own language. Of such literature Milton and Ruskin have given us good examples. In presentation literature the author brings before us the personages who actually took part in the events and lets them speak, and perhaps act for themselves. Of this form of literature the most complete illustration is Shakespeare's dramas. Prose literature is limited to the region of facts. It deals only with what actually has existence. It is the literature of history, philosophy and science. Poetry moves in the realm of the imagination. The author of such literature uses facts, but he combines them so as to set forth ideal characters and situations. Of such literature there are two forms, fiction and verse. The word prose, because of its double meaning, is sometimes ambiguous. It is antithetic to both poetry and verse. Here it is used as the antithesis of poetry. Besides these fundamental forms, there are many subordinate forms. Almost every one of these may be found in the Bible. There may be seen the various forms of lyric poetry, such as odes, elegies, meditations, songs, anthems, monologues, and ritual psalms. There are the various forms of history, primitive, constitutional, incidental, regular, and ecclesiastical. Several forms of the epic appear. Wisdom literature is represented by epigrams, maxims and proverbs, by the riddle, the fable and the parable, by the sonnet, the dramatic monologue, and the essay. Among the prophetic writings we find the doom song, the rhapsody, and the apocalypse. Finally, we have in the Bible dramatic and idyllic literature, orations and epistles. The Bible is a most wonderful book of literary forms. For the best results in interpretation each form must be recognized and interpreted according to its spirit. As the historical differs from the poetical spirit, so does the dramatic differ from the epic. It is fatal to read history as though it were poetry, or poetry as if it were history. Before we can correctly interpret literature we must know its form. Hence the imoprtance of this phase of higher criticism.

The third purpose of higher criticism is to ascertain the value of literary productions. Values are relative. This is especially true with reference to literary productions. A writing has value in proportion as it fulfils the purpose for which it was produced. It may, incidentally, have other values, but its value as a literary production depends upon the degree to which it realizes the purpose for which it was written. For chemical or astronomical purposes the Twenty-third Psalm has no value, but it has very great religious value. The purpose of the Biblical writers was not to give us historical, scientific, philosophical, or even theological information. This they have left for others to do. Their purpose was religious. From beginning to end the Bible is a religious book. It makes very clear the way of salvation. No man who can read and understand the Bible has any excuse for being lost. In it life and death are clearly set forth, and with them in view each man determines his own destiny. But while the chief value of the Bible is religious, it is not without other values. It furnishes much historical and theological material. If this material is to be used, its value must be estimated. Not all portions of the Bible are of equal historical and theological value. First and Second Kings are worth more to the historian than is Ecclesiastes. To the theologian the Epistles are more valuable than the Psalms. Even for religious purposes not all portions are of equal value. The Gospel according to John is of greater religious value than First Chronicles. Unconsciously many pious Christians have eliminated large portions of the Bible as having little or no religious value for them. It is well to discriminate, but let saint and scholar refuse to eliminate. The whole of the Bible has religious value. While there is a connection between the historical and religious values in some portions of the Bible, yet in many cases the religious value is entirely independent of the historical. No one would think of reading the First Psalm as history. Is the account of the Good Samaritan history or parable? What religious difference does it make? In either case the same religious truth is taught. This is true of many other portions of the Scriptures. But to Christianity a certain amount of historicity is absolutely essential. Without the fact of a special revelation from God, without the historical Christ, the Bible would be without peculiar religious value.

Whoever gives a reasoned answer, based upon internal evidence, to the questions of origin, form and value of the Scriptures, is a higher critic. This is true whatever his answers to those questions may be. He who would be a good higher critic must have a historical, scientific, and religious spirit, the judicial temperament, and a sound philosophy.

The higher critic uses three methods in doing his work, the literary, the historical, and the theological. There are three phases of the literary method. The first thing to be considered is the vocabulary, involving its extent, the use made of synonyms, and the peculiar use of words. In regard to each of these, every person has his own individual peculiarities. So also it is in regard to idioms and phrases. No two persons have the same skill and the same mode of expressing themselves. Each has a peculiar set of idioms and phrases. These are earmarks that assist the higher critic in establishing the identity of authors. A third thing to be considered is the rhetorical styles. One writer is addicted to the use of inverted order in the construction of sentences; another to frequent parenthesis; another to abrupt transitions; another to repetition of the same thought in different words in two or more consecutive sentences; while another repeats the same word in two consecutive sentences of different thought. One writer is fond of hyperbolic expressions, another of metaphorical language; another of personifying inanimate objects; another frequently uses the interrogation; one may be dry and statistical, another imaginative, picturesque and poetical. In using the literary method the honest critic is not unmindful that the same author will change his style as he grows older and as he writes upon different subjects.

Of the historical method there are four forms. The first is the argument from direct historical references. The facts and institutions of contemporaneous history are reflected in the literary productions of any period. The second form of the argument may be called the argument from anachronism. For instance, if an event is mentioned in a book, or words used, and the date of that event or the time when the words originated is known, it would be a valid inference that that portion of the book was written after such date. Should an archæologist discover a coin bearing the date "25 B. C.," he would know that the coin was spurious. Of course prophetic predictions are not anachronisms. While the argument from anachronism is used to show the date after which a writing was produced, the third argument, that from silence, is used to show the date before which it was produced. In the use of this argument there needs to be the utmost care. There are so many reasons for silence. Silence does not necessarily imply ignorance. But even where it can be shown that an author was ignorant of an event, it does not follow that he wrote before that event. It may have occurred without his knowledge of it. Notwithstanding the dangers of error in the use of this argument, when it is properly used it has great cogency. Unless there is very strong evidence to the contrary, the silence of Matthew, Mark and Luke in regard to the destruction of Jerusalem is a very cogent reason for concluding that they were written before the year 70 A. D. The fourth argument is the argument from concinnity. In its simplest form this argument consists in drawing inferences from confusion or disorder in literary productions. It may be destructive. In this case the reasoning is based on contradictions, repetition and variations. Its validity will depend upon the reality of the contradictions, variations, and repetitions. Confusions are negative evidences. They serve to indicate what a writng is not, that is absolutely trustworthy. But it must not be forgotten that order of one kind involves confusion of another kind. If a historian follows the logical order, the result may be chronological disorder; or he may follow the chronological order, in which case there will be logical disorder. In either case the production may have the highest historical value. But if a writer whose purpose is primarily religious uses historical material without regard to the chronological or logical order, such confusion may arise that the production will have little historical value. That, however, would not impair its religious value. Under what precise circumstances did Jesus utter the Lord's Prayer and what were the exact words of that prayer, or did He teach His disciples two prayers? We may never be able to give a satisfactory historical answer, but who can estimate the religious value of the prayer as we have it. The argument from concinnity may be constructive. In this form it discovers possible order where there is apparent confusion. This form has been much used by those who write harmonies of the Gospels. What was the order of events during Passion Week? And what was the order on the morning of our Lord's resurrection? Perhaps we cannot answer these questions so as to give universal satisfaction. But out of the material at our disposal conjectures have been made which are quite generally satisfying. The fourth method of higher criticism is the argument from content of thought. An author's thought is characteristic of him just as is his style. His circle of knowledge, his meditations or speculations are determined to a large extent by his character, education and environment. Time and circumstances modify his thoughts as they do his style. Types of thought assist in identifying the author and in discovering his chronological position. They also form the basis of Biblical theology. Just enough of these four arguments has been given, it is hoped, to indicate their nature.

Every science has, of necessity, its postulates. In some sciences these are quite well defined. In mathematics there is a limited and well-defined set of axioms. In some other sciences they are very loosely defined. This is a great weakness of higher criticism. It has done more than anything else to bring it into disrepute. There are critics and there are critics, and the difference is to be found in the assumptions with which they come to their work. One assumes that the supernatural is impossible, and he, therefore, proceeds to label all that portion of the Scriptures which we regard as involving the supernatural with the word "myth." Another assumes that the Bible is wholly a divine book and that it is, therefore, absolutely inerrant. He refuses to believe that the Bible reflects the imperfect scientific and theological knowledge of its writers, as well as the imperfect conduct of its most honored saints. Another rejects everything that is traditional, while still another gives more credit to tradition or external evidence than to internal evidence. It is well known that the same evidence does not appeal to different individuals with the same force. This is because of their preconceptions. Let it be repeated that the man who would be a good higher critic must have the scientific, historical and religious spirit. He must be judicial in temperament and sound in philosophy. He cannot dispossess himself of his preconceptions, but with this equipment he will not need to do so. We need not fear the criticisms of such a critic.

The lower critic and the higher critic having done their work faithfully, the way is prepared for the highest critic, the interpreter or exegetical critic. His science is called hermeneutics, and is one with which every teacher of the Bible should be acquainted. It involves a knowledge of grammar, rhetoric, and logic. The interpretation of the Bible rests fundamentally upon a knowledge of the Hebrew and Greek languages. Since the Bible was composed in the distant East many hundreds of years ago, much archæological learning is required. The exegete should be possessed of common sense and sound judgment which are so necessary in following the author's thoughts and in understanding them in their connection and bearing. Another qualification of the exegete is honesty or a conscientious regard for the truth, to which all preconceived notions and dogmatic prejudices ought to be sacrificed. It is the function of the exegete to ascertain, not what the author might have meant, or what he should have meant, but what he did mean. Much pretended exegesis is really eisegesis, or imposition rather than exposition. Still another qualification is sympathy with the spirit and subject of the writer. It requires a poetical spirit to understand a poet, a philosophical mind to comprehend a philosopher, a religious mind, enlightened by the Holy Spirit, to interpret the Bible. Without this enlightenement scholarship may understand the letter or the body, but it can never penetrate to the living soul of the Bible. No amount of grammatical and historical learning can compensate for the lack of spiritual affinity and insight. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, for they are spiritually discerned."

As to final results, there is among the critics themselves a great diversity of opinion. Among the lower critics there is the least divergence of opinion. It is greatest among the exegetical critics. This divergence of opinion is sometimes used as an argument against criticism, but it is a fallacious argument. If the critics are not agreed, neither are the Christians. Shall we refuse to accept the Gospel until the Christian ministry is in full accord on all questions upon which it touches? Shall we insist upon no interpretation of the Bible because there is such a diversity of interpretations? A number of ministers use the same text, but get from it very different meanings. Shall we reject such texts until the ministers agree as to its meaning? We have not yet come unto the unity of truth, but we are coming. When we arrive, it will be seen that much of that which now seems erroneous or even contradictory is partially true. Even that truth of which we are now most certain, when it is seen in all its relations, will not appear to be quite the same. Meanwhile, it behooves us to be as patient and tolerant as our love of truth will permit.—The Methodist Protestant.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD

I omitted to say last week that Brother Johnson is well received on his field and lives in the parsonage, which puts him in easy touch with his appointments and people. The people on this charge appreciate the pastor as he visits from home to home, and I learned that Brother Johnson and family are doing some visiting, but his people have been sick and doubtless he has not done as much in this line as he would have done otherwise. Mrs. Johnson is much appreciated, and she is very helpful in preparation for the different exercises held in the churches.

SILER CITY CIRCUIT

My visit to this field embraced the 21st and 22nd. I spent Friday night with the pastor, Rev. J. H. Bowman, and it is always a pleasure to visit his home.

On Saturday morning we made our way to Zion, our first appointment, at eleven o'clock. Not a large attendance, but about as many as the pastor expected; he knew it was a very busy time with farmers. Those present seemed to enjoy the service and I trust all were benefited.

We took dinner with Bro. H. M. Lowe. At 3 o'clock we were with the Piney Grove people, where we met some of the faithful ones. This church and Zion have been very much improved as to comfort, looks and convenience. Good Sabbath schools at both churches.

Our next service was at Hope at eight o'clock, eleven miles away. We took supper with Brother W. J. Underwood, a member of the Presbyterian church, though very active in ours, and helps to make things happen, which the pastor and members appreciate very much. Not a large attendance out, but all gave good attention to the word. We spent the night with Brother J. J. Andrew.

Sunday morning we visited an elderly man who was sick, had prayer with him, and made our way to Siler for the eleven o'clock service. We were in the Sunday school, had a good school. At 11 a. m. the church was well nigh full and had a good service. Our church here is centrally located, and is destined to be one of our very best churches if properly cared for in the future, as is being done at present. The church is well officered with faithful and well qualified men and women. The church is nicely finished and furnished inside, and I learned from the pastor there was but little if any indebtedness on it. This sounded good to me, and it speaks well for both pastor and members.

Dinner with Dr. Matthews and wife. Our next appointment was at Spring Field, and through the kindness of Bro. J. M. Stout of the city, we were taken to the church, a distance of five miles, in 22 minutes in his new auto. The road in places was rough and could not make good time, but we enjoyed it, and thanks to Brother and Sister Stout for making it so pleasant. We were on time. A small attendance, but the attention very good for a hot afternoon appointment. This completed my visit on this field, having visited Hickory Grove in March, and the pastor informed me that the Hickory Grove people were going to complete their improvements on the church soon.

Brother Bowman and I drove from Siler City to Staley and spent the night with Brother S. A. Allred. On our way to Liberty we stopped with Bros. Kennett and Dosier for a few minutes and spent the time pleasantly.

At Liberty I took the train for High Point. Brother Lassiter informed me that lightning struck Julian church and damaged it considerably. Was sorry to hear of it. They had the church insured. Let all boards of trustees take notice and insure.

Claim paid. C. A. Cecil.

Brown Summit.

Last Sunday the Children's Day program was rendered. The children deserve praise, also those who trained them, Mesdames Tremain, Hopkins, Chilcutt, Paugh, Jas. and Russell Doggett; these good women and the bright children of Brown Summit deserve credit for the good result last Sunday. Contribution was $25.00, for a membership of about forty-five. It will be given to the board in addition to the assessment. At night we preached to a good-sized congregation for the place.

Asheville.

Yesterday was a good day with us. The attendance at Sunday school was the best yet. Nine new scholars were enrolled. We were delighted to have Mr. and Mrs. Simpson, of Greensboro, worship with us. An offering is to be taken next Sunday by the Sunday school for the Home Mission Board deficit. Children's Day service will be held the third Sunday in July. We are looking forward to the visit of President Cecil, and Dr. Beck, the Secretary of the Board of Home Missions, the second Sunday in July. We are expecting that their visit will mean much to the future of this work.

C. W. B.

Winston.

A few days ago, a boy about seventeen years old, a member of the Winston church, called at the parsonage to give the writer five dollars for the Orphanage. There is not anything wonderful about this, I know, but it certainly is unusual. Boys of this age do not usually make voluntary offerings of this kind. As a rule they spend their money in other ways. Watch the boy who is the exception.

Since my last report we have been going forward some. Our property has been very greatly improved by a six foot concrete side walk on Seventh Street, extending from Liberty Street to Wade Street and concrete steps in front of the parsonage. The walk was laid by the city, the steps were built by that ever-faithful, active organization, "The Ladies' Aid".

The contract for the remodeling of our church building has been let to Fogle Bros. Co., of this city. The contract price is $6,160.00. This does not include pews, art glass, heating, electric fixtures and plumbing. These will cost about $2,000.00. We expect the work to begin in a very few days, and when our building is completed, we will have one of the best arranged churches in the Conference. We hope to have it ready by October.

In addition to these material improvements I think that I can detect an awakening along other lines among our people. The Sunday school is beginning to show signs of increasing zeal; our prayer-meetings are growing in interest and attendance and the whole life of the church, I think, is being energized. And this is true of the entire city. A deep spiritual awakening is evident in our midst. God is moving upon the minds and hearts of our people.

Last Sunday night we held our annual Children's Day service. We were greeted by a large and interested congregation. The entire Sunday school participated in the program and it was so well rendered and the congregation was so

OUR HOME MISSION WORK

A number of the pastors have already returned their cards to the Secretary of the Board; some are promising to make an Emergency Offering on the Sabbath nearest Independence Day; others are fixing the date when we may expect the assessment in full; and still others are explaining why they cannot help even in this emergency. I quote from one of the latter: "We regret to say we will not be able to help on account of the heavy loss in the recent flood. It will cost us more than $1000 to repair our church, but that would be a light matter were it not for the fact that a number of the members of the church lost nearly all that they had, and all lost more or less." This is a case where help ought to be given rather than asked, but we are sure these faithful people will soon have their church restored, and be ready to push the work of the kingdom.

IT IS NOT GOOD BUSINESS POLICY

We have tried to meet the demands from the church upon the Board of Home Missions. Our work last year cost us more money than we received from the churches, and it will cost us more this year than we received last year. This is not a good business policy. We must increase our income or reduce our disbursement account. Unless we can secure funds to cover the deficit of last year, and guard against a similar condition in the year upon which we have just entered, we shall be compelled to discontinue work at some very important points with the meeting of the Fall Conferences. We hope to secure not less than FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS from this Emergency, Independence Day Offering. This amount will cover the deficit of last year, and help a little to start the work of the new year. This is not too much to expect from our Sunday schools.

THE CHECKS ARE COMING

We greatly appreciate the remittances which are being received in almost every mail, from pastors, Sunday school superintendents, and Christian Endeavor treasurers, and others. Every remittance helps. Send in the Easter Offering, Assessment, and Special contributions for the work.

Faithfully yours,
Charles H. Beck.

OUR FOREIGN MISSIONARY WORK

OF SPECIAL TO MANY

Since a brother, after careful investigation and consideration, gives FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS to the Annuity Fund of the Board of Foreign Missions, ought you not to investigate this new plan which the board has inaugurated? He is to receive from the board annually while he lives such interest as he and the Board have agreed upon, and when he passes away the money he now gives to the Board will be used in the foreign missionary work of the church.

This plan is similar, easier and more certain than a legacy or bequest. Wills are often contested, sometimes broken, and bequests are set aside: estates may be badly managed, and legal processes are expensive, and in the end the testator's purpose may be thwarted.

The Annuity Plan is subject to none of these delays, expenses, uncertainties, etc. Write me for further information.

SOME GOOD THINGS THEY SAY

The Children's Day service has been held by a number of our Sunday schools, but many schools that have recently received supplies are yet to hold the service, and a great many schools have not yet sent me their order.

The offerings have begun to come, some of which are larger than last year's, and some are smaller. I trust every superintendent will see that the Children's Day offering is sent at the earliest possible date after the service is held, as the money is now needed.

Here is what a few say of this year's Service. A Missouri pastor writes: "We found the Service to be full of inspiration and help." A New York pastor: "Your program was fine." An Ohio superintendent: "We had a nice time, your program was fine.' A Maryland pastor: "If it was not the 'best yet,' it was equal to the best you have sent out."

Send me your order at once, tell me how many are in your school, and all necessary supplies will be sent to you free.

WORLD'S SUNDAY SCHOOL CONVENTION

July 8-15 at Zurich, Switzerland. Commissions have visited many heathen lands, and will make extended reports thereon to the Convention.

Needing a rest from the incessant strain of this arduous work, and to gain inspiration and information for future plans and labors, I am to attend as a delegate, representing the board, but without any expense to it, as I am making private arrangements.

ON MY WAY TO TWO STATIONS

A dollar for an Ohio pastor for Multigraph, and five from a lady of Newark, N. J., to start me towards the fourth station—a fireproof safe. I would be most happy if both could be secured before the end of this month. Send me your check TODAY. A MULTIGRAPH, A FIREPROOF SAFE.

A VALUABE REPORT FOR SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS

After a serious delay on account of the floods at Dayton, Ohio, the printed Minutes of the Third Annual Meeting of the Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations for the United States and Canada are at last available. This important report contains the complete findings of the Council, representing twenty-nine denominations, touching such matters as Sunday school standards, exhibits, lesson courses and summer schools for Sunday school workers, together with the reports of officers, sections and committees and a complete membership roll of the Council by denominations. The statistical table printed in the report shows that in ten of the twenty-nine denominations the Sunday school enrollment exceeds the total number of communicants in numbers varying from five to fifty per cent. of the total number of communicants. In the remaining nineteen denominations the number of communicants exceeds the Sunday school enrollment by percentages varying from eight to one hundred thirty. Altogether the eighty pages of the report are crowded with valuable information regarding Sunday school work viewed from the interdenominational standpoint. Pastors and Sunday school workers of evangelical churches can obtain the report by sending their application accompanied by ten cents in stamps to the Secretary of the Council, Henry H. Meyer, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York.

"AS YOU FAIL, CHRIST FAILS."

An interesting story is told concerning Capt. Luke Bickel, a noble Baptist missionary now laboring in Japan. Late one night a rough sailor who had been converted came to Captain Bickel to talk with him about one of his friends in whom he was very much interested. The Captain suggested sending a Bible to the man. The sailor said in substance: "The man does not need a Bible, for he is watching you. As you fail, Christ fails; as you live, so Christ is revealed to him."

What a tremendous meaning in this thought for every missionary! Thousands of eyes are turned upon him, and their mute appeal is saying in thunder tones to his conscience: "As you live the Christ-life, he succeeds; as you fail, Christ fails." How important for the missionary to stand in such an attitude toward the Master that he can say, like Paul, "It is no longer I that live, but Christ liveth in me"! Ah, yes! that is true of the missionaries. We all agree to it readily. But, brethren, it is just as true of us all here in the homeland.

THE CIRCUIT RIDER

God bless the man, the holy man,
Who dwells in homes of those Who kindly shelter and provide Him rest as on he goes.
From place to place, when foul or fair,
His flock he goes to meet,
And, gay or sad, he always has
A pleasant smile to greet.

At brother Goodman's house he stops
And stays a night or two,
But, next time when he comes to preach,
He visits brother Hugh.
And there's Aunt Mary, Uncle John,
And other people near,
Where he must stop and spend a night
A dozen times a year.

At preaching, nothing he can say
That sends forth light and cheer,
But from his lips the message falls
And rings out strong and clear.
He pictures this world's sinfulness,
Designs a plan for good,
Which is imbued with mental force
And fully understood.

Yet none but shares the common love
That's ripe within his soul,
Still, when the years complete and pass,
Some other takes control.
Assigned again to other fields,
He goes and works and lives,
But credit due him for his life
This cold world never gives.

THE NEEDLESS WORRY.

A little girl saw a picture of the fabled Atlas bearing the world on his shoulders. She noticed the strong man struggling under his heavy burden, his head bowed forward, his shoulders strained, his every muscle tense, his face and form showing signs of painful efforts and endurance, and her tender heart went out toward him in pity. "Papa," she asked, in anxious earnest, "why doesn't that man lay that thing down?" And her father's answer was, "Because he supposes that he ought to carry the world on his shoulders."

And his is a mistake that a great many of us are making. How many of the burdens that oppress us are burdens that we have no call to carry? We worry over matters that are outside of our sphere; and we are ready to sink beneath the weight of cares and anxieties that would better be left to Him who alone can carry them. Whatever we have to carry the Lord will give us strength to upbear; but there is many a burden which we would do better to cast upon the Lord, because it is His burden for us and not ours for Him.—Onward.

—Thirty years ago a young man startled England and his aristocratic acquaintances by refusing to inherit over six million dollars. He was the son of a brewer and had learned to disapprove of the ways in which the fortune had been created. The man was F. M. Charrington. Leaving his wealthy surroundings, he went to live in the most starving and degraded district in London. His object was to claim the outcasts as his brothers and to raise the underworld into hope and happiness by the power of love and religion. The story of his life is the story of the legion of men, women and children whom he rescued. The story of his life is told by Guy Thomas in a volume entitled The Great Acceptance, published by George H. Doran Company. It is the story of a modern St. Francis—of a man who has achieved the apparently impossible by his faith, compassion and courage.

Professor James Y. Simpson who holds the chair of Natural Science in Glasgow University made famous by the author of "Natural Law in the Spiritual World," is a nephew of Sir James Y. Simpson, whose fame rests upon his discovery of anaesthetics.

Professor Simpson was one of Professor Drummond's closest friends and became his biographer. Of his new books, The Spiritual Interpretation of Nature, published in America by George H. Doran Company, the Glasgow Herald says: "This book in a sense is the converse (of Drummond's work) and it might be called 'Spiritual Law in the Natural World'—a brilliant effort to discuss calmly and intelligently, and with remarkable fulness of knowledge, some of these great questions in the light of present day science, theology, and philosophy." Professor Simpson is a traveler as well as a lecturer and his earlier work, "Side Lights on Siberia" is quoted as an authority on many aspects of the subject.

The Catch-My-Pal movement which has done such wonders for Ireland—it swept one of the most intemperate districts free of drink in an incredibly short space of time—was created and organized by Rev. J. R. Patterson. The key to his success is simple—he has applied psychology to an evil largely psychological. Mr. Patterson's success has aroused much interest in this country and Temperance workers everywhere will be glad to learn that he is coming this May and June to lecture through the United States. His tour will probably open in Detroit. The full account of the origin and work of the Catch-My-Pal movement may be found in Mr. Patterson's book, "Catch-My-Pal," published in this country by Geo. H. Doran Company.

—Presbyterian Examiner: "Can it be true—it seems incredible—that New York City contains as many foreign-born whites as Baltimore, St. Louis, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Pittsburgh and Cleveland combined? The figures given are for New York, 1,927,703, and for the other seven cities combined 1,943,405, or only a difference of 15,702. If these figures are correct, then we ought to be very merciful in our criticism of the moral and religious conditions in New York City. To handle two millions of foreign-born people, plus the large number of children of foreign-born people, is enough to stagger any city. New York is rising magnificently to the occasion. No city ever faced such a problem before, and no city ever made such large provision for caring for its polyglot population. Every big city knows something of this problem, and the faster the city grows the harder it is to deal successfully with its problems."

LEAN HARD

Child of my love, lean hard,
And let me feel the pressure of thy care.
I know thy burden, child; I shaped it,
Poised it in my own hand, and made no proportion
In its weight to thine unaided strength;
For even as I laid it on I said,
I shall be near, and while she leans on me
This burden shall be mine, not hers;
So shall I keep my child within the circling arms
Of mine own love. Here lay it down, nor fear
To impose it upon a shoulder which upholds
The government of worlds. Yet closer come,
Thou art not near enough; I would embrace thy care,
So I might feel my child reposing on my breast.
Thou lovest me? I know it. Doubt not then,
But, loving me, lean hard.

—Paul Pastnor.

There is no music in a rest that I know of, but there's the making of music in it. TABERNACLE CIRCUIT

Taberacle, Julian and Moriah have each held Children's Day service, and Shady Grove is preparing for it. The exercises were interesting at each church and the collections were good. Bro. Cecil's visit to us was a help and encouragement. Next Sunday is the Aged People's Day at Tabernacle. We have Children's Day, why not Aged People's Day? On the first Sunday in July we shall have at Tabernacle a service for the children. The parsonage has received two coats of paint, making here a rather interesting group of white buildings—a church, a parsonage and a school building. The rooms of the parsonage are being neatly papered, but the improvement which really adds most to the comfort of the pastor and his family is a porch on the south side of the building, covering the pump and the two doors on that side.

The Philathea Class at Tabernacle has recently placed on the walls of the church a neatly framed class certificate. During the rather severe electric storm on the 21st inst. our Julian church was damaged by lightning to the extent of one hundred dollars, the tower and vestibule being damaged most. Moriah is making some very interesting local history to be written and published later. T. M. Johnson.

SILER CITY CIRCUIT

Brother Cecil visited this circuit the 21st and 22nd of this month. His visit was much appreciated; more so perhaps from the fact that Brother Cecil and myself have long been special friends. Brother Cecil has thoroughly studied the needs of the conference circuits and pastors, and is giving the charges the benefit of his investigations as he goes from field to field. Whether the various charges and work in general are benefited or not depnds upon whether we want to be benefited or not. When he speaks of better financial plans and the working of these better plans, to my mind perhaps the greatest need in our conference today, everybody, in his mind at least, says, Yes, this is a good thing; but if those pastors and circuits and individual members who are in need of a better plan, and you are in need of a better plan if you are not paying your pastor at least quarterly and raising your general interests, still rest leisurely upon your old and inefficient oars, the craft will still remain adrift. And so with the other good advice that he gives. I believe that his visit on my work did good. His visit was much appreciated by each of my churches. Hoping that the winding up of this conference year will show an improvement over former years and hoping to see a number of the brethren at the summer conference, I am,

Yours in the work,

J. H. Bowman.

SUMMER CONFERENCE.

I have been asked to give the time for arrival of trains in High Point.

Trains from the north arrive here at 8:02 a. m., 12:55 p. m., 1:30 p. m. and 6:40 p. m.

From the south: at 8:52 a. m., 1:08 p. m., and 5:55 p. m.

From Asheboro and points in that direction: at 12:45 p. m. and 5:45 p. m.

The most convenient trains for all coming to the conference will be the noon trains. And it will also be much more convenient to get you to the Children's Home at that time in the day, so let every one come at noon on July 1st if possible.

Will you please drop a card to the undersigned as soon as you read this, stating what train you will come on?

Of course you will not expect me to meet all trains. I can and will gladly meet all the noon trains on Tuesday, July the 1st, and render any assistance possible.

Please send me the card stating when you will come, and we will do our best for you.

Fraternally,

A. G. Dixon.

VERY SORRY INDEED

Peter Slewfoot is very sorry, indeed, that he cannot accept the Chairmanship of a Round Table Conference on reporting poundings as suggested by our Editor. Peter is very tame and does not like to be made conspicuous. It is true it would afford an opportunity for the brethren to see and hear him. But, what if he should wield the jawbone of an ass and slay a kid?

That Summer Conference: More helpful, says one, than a Subdistrict Conference. It will be grand, I am sure—but difficult for some of the fellows to attend; —it costs money to ride on rail roads and even club house board sounds pretty scarey to some of us little 22 caliber rimfire fellows. Still, we would like to hear the large cannons roar and the Northfield bullets whistle; but I guess Peter will be unable to locate himself at that time. However, Peter would be more than glad to meet the brethren—but, at this time, Peter is very much like the old woman locating her daughter's exceptional talent:

Visitor—"They tell me your daughter has an exceptional talent."

Fond mother—"Yes, there is no doubt about that; but we have been unable to locate it yet; her music teacher says it is for painting, and her art teacher says it is for music."

Peter therefore is not able to accept a place on programme as offered by Executive Committee and now Chairmanship of the Round Table Conference on reporting poundings: other important business at that time. Peter also plans an Air-O-Plain Flight. This leaves him in the awful befuddlement of not being able to locate himself.

Brother Cecil says report regardless of Peter Slewfoot. Said he was sure Peter's appetite was aroused when he read of those hams. Ah!Mercy me! When he read of those hams—Peter just felt like the old darkey in the congregation when his pastor was telling the congregation of the good things they had to eat in heaven. Just as the preacher grew eloquent and mentioned bacon and beans, the old darkey over in the congregation just couldn't hold in any longer. He commenced to clap his hands, pat his feet, and sing, "I smell dem a-cookin' now; I smell dem a-cookin' now." And just as Peter smelt dem hams cooking and tasting so delicious, his taste was knocked clear out of his mouth by a long list of donors who had already been thanked half to death and made to understand that another would be greatly appreciated. Peter hasn't had much taste for ham since.

Why, if you paint a parsonage, build a church, get a pounding, report it—that is the thing to do. But don't make your report read like you have painted two when you have only painted one, or say hams when you only got one. It might be allowable, however, to report the size of hams sometimes. Peter has actually seen some hams that he could take in one hand and fling over the house; children could pitch quoits with them, and if Peter's taste were to return he could eat one for breakfast and have a plenty if he could get a few eggs and a little lard to make some gravy. Once after I had read about two columns in a church paper of a great pounding, the enumeration table had been completely exhausted. Peter chanced to meet that brother soon after, when Peter mentioned that pounding. You ought to have seen that grin. He said, "I'll admit, poundings count for more in the newspapers than they do in the pantry.

Yes, you bet your life, Brother Cecil. Peter likes good things, of course he does, and only urges the cut-out knife and eliminate the enumeration table and the use of the simple rule of addition which to Peter's judgment would add to the interest of the report and pleasure of the general public.

Anon, Peter Slewfoot.

FROM LOCAL REPORTERS

Brown Summit M. P. Church.

We held our Children's Day service last Sunday at 11 a. m. Almost the entire program of our Childrren's Day was carried out. The children did well. The large congregation was delighted with the work of the children. The church and others responded liberally. The contribution was $25.00. The entire village was interested in the work. There had not been a Children's Day in this church in about eight or ten years.

Dear Herald Readers:

I am a little girl 12 years old, but thought I would write a letter to the Herald. We are having a good Sunday school, and we have a fine superintendent, Bro. J. H. Siler, and he is also my teacher. He is a good teacher, we like him. Our President, Bro. Cecil, was with us last Saturday, the 21st, and preached a fine sermon. We were glad to have him with us. Come again, Bro. Cecil. Our pastor was with him. We are always glad for Bro. Bowman to come. We think we have the best pastor at all. We are planning to have a Sunday school picnic; hope we will have success. I close with best wishes to the Herald.

BURLINGTON

Last Sunday was the regular time for the election of officers for the ensuing term of six months. The result was as follows:

Supt., J. G. Rogers: Asst. Supt., W. A. Hornaday; Secretary, C. E Hornaday; Asst. Secretary, W. E. Crutchfield; Organist, Miss Lula Foster; Asst. Organist, Miss Nellie Davis; Librarian, M. A. Coble; Asst. Librarian, C. B. Way; Supt. of Home Department, J. H. Boon; Asst. Supt. Home Dept., G. L. Amick; Secretary Home Dept., T. T Stafford; Asst Sec. Home Dept., T. E. Davis; Supt Cradle Roll, Miss Lena Lineberry.

These newly elected officers have our hearty co-operation and we hope that the School may prosper greatly under their supervision. The attendance last Sunday was 229 and collection $4.61.

The Re-union Day Service will be held next Sunday with one of the smallest classes to supervise the opening exercises. Every one is looking forward to a treat in hearing these children take the "old folks' part."

The Junior Philathea Class gave an ice cream supper on last Saturday night, but on account of the bad weather did not make a very large profit.

Mr. Eli Alexander, aged 74 years, member of our Sunday school and church, died Monday morning, and the funeral was preached Tuesday afternoon at 3 o'clock by our pastor. The deceased brother has been a member of the church for 52 years, and was a man of excellent Christian character. Two brothers, two sisters, and six children survive. The whole church and S. S. extends sympathy to the bereaved ones.

CHESTNUT RIDGE, ORANGE CIRCUIT

The Ladies' Aid Society met last Thursday P. M. at the church.

Our society is prospering and all seem to be very much interested in the work. We have 20 members. Our Sunday school is progressing nicely under the wise leadership of our Supt., Mr. G. F. Crutchfield. The attendance yesterday was 100, collection $1.50.

At 11 A. M. our pastor, Bro. Stubbins, preached a very able and instructive sermon on the subject of "Christian Religion."

We were glad to have Misses Willie and Julia Williams of Ringwood, N. C., to worship with us. They are visiting their sister, Mrs. R. C. Stubbins.

FLAT ROCK

Rev. W. R. Lowdermilk, driving over from Kernersville on Saturday and stopping with Mr. J. B. Ogburn, gave us a fine sermon last Sabbath based on "The testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple," using much of the nineteenth psalm.

It was a grand effort in support of the verity of God's word, giving the lives of many of earth's noble men as illustration, thus refuting agnostic and infidel. Surely this subject is timely in this age of higher criticism, and too much cannot be said upon it. But we believe no sincere child of God doubts his holy word.

To say we appreciate his sermon and the visit of his winsome wife and interesting family does not half express it. May he be a lever in God's hand accomplishing untold good, and at "eventide may it be light." He paid a noble tribute to our dear old church, saying, "There is not a minister in our conference that does not or would not like to visit Flat Rock Church." But we, its present membership, feel and are unworthy of this.

Mr. Paul Kennett is here, a full fledged graduate of Guilford College. We hope to hear from him in life.

SILER CITY

We were glad to have Rev. C. A. Cecil with us last Sunday. He preached us a splendid sermon, one that everybody enjoyed. Bro. Cecil has visited all the churches on this circuit.

We are expecting Rev. C. L. Whitaker to preach for us next Sunday a. m. and at night. Glad he is to be with us then.

Our Sunday school is growing and I hope it will continue to grow. We want to have a S. S. picnic some time in July.

BETHANY, RANDLEMAN CIRCUIT

Last Sunday was Children's Day at Bethany. Happy were the little ones as they spoke their pieces and sang their songs and told of the needs of the little heathen children. In the morning we had Sunday school and about one hour of songs and recitations by the little ones. Collection $4.50. In the afternoon some recitations and a short talk by our pastor on the Orphan's Home. Collection $3.45. The collection in the morning will go to foreign missions; in the afternoon to Denton Orphanage. The children did well. Much credit is due our girls, Miss Florence Julian, Bessie Hays, and others. We have some as faithful girls in Sunday school as can be found anywhere. We are sorry to say Mr. Jesse Julian, one of our leaders in the singing, is very sick and could not be with us.

First of our special days was memorial and mothers' day; next children's day. Last but not least is our special meeting which will begin second Sunday in August. Brethren and sisters, let us pray that this may be the best meeting we have ever had. Pray for us all.

THE STORY OF GREEDY TOMMIE TOBEY

Nobody in the Tobey family liked to have company. It wasn't because they were mean and stingy, either, for all the Tobeys, big and little, just loved to make other people happy and comfortable. No, it was because Tommie Tobey had such dreadful table manners. All his brothers and sisters blushed rosy red for shame when any one came to dinner.

One day a carriage, drawn by two splendid black horses, stopped before the Tobey cottage, and Great-Aunt Sarah Stickney Stevens hobbled out. Mother had to hustle around and get dinner. She was so busy that she quite forgot to whisper to Tommie about being greedy. Poor Tom lost all his manners when he saw the good things on the table. He ate his chicken with his fingers, he gobbled up his ice cream, and worst of all, he leaned over and snatched a piece of chocolate cake just as Aunt Sarah was going to take it.

Aunt Sarah Stickney Stevens was very much shocked indeed, and smiled a most dreadful smile. When she was leaving, she said: "Tomorrow, young man, I'll send you a new brother, and you must let him eat with you every day."

"Thank you, Aunt Sarah," said Tom politely. Aunt Sarah looked at his greasy hands and at his face, which was dotted with currant jelly and chocolate ice cream, and smiled again. Then she went away, and all the Tobeys tried to tell Tom how ashamed they were of him.

"Huh!" said Tom, puffing himself out like a fat little pigeon. "Aunt Sarah is all right. She isn't going to send the rest of you anything, is she?"

All the little Tobeys looked at each other and wondered why Aunt Sarah Stickney Stevens had liked such a greedy boy. The next day, when the Tobeys were at dinner, Tom's present came. He jumped up and down with delight. He broke the string, threw it on the floor, tore open the brown wrappings, and threw them on the floor; and when he saw Aunt Sarah's present inside he grew very red, and was going to throw that on the floor, too, but father reached over and took it. "What did the mean old thing want to send me that for?" snarled Tom. All the Tobeys crowded around to look at it. It was a pig, a big plaster pig. In its mouth was a card, which said: "Ive come to eat with you, Brother Tom. Put me right beside your plate."

"Aunt Sarah is a wise woman," said father, and leaned over and put the pig down beside Tom's plate. "There, my son, we'll let him stay there until you learn to eat like a gentleman."

Tom cried and screamed and screamed and cried and didn't eat any dinner, but the pig stayed there. For three long weeks he stood guard over Tom's plate—breakfasts, dinners, and suppers. Every time Tom was greedy, father pushed the pig nearer Tom's plate. How Tom hated that pig! He hated him worse every day. Who could take any comfort eating while the pig was watching him? He began to eat slowly and take small mouthfuls and let the other children be served first. One morning when the Tobeys came to breakfast the pig had gone. He never came back.

Aunt Sarah Stickney Stevens says Tom has the best table manners of all the Tobeys, and gave him a silver dollar the last time she came to dinner.—Mary Davis, in Christian Register.

A TALE FROM WORDSWORTH

By Wightman F. Melton

GOODY BLAKE AND HARRY GILL—A TRUE STORY

One not knowing what had happened to Harry Gill would marvel at the constant chattering of his teeth. He wore waistcoats of duffle gray and fine flannel, at least three overcoats, and several blankets. He had on enough to smother nine men; but in summer and in winter, by day and by night, in sunshine and in moonlight, his teeth never ceased to chatter.

Harry Gill was a robust young farmer of Warwickshire. His cheeks were as red as the ruddy clover, and he had a voice like three men. His neighbor, Goody Blake, a poor old woman, ill fed and thinly clad, lived in a miserable hut on the northern side of a hill, remote from the sheltering green, where scrubby hawthorns trembled before the sea blasts and where the frosts were slow to melt.

All day long in her poor cottage Goody Blake worked at her spinning wheel; and although her work would not pay for the candle's light consumed, she continued at her wheel three hours after dark. Sometimes in England two poor old dames live in one small hut and boil their pottage at the same fire, but Goody Blake lived alone. It was well for her when summer came. Then during the long, warm, lightsome day she sat at her door and sang, as gay as a linnet.

Goody Blake would have counted her age as so many winters instead of summers, for every winter's day her bones shook with cold, her evenings were dull and lonely; and when, because of the cold weather, she went to bed, because of the cold bed she could not sleep a wink. As cold as she was in her cold bed, Goody Blake was always delighted to hear the blustering winter winds, for she knew she would find next morning twigs and boughs conveniently scattered about for her. Because of the scarcity of tufts and sticks, Dame Blake, well or sick, was never able to accumulate a pile large enough to warm her for three days.

Now when the weather became so cold that she could no longer endure it, and when her poor old bones were aching, and when there were no winds to blow down boughs or twigs for her, is it to be wondered that the most alluring thing in all the world to Goody Blake was an old hedge? It must be acknowledged that now and then, when her old body was chilled through and through and her very bones were cold, she would leave her scant fire or even her bed to gather sticks from Harry Gill's hedge.

Harry had long suspected Goody Blake of trespassing, and now he vowed to take vengeance on her if he could find her at his hedge. With this determination he often left his own warm fire, went through the fields, and there at night, in frost and in snow, watched for an opportunity to seize old Goody Blake.

One night Harry took his stand behind a barley rick around which he could peep and listen toward his hedge. The full moon was shining brightly, and the stubble was crisp with frost. Suddenly he heard a noise. "Ah, there she comes," thought he. Again he heard the same noise. On tiptoe he softly crept down the hill. Sure enough, just as he had suspected, there, like a witch in a play, was Goody Blake at his hedge. He stopped behind an elder bush and gladly watched her pull stick after stick until her apron was full. When the poor dame turned and started home with her load, Harry Gill sprang forward with a shout and fiercely seized her by her cold, lean arm. Holding her firmly and savagely shaking her, he cried, "I've caught you at last," and made many violent threats.

Dame Blake, who had made no reply, let the bundle fall from her lap and, kneeling on the sticks, upheld her withered hand, Harry still grasping her arm, and prayed:

"God! who art never out of hearing,
O may he never more be warm!"

Thus prayed Goody Blake under the cold, cold moon; and young Harry, having heard her prayer, turned away sorrowful of heart and as cold as ice.

All the next day, with gloomy face, Harry Gill went about complaining that he was very cold. He wore an overcoat, but it made him no warmer. On Thursday he put on another, and before Sunday he had three; but it was impossible for him to get warm even when he had blankets pinned about him over the coats. Still his paws and teeth clattered like a loose window shaken by the wind. He became very lean and took to his bed in a fortnight. All who saw him said that no matter how long he lived he never would be warm again.

Harry Gill spent his remaining twenty years in bed, covered with many blankets and with a sieve over his face from an insane fear of the cold air. In bed or out of bed, he never again uttered a word to any one, young or old, but always muttered to himself: "Poor Harry Gill is very cold." And day and night, in bed or out of bed, his teeth continued to chatter.

"Now think, ye farmers, if you will,
Of Goody Blake and Harry Gill."

(Note.—Wordsworth gives this as a true story because he found the incident in Erasmus Darwin's "Zoonomia," volume iv., pp. 68, 69, edition of 1901.)

NONE THAT GREW THERE

During a lesson on the animal kingdom the teacher asked if any one could give an example of an animal on the order of Edentata—that is, one which is without teeth.

"I can," replied Tommy, his face beaming with eagerness.

"Well, what is it?" asked the teacher.

"Grandpa!" shouted Tommy.

A NEEDED ADJUSTMENT.

Over the telephone a worried voice addressed the proprietor of a small hardware store:

"Say," the speaker began, "I come come in your place today and bought one of them dollar alarm clocks, and you set her for me to go off at five o'clock in the mornin'. D'ye remember?"

"Yes," said the hardwareman. "I remember."

"Well," went on the other. "I've just found out that I don't have to get up at five o'clock in the mornin'."

"Glad to hear it." said the hardwareman, "but what do you want me to do about it?"

"I want you," said the customer, "to tell me how to unalarm this clock."—Onward.

HINGES

ON WHICH OPPORTUNITIES HAVE TURNED

(Reprinted from Opportunity for May, 1913.)

A good many years ago it was the custom of merchandisers to sell their goods at whatever price they could get for them. It was up to the clerk to get the best figure he could. Alexander T. Stewart, then running his first store in New York, saw the injustice in this method. As a result he instituted the "one price" system that is now universal. The idea proved the turning point in his career.

During the early part of the Civil War, while riding back to Washington from a visit to the army lines outside the city one of the party of men and women made the remark that some stirring war-song should be written to the tune of "John Brown's Body." Next day Julia Ward Howe, who had been a member of the group, sat down at her desk and in half an hour wrote the now famous "Battle Hymn of the Republic."

When Charles A. Stevens was making his first big splash in the Chicago merchandising field it occurred to him that there was no particular reason why silks could not be sold by mail. Consequently he went to his room and wrote out a small advertisement. This he sent to a magazine of national circulation. The advertisement itself cost but a few dollars yet it was the real turning point in Stevens' success.

John Cowley was once a butler in the home of an important financier of New York. The latter was in the habit of bringing other financiers home to dinner and talking over the stock market with them. On one of these occasions he told how he intended to buy in a lot of stock on the following day. The butler overheard the remark. So, first thing next morning, he drew out his savings and hurried down to Wall Street. There he bought in as much stock as his money would permit. An hour later his master—Jay Gould—sent his men into the exchange and began to buy. The market went soaring. A week later Cowley resigned his position and went to live at the Fifth Avenue Hotel. When he died he left an estate of a quarter of a million.

When William Jennings Bryan went to the Democratic convention at Chicago in 1896 he was hardly known outside his state. In fact he was at the time employed by a newspaper at a small salary as an editorial writer. At Washington, where he had been sent as a representative from his home district, he had not been a leader by any means. Yet at the Chicago convention a single speech—his famous "cross of gold" effort—gave him the highest honor within the gift of his party and started him on his wonderful public career.

A few years ago Henry Seager, a rancher on the big stock farm of John A. Reeves in Oklahoma got a notion that wheat could be raised in the dry land of that part of the country without irrigation. He told Reeves about it. "Well," said the latter, "you've been with me a long time, Henry, and if you want to make the experiment I'll make you a present of two hundred acres." Seager took the acres and began to grow wheat. Within ten years he was worth as much as his former employer and had increased his holdings to four thousand acres.

One noon a customer walked into the sales room of the National Cash Register Co. at Dayton, Ohio, and complained that there was no salesman to serve him. Hugh Chalmers, who at that time was office boy but who had pried into a knowledge of cash register mechanism, stepped into the breach and landed the order. That little accidental experience in the field of salesmanship gave Chalmers his first impetus towards the career that made him vice-president and general manager of the big concern a few years later and then carried him over into the automobile manufacturing field, where he is president of a six-million dollar corporation that bears his name.

A DREAM.

Once upon a time—oh, a very long time ago—there was a class with a member in it who used to defer preparing his lesson until it would either be too late or else it would be done so hastily that only a confusing idea would be gained of its main points. He complained of the class hour being dreadfully dull, of the uninteresting style of the teacher; of the temperature of the classroom—it was too hot or too cold, too drafty or too stuffy. Singular, but it was never just right. One night he dreamed, did that member, that he prepared his lesson thoroughly early in the week, and every day until Sunday came he was thinking about it and growing to understand it better and better. That Sunday, strange to say, he had a splendid lesson. The teacher was not prosy, the room was just right, and as for the air, he never remembered at all.

When this sleeping member awoke and reflected upon his dream which had been very, very real he decided that in order to reap a harvest of interest he must himself sow the seeds of interest and water them with abundant preparation.—Young Men's Class Weekly.

Healthful children are a national asset of great value; unsound and defective children are destined to become a national burden in adult life.

LEE'S CHAPEL, HALIFAX CIRCUIT

Children's Day was observed at this church last third Sunday. The children did their part well and those present seemed to enjoy it. The congregation was not as large as usual on Children's Day, on account of Children's Day and preaching elsewhere in the neighborhood. Brother Pritchard offered a banner to the Sunday school on this circuit which raises the largest amount in proportion to membership for foreign missions. He has not yet told us what the collection was.

Was sorry Mrs. Pritchard could not be with us on account of the sad death of her brother.

Brother Pritchard preached another of his good soul-stirring sermons in the afternoon. He also filled his appointment at the Fosburgh Lumber Camp in the evening.

Our Sunday school is moving along very nicely. Our revival meeting begins the 3rd Sunday in August. We hope to have the best revival we have had for many years.

Since our last report one of the best Christians in this neighborhood, Mr. N. E. Mabry, has passed away. He is greatly missed in all the churches. His greatest pleasure was working for the Lord.

A good member of our church, Mrs. Mary F. Odom, died recently. This church has lost a faithful member, one who was always willing to do her part. We sympathize with the bereaved ones.

ENCOURAGING WORDS.

More than twenty years ago it was my happy experience to recite on children's day a short poem at Mt. Pleasant M. P. church. After the service one of our splendid preachers of today spoke an encouraging word to me. His words have long since faded from my memory, but in some way they riveted an impression that years alone can never efface. They gave me an inspiration and an uplift whose weight and worth eternity only can estimate. By these kind words I have been made richer; without them I would have been made poorer.

The thought suggests itself to my mind that if a very few words of encouragement touch the heart, and help to mould and form the life of one little insignificant creature of God's, is it not our duty to encourage by kind helpful words, not only the children, but also the young men and the young women, the older men and the older women, who are struggling hard against the world, the flesh and the devil. Many a child is pining away for lack of kind words. Many fair daughters and stalwart sons have lost their precious hold on life, all because some friend has unconsciously withheld kind words of encouragement and cheer. Then there are the elderly people who are oftentimes oversensitive of the approach of age. They have their trials, their crosses, and their burdens. They imagine that their lot is the worst of all. Kind words of cheer would many times relieve them of sleepless nights.

Encouraging words! No words so sweet as those coming from the lips and heart of an open-hearted, friendly friend. Did you ever feel after you had done something bad—well, not so very bad, but you did wrong on the spur of the moment, and then repented—that everybody had forsaken you, and that you had not a friend in the world?

Another experience possessed your soul when a friend, either known or unknown, in passing dropped a few encouraging words into your ears, which were more highly prized than a garland of roses, or a cluster of pearls. May God help each of us to brighten the lives of others by speaking at all times words of comfort and cheer. Will H. Neese.

THE SELF-MADE MAN.

If there be one man before me who honestly and contentedly believes that, on the whole, he is doing that work to which his powers are best adapted, I wish to congratulate him. My friend, I care not whether your hand be hard or soft; I care not whether you are from the office or the shop; I care not whether you preach the everlasting Gospel from the pulpit, or swing the hammer over the blacksmith's anvil; I care not whether you have seen the inside of a college or the outside—whether your work be that of the head or of the hand—whether the world accounts you noble or ignoble; if you have found your place, you are a happy man. Let no ambition ever tempt you away from it by so much as a questioning thought.

I say, if you have found your place—no matter what or where it is—you are a happy man. I give you joy of your good fortune; for if you do the work of that place well, and draw from it all that it can give you of merriment and discipline and development, you are, or you will become, a man filled up, made after God's pattern, the noblest product of the world—a self-made man.—Dr. Holland.

—Bro. Raper writes that he has purchased for the new church in Reidsville a new clock, pulpit Bible, and Discipline, at an expense of $22.75, using the voluntary contributions of friends. This is given as a memorial of Bro. Raper's mother who died recently. Eighty-four people have contributed amounts ranging from 10 cents to $5.00.

—Rev. T. J. Ogburn was invited to represent Asheboro in the banquet Tuesday night given by the Interchurch Conference of Greensboro.

—Paul Kennett, son of Rev. W. F. Kennett, has been elected principal of the graded school at Guilford College. He is now in the summer school at the State University preparing for the work.

—Brown Summit comes to the front this week in its report of Children's Day. Good for this church.

—Herbert Ogburn, son of Rev. T. J. Ogburn, is graduated this year in the school of medicine of Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore. We expect him to make a very good doctor.

—The church supper last Friday night was largely attended and was much enjoyed. The pastor said it brought an encouraging revelation. Our people were asked to bring to eat what they would have at home, and the supper revealed the fact that our people fare sumptuously every day.

—Mr. John Hammer, of Asheboro, is to move to Raleigh to spend part of his time. He is general insurance agent for eastern Carolina.

—We are glad to hear that Mrs. W. F. Medearis seems to be regaining her health. She has been under the surgeon's knife twice.

—Miss Cora Totten, of Yadkin College, was in Greensboro last Sunday. She had recently returned from a visit to her brother, Dr. Totten, in Baltimore.

—Mr. Gurley Starr is down with typhoid fever at the home of his brother-in-law, Mr. Floyd Coble. He was never sick before, but seems to be standing this attack well.

—Gurley Coble, of Concord, visited relatives in Greensboro last Sunday.

—Mrs. Robt. Coble, of this city, is passing through a serious illness. Her life was almost despaired of for a time, but she seemed better at last report. Her daughter, Mrs. Donnie Knight, is also ill, having been confined to her bed for several weeks. We hope both will soon be much better.

—It is reported that President Wilson declines to renew the treaty of commerce with Russia except on the condition that Jews may be given the same freedom as others to enter Russia.

—A note from Bro. Bates tells that Rev. L. H. Hatley is seriously ill, having what may prove to be congestion of the brain. Let him be remembered in earnest prayer.

—Our church in Julian was struck by lightning one afternoon last week. The tower was badly damaged and door frames splintered. Bro. Lassiter estimates the damage at from $150 to $200.

—Mrs. J. H. Pritchard was called to Siler City by the death of her brother, Robert H. Vestal, who died on the 14th instant.

—Dr. Klein has gone to the World's Sunday School Convention, but all requests for Children's Day supplies, etc., will be attended to by Mrs. Klein. Also all remittances should be forwarded just as though Brother Klein were at home, checks being made payable to his order. Mrs. Klein will see that all goes right.

AN APPRECIATION OF MRS. ANDREW P. ROBERTS

Her maiden name was Miss Elizabeth Albina Eller, daughter of the late Rev. Joe Eller.

She was born Oct. 13, 1849; converted and joined Mt. Zion Methodist Protestant Church at the age of 15; was married to Andrew P. Roberts October 12, 1874; was translated May 6, 1913; her body was laid away in the church yard at Clark's Chapel the following day. She was the mother of nine children. Five of them are living. Her father and mother had passed away many years before her.

Everybody knew her as "Aunt Bettie," just as they know her husband as "Uncle Andy."

The Bible was her one book. She read it incessantly. She did what it taught. She radiated its light in her home and church and community. Being ill for some three years, she exercised its patience all along. She was always faithful in church duties, attended its services, Sunday school, Ladies' Aid, prayer meetings. She was always good to the sick, nursing them, comforting them, doing other favors for them. She and her household were good to ministers and their families. The Shunamite woman and her husband were brought to the minds of the many ministers who received the unbounded hospitality of these good people. They have a room in their home they call the preacher's room. "Remember, your room is always ready for you," always came deep out of the hearts of these devoted people.

Her life was modest and unassuming, yet a great power in her influence for the right. She was a living witness for Jesus. Her loved ones know no wrong that she ever did. Her neighbors remember her as a woman who never did any one a wrong. She was deeply concerned for the salvation of her relatives. Her prayers and pleadings have borne fruit, since her translation, in the repentance of a big-hearted brother who had hitherto never accepted Jesus. She protested against her husband's praising her and requested him not to allow her to be spoken of too well after her translation. She never lost her hold on Jesus even in her irrational periods. Once she said to a minister, "My body is a wreck, but my spirit is all right." She had a clear vision of the glory that awaited her. Once she said, "Where are father and mother? I saw them here awhile ago." Her last words were, "Mother, come and go with me to glory-land."

On the day her body was laid away the church was filled with loving friends; sweet songs were sung; her pastor, Rev. L. H. Hatley, and Rev. C. W. Bates prayed tenderly and offered comforting words; the writer had the privilege of a word of tribute; the mound over her body was heaped high with flowers fragrant and old-fashioned. All came away with profound sympathy for her loved ones and with the resolve to live her life of service to their Lord and to mankind.

J. S. Williams.

Greeson

In loving remembrance of little John Smith Greeson, the two-year-old infant son of John T. and Donnie Greeson.

Little John was indeed a bright and sweet child given from the hands of God. He came a precious jewel into this home to knit together and gladden the hearts of his parents. Indeed, what a joy he was to his father and mother and grandfather and grandmother and all who knew him.

Indeed it made our hearts feel sad when on the 14th day of June the dear Savior came and plucked this beautiful flower from the garden of his own planting, that he might make it more beautiful and use it to his own glory. This precious flower has not withered, but has only been transplanted into the Garden of Paradise, where flowers never wither nor fade.

And, Uncle John and Aunt Donnie, should we love it less because of this transplanting? May the remembrance of his sweet little voice while he was with us in our home be a sweet echo of his sweeter chimes in his heavenly home.

"Cousin Lizzie."

—Last year the Southern Presbyterian Assembly attempted to amend the Westminster Confession of Faith so as to make it read "All infants dying in infancy, being elect, are saved." A majority, but not the necessary two-thirds, of the presbyteries voted for the amendment. This year the Assembly refused to resubmit the clause, but on its own authority, explained the clause in the Confession, "Elect infants dying in infancy are saved" as meaning "All infants dying in infacy are saved."

DENTON HIGH SCHOOL

——OPENS SEPTEMBER 1, 1913——

DENTON is situated in the Piedmont hills of Davidson County twenty miles South from Thomasville on the Carolina and Yadkin River Rail Road. This Railroad connects us with the Southern at Thomasville and High Point on the north and with the Southbound at High Rock on the South. About 350 yards west from the depot on Salisbury Street, nestling among a beautiful grove of oaks, is the home of Denton High School.

OUR COURSE OF STUDY prepares for any College, also for our State University. We give each student personal atention and do everything necessary for their comfort and advancement. A thoroughly competent teacher has been employed for the Music Department, and those who take this course will receive special attention. A High School Business Course will be taught free of charge as to tuition. Special work in Pedagogy for those who intend to teach.

FREE TUITION to ministerial students and children of the ministers of the North Carolina Conference. Cost of all necessary expenses for a year ranges from $115 to $145. We board students in good private homes. Indigent young men can get rooms and board themselves at actual cost. If any one wishes to pay a part or even all expenses by work, write the Principal for particulars. The school uses water from deep drilled wells with pumps, which eliminates all danger from germs in the water. Pure air, pure water, plenty of work; if these do not give health to the student, he will never have it. Write the Principal at Denton, N. C., for any further information.

REMEMBER THY YOUTH.

Amos R. Wells, has some splendid things to say along this line to every Sunday school teacher.

Age, as is often said and seldom believed is not an affair of the almanac, but of the spirit. You are as old as you feel. In Sunday school teaching you are as old as you make your pupils feel you are.

And that is half the charm. That is one evidence that they remember their youth. For what child does not want to be thought older than he is? What child is not intensely complimented by being addressed as an adult? How can you insult children more deeply than by saying to them, "Now, children"? I was greatly surprised at the popularity, in my Sunday school, a supply teacher, of a certain doctor of laws. He is well-known lecturer, on sociology, never known to talk ten minutes without introducing his hobby; yet he is called for persistently by even younger classes of the Intermediate Department. The reason is obvious on reflection: he never "talks down" to them; he talks up to them.

There is a further reason: he is friendly. He likes to talk, and is an interesting, easy talker.

And there is one more reason; he believes in the capacity of young people to handle large themes and think big thoughts.

When I was a boy, scribbling on every scrap of paper, the subject of my poems and essays were such as I should not now dare to approach: death, life, love, labor, eternity, heaven. I now write about lawn-mowers, and scissors and the lesson of the laundry.

Youth is essentially serious. Remember that, when you teach young folks. The bubbling froth of youth is only the curtain of spray that hides a very Niagara of feeling.

Couth is intensely eager about life, and any teacher that can tell the young folks of life will be their leader.

Couth is quick, scorning elaboration, soon wearied by wordiness. You will win the boys and girls if you are direct, simple, clear, concise.

Wouth is unconscious of its deeper self, while comically and awkwarldy conscious of its surface self. Appeal to what is deepest; let the surface pass.

Youth is joyous, yes; sprightly, singing, sunshiny. You will not attract the youth unless you also have these qualities.

In short, if you would win the young, be yourself, but be youthful!

In Conclusion.

A very successful teacher says:

Has he planned for the closing few minutes of the lesson period? Impressions gained then are frequently persistent in later years. As a boy, I had now and then a rare teacher who knew how to plan wisely for those closing moments. They may be as carefully planned for any other portion of the teach period. The plans will not always be carried out, but the teacher will be stronger for the planning.

If education is "causing another to know" and religious education is "causing another to know and be' what must the preparation be? Must it not involve both knowing and being on the part of the teacher? I have failed if I have not made clear that no small part of the teacher's preparation is to make his life a living message to his pupils which may be "known and read" by everyone.

One of the best ways we know to prepare the effective close and effective start and an effective continuation of the lesson is to join a Teacher Training class and pursue the course thoroughly. It will pay tremendous dividends to anybody who goes into it with determination. Start now. Remember the Board has an excellent book, Training the Teacher, paper 35 cts., cloth 50 cts. Send all orders to C. H. Hubbell, Adrian, Michigan.

That Small Class.

The small class need never be discouraged because it is small and it is never likely to attain any great size. If well organized it will always find work of some kind awaiting it. A class with a dozen members, each standing loyally by the pastor and the Sunday school superintendent, may be the strongest ally of the church and Sunday school. It is service and not size that gives the class its true value. There is room in the world of Christian effort for both the large and the small class. Both are sorely needed to combat the forces of evil that are everywhere rampant, and the class of any size that is living up to the plan and purpose of the whole Organized Bible Class Movement deserves and should have the heartiest support that the church can give it. It can be the strong arm of the church upon which the pastor can rely with a degree of confidence that brings joy to his heart.

Remember our Board will gladly send you free helps for starting a big or small class. Write for them today to C. H. Hubbell, Adrian, Michigan.

—American Methodists in southern Asia operate five strong presses in Lucknow, Calcutta, Madras, Singapore and Manila. They have also 166,000 young people in their Sunday schools. In the Philippines Methodist membership has now reached 40,000, with nearly 100,000 adherents in addition. There are 7,000 boys and girls in Methodist day schools in Malaysia, between Penang and Batavia. All the schools for boys are self-supporting and those of girls nearly so. The Java mission, founded by the Pittsburg Epworth Leagues, has now twelve American men and women in Chinese schools in the Dutch East Indies, supported entirely on the field by the Chinese constituency. These teachers are all engaged in mission work outside of school hours.

—A missionary, in writing the Congregationalist regarding the "Temple of Heaven," one of China's largest and most imposing idol temples, said: "To this temple the Emperor came thrice yearly to pray for the people, for rain, for good harvests, etc. Recently the government has allowed the people to use the temple grounds for a series of fairs. Permission was also given the missionary societies to hold Christian services here in connection with the fairs, preaching being done from a platform within the inner shrine. Streamers hang at the back, giving in Chinese characters the names of the various speakers and the days on which they are to speak. One banner gives the words of familiar hymns. The exercises are conducted under the direction of the five missionary societies at work in the city—four American and the London Missionary Society—but the speakers are all Chinese."

—American Advance: "What an opportunity is ours—with the liquor traffic thoroughly aroused, stung to mad reprisals, with our non-portisan friends at last catching the vision of national prohibition as the only goal worth striving for, and with the political atmosphere electric with ardent but unorganized impulses toward the public welfare—as we see and feel all this let us thank God for

POTATO BUG REMEDY

A farmer of years and experience in this county tells us that if cedar or pine branches are laid between Irish potato rows, that potato bugs, if prevalent, will leave the patch, and if used after potatoes have sprouted, will never make their appearance. This is far preferable to Paris Green, the recognized potato bug exterminator.—Forsythe News.

Have Right to Fly Red Flag.

There has been a spirited contest at East Liverpool, O., between the patriotic societies and the Socialists as to the right of the latter to keep the red flag flying over their headquarters. Time after time the flag was torn down by indignant citizens and replaced by the stars and stripes and once Mayor Marshall ordered out the fire department to remove it. Each time it was taken down, the action was greeted by the cheers of the crowd, but each time also the offending flag was replaced.

Finally the Socialists appealed to the sheriff to protect them and the question was submitted to the attorney-general of the state. He confirmed the contention of the Socialists that since the red flag is not prohibited by law and is not the flag of any nation, it could lawfully be displayed. The decision had hardly been announced before a delegation mounted to the roof of the building and smeared the flag with black. The Socialists offered a reward for the offenders.

The feeling against the red flag is becoming so intense in some places that legislation on the subject is being enacted. Many of the Socialists of the moderate faction are urging that they should adopt some other emblem, and a yellow flag has already been adopted to some extent. The fact that the red flag is the emblem of the anarchists, syndicalists and other apostles of violence is what has given it its bad name.—Pathfinder.

—Anti-Saloon League: "Scientific investigations and experiments along various lines have finally established the fact that intoxicating liquors are no longer necessary for any purpose. For long years the mistaken idea that intoxicating liquors were essential for medical, pharmaceutical, sacramental or scientific purposes fooled the public. The great hospitals of the world, however, during the past twenty years, have largely done away with the use of intoxicants. Many of the greatest medical scientists of this and other countries have discontinued altogether the use of intoxicating liquors. Denatured alcohol is largely taking the place of spirits in the arts. Hundreds of drug stores have ceased to sell the stuff, the great chain of Liggett drug stores throughout the United States just a few weeks ago having published a large advertisement in the leading papers of the twenty-eight cities of the United States announcing that from that time forward intoxicating liquors would not be sold in any Liggett drug store."

—W. W. Landrum, in Biblical Recorder: "Salvation! O the height and depth, the length and breadth, the tremendous and stupendous meaning of that term! Salvation is the grandest thought of the Lord God almighty concerning us; salvation is the biggest word in the dictionary of the human race; salvation is the gloria in excelsis of redeemed spirits in the general assembly and church of the first-born, on high; salvation is of the whole man, body and mind and soul; salvation is to the fullest possible experience being salvation from darkness to light, from slavery to freedom, from hate to love, from fear to confidence, from selfishness to service, from littleness to largeness of aspiration and fellowship; salvation to right correspondence with all relationships being salvation to one's self, to one's family, to one's country and to the world; salvation that is exclusive of all that degrades and damns inclusive of all that ennobles human life; salvation in time and salvation in eternity salvation befitting such a God as ours!"

Unless your doors and windows are well screened, it will do little good to use the swatter. The swatter is all right to use to kill the few flies that get in despite the screens and your vigilance. But it is a waste of time and labor to use the swatter in the unscreened house.

In the United States the yearly waste of infant life is seen in about three hundred thousand (300,000) deaths in the first year. Most of this mortality is due to cruel ignorance.

A NOVEL WAY OF CATCHING FISH

The natives of some of the islands of Oceania have an original way of catching fish. At certain intervals about 200 of them will assemble on the beach and altogether plunge into the water, each at the same time, carrying a branch of the cocoa palm.

At a given distance from the shore, says the New York Herald, they will turn toward it and form a compact circle, each holding his palm branch perpendicularly in the water, thus forming a sort of seine.

The leader of the party gives a signal and this living net approaches the shore gradually, in perfect order, driving before it a multitude of fishes.

Surrounded by palm branches many of the fishes are cast on the sands and others are killed with sticks.

—We congratulate our Winston people on their entrance upon the task of building a new church. We know this requires courage and faith and self-sacrifice, but the end justifies all this. God's cause demands our best and the church building that will best serve the spiritual end is the building to be desired.

BIBLE TEMPERANCE

Next Sunday is temperance Sunday in the Sunday schools. It should be made clear that Bible temperance is something much greater and better than mere abstinence from alcoholic drinks, great and good as that is. Bible temperance is self-control in all things—not simply in the matter of drink. The man who eats too much is intemperate in the Bible sense. So the man who sleeps too much or who talks too much or who allows his temper to get the better of him.

Temperance is sometimes defined as the moderate use of things lawful and total abstinence from things unlawful. Bible temperance goes way beyond that. It has reference not simply to a man's conduct in relation to the things about him, but it is concerned also with the man's motive. The truly temperate man is not simply the man that acts prudently with respect to the things he has to deal with, but he is a man who has a high purpose in view; who controls himself with a view to the attainment of a high end. This end is higher and greater than mere bodily health and comfort, which are enjoyed by the temperate man. It is a moral and spiritual end. The man who is temperate in the Bible sense is temperate because only thus can he be his best self, rise to the height of his spiritual opportunities. He keeps his body under for the sake of his soul. He knows that carnal desires war against the soul. He knows that he must deny himself that he may realize his better self.

Instead of saying, "Let us eat, drink, and be merry, for tomorrow we die," he says, Let us live the true life, whether we eat or not. If both lives cannot be realized, let us sacrifice the lower to the higher. Let us live the life of the spirit, the true life of the soul, and let all things be subordinate thereto.

—Judge Pritchard made the closing address to the Baptist Young People's Convention at Thomasville. His subject was "The Duty We Owe as Respects the Moral, Spiritual, and Intellectual Development of the Community."

—Ex-Senator Palmer, of Michigan, who was president of the World's Fair at Chicago in 1893, has just died after a long illness.

A PLAIN MAN'S SOLUTION OF A PLAIN MAN'S PROBLEM.

In The Methodist Protestant of March 12, there appeared an article under this caption: "A Plain Man and the Higher Criticism." Here is the plain man's problem: "To understand how a higher critic can be a sincere believer in the Bible and a reverent worshiper of Jesus Christ as the Son of God." The author of the article, in a letter to me, expresses the belief that there is a solution of the problem and that I can give it. At his request, and because I believe, with him, that there are many "plain men whom a solution of this problem would greatly benefit and gratify," I offer this solution.

The solution of this problem requires the consideration of three factors: The plain man himself, the higher criticism, and the nature of Christianity. A full discussion of any one of these factors would require volumes, but for the purpose which we have set before us, three articles must suffice. In the first, the plain man will be discussed; in the second, the higher criticism will be discussed; and in the third, some of the essential elements of Christianity will be briefly stated.

What is a plain man? This question is not easily answered, but for our present purpose it will be sufficient to point out a few of his characteristics. Broadly speaking, the plain man is the man of average attainments. The typical plain man is the average man. Though the plain man may be found in gradations considerably above or below the average man, he can be found neither at the top nor at the bottom of society. He is neither foam nor dregs. He is neither an ignoramus nor an intellectual expert. He is a man of common-sense, ripe experience, and mature judgment. His habits of thought and life are fixed and he does not like to have them disturbed. Whatever disturbs them disturbs him. He is, therefore, a conservative man. He looks with suspicion upin new doctrines and new methods. He prefers a holy priest with the law of Moses defending an established order to a righteous prophet with his new message attacking that order. He is certain that the preachers of the old doctrines have a message from God, but these fellows with new doctrines he knows not whence they are. Because he is a conservative man, the plain man gives stability to our institutions. He is both the moral and financial support of the church. He is the conservator of that which is true and good in the old. But like all other men he is fallible.

We are here concerned chiefly with the conservatism of the plain man. By conservatism we mean the disposition to cling to old forms as opposed to new. It should be understood that what is very old in the history of thought may yet be very new to a certain circle of hearers or to a given generation. The fatherhood of God is a doctrine as old as the Bible, but His sovereignty as taught by Augustine and Calvin and their followers obscured it until within the last few generations. Justification by faith is an old doctrine, but to them of the sixteenth century it was new. The Bible is an old book, but each time we read it there comes to us a new meaning. Much of what is called new truth is, in fact, old truth rediscovered. It should, also, be understood that much of that which is old to a given generation is, historically, very new. To some in this generation the class-meeting seems to be very ancient, but Methodism is not yet two hundred years old. The "mourners' bench" is not as as old as the class-meeting. Camp meetings are but a little more than one hundred years old. The mid-week prayer meeting originated within the first half of last century. It is not therefore, what is old in fact, but what seems to him old, that the conservative man cherishes. It is not that which is historically new, but that which seems to him new, that he is inclined to reject.

There are two classes of reasons for this attitude of conservatism. There are, firstly, certain elements in old views and their relations which secure their support; and there are, secondly, certain elements in new views and their relations which repel, and tend to cause their rejection. Each group of elements requires examination.

The number of those adhering to the older views is always much greater than the number of those accepting the new. The children of any generation receive religious truth from the mature people of their times. What is taught has, by the teacher, been correlated with the facts of experience. To the extent in which the experience of the children resembles that of the teacher that is taught will be in harmony with their experience. Such teaching will be woven into the children's whole view of life, and unless contradicted by some latter experience is almost certain to become a permanent part of life. At first the children accept what is taught on the authority of the teacher, but a system of thought developed through ages of study and experience is sure to have in it much to commend it to the thoughtful. Besides, the teacher has at his command well-tried arguments in support of his teaching. The result is that only the most active and powerful minds will depart from what they have been taught. There are but few such minds. It is a rare thing that two men of the same generation make the same discovery. Almost every new truth has, but a single teacher. Vast multitudes teach the old.

There is a natural inertia of thought. Mental habit, like any other habit, resists change. Of the few to whom the newer views have been presented after the older have been accepted, it is likely that but a small proportion will change their views. Of course, if all minds were constantly and actively logical, such would not be the case. But very few minds are thus rationally active. In those spheres of life which occupy their time and energy most directly, men are more actively rational. But even within those spheres the men who, by logical thinking, improve on the ideas and methods transmitted to them by others are the exception. The more completely religious instruction becomes interwoven with all the principles and ideals of life, and the more seriously religious views are applied to conduct, the more certain it is that any considerable change of religious conceptions would involve for the most earnest religious persons a mental revolution, a recasting of the whole outlook upon life. The tendency to restrict such a revolution is very strong.

Ths intellectual inertia is greatly strengthened by emotional inertia. Religious views affect the emotional ties which bind men to persons, human and divine. The whole strength of these emotions opposes any change which may seem to reflect upon the object of these emotions. The first class of such emotional ties is that uniting the individual with his friends, his kindsmen, and his forefathers. To discard a belief which has been earnestly held and defended by some hero or saint whom I honor, some friend with whom I have the most intimate and affectionate relations, seems to be a reflection on his judgment and mental powers, if not on his character. The more noble the nature, the more it revolts from such disloyalty, and the stronger the motive to distrust the newer view. The second class of such emotional ties is that existing between a man and the object of his devotions. For example, most Christians have been taught that God is omnipotent and that with Him nothing is impossible. It therefore seems irreverent to ask whether God can make a stone so big that He cannot lift it. Calvin was so possessed by the idea of God's sovereignty that the doctrine of man's free agency could find no place in his system. Men very naturally resist any doctrine which seems to lower God's position or diminish the glory which belongs to Him.

Where the origin of the older religious views is obscured there is a general tendency to conceive them as, in some way, having a superhuman origin. They are supposed to have the authority of God behind them. Consequently the newer views are regarded as opposing God, contradicting His Word, or denying His veracity. Hence they are abhorred and feared by the pious, and looked upon as traps and snares, the more dangerous as they are the more reasonable. This feeling exists in all degrees, from the sorrowful disapproval of one who is thought to be mistakenly teaching what is different from God-revealed truth to fanatical persecution of the man who dares to "blaspheme God" by teachings contrary to the popular religion. To a certain degree this attitude is to be found in almost every age and among almost every people. It was a very important factor in the opposition of the Jews to the prophets and to Christ. "We know that God spake unto Moses; as for this fellow, we know not from whence he is." This feeling is sometimes manifested in ludicrous ways, as in the case of the woman, when the minister began to read from the Revised Version of the Bible, indignantly left the church, saying that if the King James Version was good enough for Paul, it was good enough for her.

Either beliefs occupy a peculiar place in memory. Even when they have been subsequently supplanted by newer beliefs, in periods of great excitement, strain, passion, weakness, sorrow, pain and frequently in the dying hour the older beliefs are apt to return to their original place in the mind. Illustrations of this fact are common enough. The principle of the Roman Catholic Church that in the first seven years of a child's life it can imprint its doctrines so firmly upon the mental nature that they will be practically ineffaceable, is a recognition of the fact. The earlier beliefs were accepted with a whole-heartedness and perfect faith which, from the nature of the case, cannot be given to the latter ones. Then, too, the earlier beliefs are associated with the most optimistic and innocent period of life, and with those memories which are most vivid and most dear in later years. There will, therefore, be a glory and strength above the earlier forms of belief which only in rare instances can be equalled by later forms, however sincerely they are accepted. Besides, the latter will seldom be so harmoniously adjusted, or so intimately interwoven with the general views of life and its interests and affections, as the earlier. Hence the frequently preponderating power of the earlier forms.

Evangelists who preach the old doctrines are generally more successful than those who preach the new. For this there are two reasons. The enthusiasm, confidence, and energy of a man in preaching his beliefs will be commonly in proportion to the degree of assurance with which he holds them, and this is almost necessarily greater in the case of one who holds without change the faith first presented to him. The man who has never admitted any doubt or question with regard to his faith will be more intense than the one who recognizes a measure of truth in doctrines which he does not accept and a measure of error in doctrines which at first he accepted unreservedly, and who admits the possibility that some elements in the faith which he still holds may be mistaken and have to be abandoned when fuller light shall come. The note of certainty is a most valuable factor in evangelism. In addition to the note of certainty there must be the stirring of emotions. This can best be done by awakening memories of the past. The memories of early life, the period of innocence, and unquestioning faith, are most effective. With such memories the old doctrines are intimately associated. The new doctrines do not carry us back so far in memory, and if they have been adjusted to our experience, it is usually to a much later experience. Hence in evangelism the old doctrines are much more effective.

From the above considerations it may be very readily seen why the conservative man clings to the old. Let us now see why he is inclined to reject the new.

New doctrines have the weight of popular prejudice against them. The minds of most men are preoccupied by the old beliefs. Almost everything which commends the old tends to discredit the new. The new cannot win a place beside the old without a struggle. Very often the new does not get a fair hearing. On such subjects so much is spoken and written that few have the time or competence to judge it all. Hence most men have to rely upon the judgment of others. Such judgments are not always either intelligent or impartial. It is often enough to condemn a teaching that it disagrees with some familiar conceptions. Sometimes a man's views will not be considered because of the denomination or school or persons with which he is associated. In other cases prejudice is aroused against the opinions of a writer because of some eccentricities in his character. Anything, in fact, which can be said against a man from any point of view may be sufficient to prevent his ideas from receiving attention from those who would otherwise consider and perhaps accept them.

Men of well-balanced and sober judgment are likely to be repelled by the temperment and character of those who defend and those who readily accept opinions while they are new or because they are new, and to reject the opinions out of distaste for their adherents. This may be illustrated by considering various classes of people who are predisposed to accept the new.

Thoughtless and frivolous people are apt to be attracted by the new and to accept it solely because of its novelty. Such people have no serious occupation or view of life. They desire to be entertained by novel things, whether in the material or in the mental world. They are most attracted by those teachers, those churches and that literature which have a reputation for novelty, or heresy, or liberalism. If a preacher of the newer views avoids the name of innovation, he will hardly draw hearers of this class, however new and radical his views may be. On the other hand, the man who advertises his radicalism will have a train of novelty-seekers, though at bottom his teaching may be innocuous and even commonplace. This helps to explain the weakness of liberal churches and the ineffectiveness of sensational preaching. The people just described will not sacrifice money or time, or strength to assist in propagating the faith which they assume so easily and hold to those who are earnestly trying to do their duty and make the world better.

Erratic people are prone to accept new doctrines because they seem to promise the satisfaction of some need which the old has not met. Just because the older churches, doctrines, and methods are adapted to the average, the normal man, they frequently fail to meet the peculiar needs of the abnormal. Consequently ill-balanced persons of all sorts are likely to leave conservative surroundings and to consort with circles in which new ideas are welcome, and especially where satisfaction seems to be offered to their individual bent. The mystic will be attracted by Theosophy; the sick, by Christian Science; those who have an appetite for the supernatural, by claims of special revelation from God and the power to work miracles; the seeker for industrial and social reform, by the church which gives special attention to that subject. But of course the ordinary man feels uncomfortable in the society of extremists of any sort, and is likely to avoid that which pleases them just for that reason.

The newer doctrines are likely to be accepted by the young and immature. Why this is so may be easily understood from the preceding discussion. But because of the limitations of knowledge, experience and judgment which belong to their age, they cannot have the broader outlook which preserves the truth in the old forms of thought which they reject. They are usually more impressed by the contrast between the old and the new than by their agreement. They go to extremes in their zeal for the new and their repudiation of the old. They are very likely to be impatient with the "old fogies" who refuse to see the new light. Such young people, to a certain extent, misrepresenting the newer conceptions, just as they fail of sympathetic understanding of the older, arouse in more mature minds both reasonable objections to their views and prejudice against those views, and alienate some who might otherwise be more hospitable to new doctrine.

Frequently self-interest is involved in one's opposition to the new. Manual labor is prone to oppose the machine that would displace it. The tendency is for public school teachers to look with disfavor upon any change of methods or standards that would disqualify them. Capitalists as a rule object to any change of the economic conditions under which large fortunes were accumulated. Vice does not like to be disturbed. It is a severe tax upon the goodness of many old men to give place to more efficient young men. Many intelligent youths will refuse to take counsel of the old because the acceptance of that counsel would involve some unpleasant change. Sometimes the most violent opponents of the new are the young who cannot readily adjust themselves to it and are unprepared to use it. Some of those who contend most earnestly for the old-time religion are young ministers who have very little knowledge of the real old-time religion. Some of them identify religion with some system of thought, form of worship, peculiar religious experience, or methods of church work with which they have been familiar from early youth, and call that the old-time religion. That is good enough for them, hence the good becomes the foe of the better.

Finally, new doctrines tend to unsettle faith. When they are recognized, they either displace the old or require a readjustment. In either case, there follows an unsettled condition of mind. Almost every great intellectual awakening has been followed by a period of skepticism. Every new truth has had to fight for recognition. Monotheism, Christianity, Protestantism, Arminianism, and Methodism were once new. With what resistance they met from the established order they who know history are familiar. The conservative man loves peace and resists change. Any new doctrine, therefore, which disturbs his peace of mind or necessitates a change is to him unwelcome.

We cannot dispense with the conservative man. We would not, if w ecould. We love him because he loves the old truth. We would love him more, did he love all truth, both old and new. That is what the true conservative does. We have not yet fully comprehended God's Word. Much of the Bible has been misunderstood. Has the limit of our comprehension been reached? If so, why study the Bible any more? Are we willing to have our misunderstandings removed? If so, why reject the truth that would dispel them? Every true disciple is still a learner. He is therefore continually coming into possession of new truths. So long as the Spirit of Truth continues to reveal to us the true meaning of the Bible, we shall bring forth out of that treasure truths new and old.—C. E. Forelines in the Methodist Protestant.

DEDICATION OF REIDSVILLE CHURCH

It was my privilege and honor to be with our faithful band in Reidsville for the dedication of their church on Sunday morning, July first. Bro. Raper and his people are to be congratulated for what they have done in a material way, and we may confidently expect great things of them spiritually.

I was agreeably surprised to find such a beautiful, well arranged, nicely furnished church building. Then, too, we have been speaking of it as our little church in Reidsville. But it is not little: for it will seat about five hundred people, hence will supply the need for our people there for several years, except possibly for Sunday school rooms.

The church was filled with people, who seemed eager for the gospel, at the dedicatory service.

It was a glad day for the writer, and especially was it a glad day for Bro. Raper and the forty-five Methodist Protestants who have joined him in his efforts there, and also for many others around Reidsville who have longed to see a Methodist Protestant church there. The church is well located, and is easy to get to from any part of the town. The late Rev. Geo. S. Kernodle, and his faithful wife, who is one of the most noble workers the church has, made it possible for our people there to have this beautiful churchr. Bro. Raper, I am sure, will give the facts and figures at the proper time.

It feel that it was a great day for all Methodist Protestants who participated in the services, and others seemed to enjoy the day very greatly.

The church and furnishings, free of all debt, were presented by the pastor, and the writer had the pleasur of dedicating them to the services of God.

Yours for the Master,
A. G. Dixon.

WOMAN'S BOARD OF HOME MISSIONS IN PITTSBURGH, PA.

At the Annual Meeting recommendations were made for the N. C. Branch of Home Missions to continue their orphanage work, and allow dues and all funds raised to be used for the Children's Home. The other Branches to aid in the Pine Ridge School and evangelistic work for the mountain people of Kentucky. A whirl wind campaign was put on to raise funds to complete school building at Pine Ridge and build a dormitory. This was in charge of the Pittsbrugh Branch which was organized during this annual meeting, Mrs. Jas. H. Gordon, 236 W. Dilbridge St., Pittsburgh, Chairman of Committee, and Mrs. McCracken Secretary.

Dr. Chas. H. Beck, Secretary and Treasurer Men's Board of Home Missions, attended the meeting and gave aid and advice. The ministers of the various Pittsburgh churches also attended the meetings, and were much interested in the work which was being done by the women, and opened their churches on Sunday to them, allowing them to present the different phases of the work. Interest in Home Missions is growing. Men and women realize today more than ever before the needs along the line of mission work at home. It appeals to everybody, and there are many lines along which one may work and accomplish great good. Mrs. A. G. Dixon was re-elected president and was greatly honored for the faithful, efficient work she has done during her term of offic. Miss Alice Conway, Catawba, Ohio, was reelected Coresponding Secretary, also Mrs. Fred Neer, Mechanicsburg, Ohio, Treasurer. The next Annual Meeting will be held in High Point, North Carolina. NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

The 14th and 15th were spent with Bro. Johnson and his people on Tabernacle Circuit. Saturday, 11 A. M., I preached to a small congregation. The people were busy in the harvest fields.

We took dinner with Brother and Sister Merrimon Brown. Brother Johnson took me to Mr. Cecil Moser's where I spent the night pleasantly with him and his mother.

On Sunday A. M. he took me to see some of the neople in the neighborhood. At 10 o'clock we were at Moriah Church for Sunday school; there was a very good attendance and a very good interest manifested. The house was about full of interested hearers, and we had a good service, and this is always true when the people come to worship and serve the Lord. Some of the leaders in this church want to build a new church. Some want to add to the old one. The present church does not represent the ability of the membership, and if our people, not only in this community, expect to hold and retain our young people we must build and have good, neat and nice churches. A new church is what this community wants and needs, and I am hoping they will decide in favor of a new church.

Mr. Luther Shepard conveyed me to his home for dinner, and I fared sumptuously. At 2 o'clock Luther and I started to Tabernacle, and we arrived on time; a large congregation, and good attention given to the word. It was a pleasure to visit this field, having been the pastor so recently. This is one of our best fields, and a very strong field, if properly developed.

I visited Julian in March and they are moving along smoothly as usual. They have an ideal membership. They "do things."

I saw the parsonage had received a coat of paint and it makes the pastor's home look more attractive. I wondered why Brother Johnson or the reporters from Tabernacle Circuit had not reported that, and several other good and encouraging things from the charge. Let the pastors and reporters write up the good and encouraging things from the various fields regardless of "Peter Slewfoot." I know he likes good things. I venture to say, his appetite was aroused when he saw the statements in the Herald that some of the brethren were receiving hams and other good things.

Brother T. A. Hunter put me in Greensboro in time to come to High Point on train No. 35. He has my thanks.

Permit me to say to all the ministerial brethren in the active work especially, come to the Summer Conference, if you can do so. It will be worth so much more to us than our Sub-District Conference. If your name does not appear in the list of speakers, I am sure the Chairman will give an opportunity for others who have something to say.

Claim over paid.

June 16. C. A. Cecil.

FROM OUR PASTORS

STANLY

The meeting held in Albemarle a few weeks ago was a success. Rev. G. F. Millaway did all the preaching and made a fine impression. There were four conversions and five additions to the church. Four of this number are bright young people and bid fair to become strong pillars in the church. If the pastor could give more time to this point it would develop far more rapidly. This "in and out" work does not accomplish much in town.

Mill Grove seems to be doing better than usual. They have a good Sunday school and a lively cottage prayer meeting. They expect to hold a Children's Day service second Sunday in July. The pastor is nowhere treated more kindly than when among this people. Yesterday morning as I was leaving the home of Bro. Vernon Kiser he and Bro. Fincher almost filled the buggy with fine cabbage. We certainly appreciate all their acts of kindness. The new railroad passes right in front of the church about 150 yards away. About four or five hundred yards from the church towards Rocky River the depot has been located. This means that Mill Grove will likely soon become a thriving town. Our church owns about five acres of land here and it is most beautifully located. We must keep our eye on this point. Stanly has four live Sunday schools and each school makes a monthly donation to the Orphan's Home. We are expecting great things during the revival meetings.

We met a large and attentive congregation at Love's Grove yesterday.

BUNCOMBE CIRCUIT

We held our second quarterly meeting at Mt. Valley on Saturday before the second Sunday in May. Rev. W. A. Lamar preached at 11 o'clock, after which the usual business was transacted, all in good spirit. The nominees for delegate to Annual Conference are Brothers John Gill and Samuel Angel. The work is moving on, but quiet. We were glad to have Bro. Lamar with us at Democrat in our special meeting. He works for souls. His preaching was very good, but the unsaved seemed to still hold on to darkness rather than come out in the light. The church was revived. Bro. Casto from Pensacola was with us a few days and preached one time. Was glad to have Bros. Lamar and Casto with us. Brethren, come again.

We have six splendid Sunday schools on this work and our Terry's Fork, Mt. Valley, Mt. Zion and Clark's Chapel are truly alive in the Sunday school work. Last Sunday we were at Terry's Fork and we met the largest congregation of any time this year. After preaching we went to Brother Nelson Anderson's where we were welcomed, refreshing ourselves with a good dinner. We were glad to meet with his two daughters, Pansy and Augusta, who are at home on vacation from teaching. We were also glad to meet Bro. Carter's two girls. They also are at home from their schools. President's Appointments

Rev. C. A. Cecil will preach at Sandy Cross on Saturday, June 27, at 11 A. M. and at Bethany 3 P. M. same day.

Our meeting closed on Monday night after the second Sunday. Bro. A. G. Dixon preached three sermons and J. H. Moton did the rest. Our people loved their preaching and the old-time way. We appreciate their efforts with us. The churches were revived. Several reclamations, six conversions. I will open the door of the church next Sunday. It was our pleasure to have Brother Moton in our home during the meeting. It does us good to mingle with our preachers or ministers. We feel it was a benediction to our home to have this man of God with us. We hope both can come again. People of other churches said to me. It seems so much like home religion to come to your church. That did

THE UNITED STATES, CALIFORNIA AND JAPAN.

By Walter K. Towers, A. B., J. D., of The Michigan Bar.

The wide publicity given to the proposal of the commonwealth of California to bar the Japanese from ownership of real estate in that state, the ineffectual protests of the executive heads of the United States and Japan, brings before us the complex form of our government. We all know that there is a national government and a state government. We have been told that the United States is supreme—yet as to just how far it is supreme is a matter that is not altogether clear to most of us. How is it that the state of California has passed a law denying to Japanese the right to own land within the state when the national government may have (though we have no evidence that congress has) entirely different wishes about the matter?,

The field of government is divided between the United States and the state. The United States has the powers given under the constitution which we have read and re-read as it appears in the back of school histories. The powers and capabilities given the United States under that wonderful document are the only powers in possession. It has no natural, inherent powers. Congress may legislate only concerning the the matters of which the constitution gives the national government control. The federal courts have jurisdiction only of questions involving the United States constitution, its laws, or treaties. The constitution gives to the United States the entire treatymaking power and bars the individual states from the realm of international relations.

As to all matters which the federal government does not exclusively control under the constitution, the state has complete and sovereign powers. The state is possessed of all the powers of government not denied it by the federal constitution. Thus we have two governments, each supreme within its sphere. When the two authorities come into conflict the state authority must yield, for the federal power is supreme insofar as it reaches. But in matters of which the federal government is given no control under the constitution, the state's power is complete. Generally the state has complete power to regulate its internal affairs. And so it is that we find the state prescribing who may own real property within its borders. Every state by its laws prescribes who may hold land.

One restraint that is placed upon the state is by the provision of the constitution that the treaties of the federal government stand upon the same plane as the laws of congress—they are the supreme law of the land, and if any provision in a state constitution or law is inconsistent with a federal enactment the measure of the state must give away. The state in making its laws must have regard for the treaties which the United States has negotiated with foreign countries. California was free to enact any measure she saw fit concerning the ownership of land so long as no provision of the treaty was contravened.

California's avowed purpose was to discriminate against the Japanese, who had begun to settle in that state in large numbers, acquiring the ownership of farm lands. With the Californians it is a vital question, a question of the kind of a man who is to be your neighbor, and the kind of children who are to go to school with your children. California did not wish to bar all aliens from owning land, for that would drive our foreign capitalists who are assisting in the materal development of the state's vast natural resources. The discrimination in the bill originally proposed was found in the phrase "aliens ineligible to citizenship" which aroused such strong protest from President Wilson and the state department as being offensive to a friendly nation. This distinction is the one which the United States has itself enacted into its laws governing who may become citizens. The right to become a United States citizen by naturalization is limited to "aliens, being free white persons, and to persons of African descent."

Thus, generally speaking, only members of the European races may become citizens of the United States. The courts do not view the Jap as a white man.The son of a German father and a Japanese mother was recently denied the right of citizenship. Chinese, Filipinos, and members of other of the yellow or brown races have repeatedly been denied citizenship under the federal law.

When the state says that "aliens ineligible for citizenship" may not own land it takes advantage of the distinction in the federal law and it means that members of all but the white and black races are barred. Other states than California already have such measures. The alien land law of Washington provides that "any alien, except such as by the law of the United States are incapable of becoming citizens of the United States any acquire and hold land," etc. The state of Arizona in 1912 enacted that "no person not eligible to become a citizen of the United States shall acquire title to land or real property," etc. Other states restrict all aliens, generally. The federal constitution contains a provision which prevents a state from barring the citizens of other states within the United States, for that document requires that there be no discrimination against citizens of other states within the United States.

The Webb Act, which California substituted for the measure earlier proposed, drops the phrase "ineligible to citizenship" yet preserves the same distinction and arrives at the same end in very much the same way, still relying upon the discriminations made by the federal law of citizenship. Under it all aliens eligible to citizenship may acquire and hold land in the same manner as citizens of the United States. All other aliens may acquire and hold land "in the manner and to the extent and for the purpose described by any treaty now existing between the government of the United States and the nation or country of which such alien is a citizen or subject."

Fortunately for California's purpose of barring Orientalists from ownership of land, the existing treaty with Japan does not extend to Japanese the right to own agricultural land. Under the terms of the treaty Japanese subjects are permitted to own "houses and land for residential purposes, factories, manufactories and shops." Another clause permits them to "lease lands for residential and commercial purposes." But the treaty does not extend to them the right of acquiring farming land within the United States and so the state of California is not required, by law, to give them any greater powers.

This is how California may pass a law that affects the relations of the entire country with a foreign nation, without the consent of the whole.

IMPRESSIONS OF A TRIP IN A ZEPPELIN DIRIGIBLE.

People in Germany can now experience the sensation of making a tour by the air route. The huge Zeppelin steerable balloons that are employed in the passenger service are practically as comfortable and safe as any other vehicles. Of course these air ship journeys are still a novelty, but it will probably be but a few years till a person will think no more of getting into an aircraft to travel than of getting into an auto. It is only 20 years ago that the auto was fully as much of an experiment as the airship now is.

The following description of a trip in a Zeppelin, published in the Scientific American, gives as vivid an idea as possible of how it seems when a person takes his first ride in one of these up-to-date leviathans of the air.

It is the absolute novelty of the sensation that renders it impossible to imagine beforehand just how it feels to journey through the air in the ideal comfort and with the safety and speed which characterize a Zeppelin airship, says the writer The sensation is a combination of the distinct impressions; the bigness; complexity and self-sufficiency of this new world of ours, its complete detachment, and finally, its mighty powers.

Balloons, aeroplanes, smaller airships, cannot impress one so strongly. Their cramped quarters and moderate dimensions do not suggest such a "world in itself." Their progress is not so certain. They have the jarring and jerking characteristic of earthly locomotion. But in a Zeppelin one feels as if one were on another planet, circling through space on its prescribed course. One loses the sense of speed and at times might think himself still hovering in mid-air were it not that the picture below keeps on changing as frequently and quite as softly and smoothly as the floating fancies of a dream.

In the cabin there is complete absence of vibration and noise; for the hum of propellers and motors is as subdued as the rustling of trees and the softest speaking voice is distinctly audible. The motion would suggest the drifting of a spherical balloon were it not that the mind is very quickly impressed by the fact that it is not as aimless. Only when something in this floating panorama below tries to remain, do you realize, with a start, the amount of "brute force" (nearly 500 horse-power) that keeps your dream going.

If you see the locomotive of an express train with the piston-rods vibrating to and fro, gradually falling behind with its tail of waving handkerchiefs on a track that runs parallel to your course, you feel a sudden respect for the driving power of the great propellors fore and aft.

Later a flight of pigeons appears at a lower level, also going in the same direction. They hold their own only for a while—until they turn from our course. In the cabin the air is not at rest. A fitful breeze, just enough to remind you that you are flying, comes in occasional puffs through the windows, but even outside the air is sucked along by the huge hull and does not blow against the extended hand with force corresponding to the ship's velocity. But a hurricane sweeps into the exposed front car.

The pilot of the aeroplane meeting the "Victoria Luise" would behold the unusual sight of a man at the helm in the uniform of naval sailors wearing automobile goggles. Recently a transparent windshield has been fitted to the 'bridge.'' The crew of the big passenger Zeppelins last summer was partly composed of naval sailors and officers being trained to man the huge new airship of the navy. The peculiar character of the cabin, which on earth drew from among every visitor to the shed the simple exclamation, "A dining-car," appears only after the airship has ascended. After landing it seems to shrink into insignificance; but a thousand feet up in the air it feels as roomy and as gorgeous as a palace.

The passengers are housed as in an apartment. The aluminum gangway is folded against the wall, opposite the door through which you pass in entering the ship. In front you see the steward's little pantry, with a door opening into the long passageway to the front car and to the machinery and steering devices.

Looking up upon entering you "see heaven" through an endless tube, made of canvas and aluminum rings, forming an inclosed well up through the gasbag of the balloon. Closer inspection reveals a double flight of ladder steps fitted against the tube's wall. A short aluminum ladder is also strapped to the side of the passageway that can be locked to the lower end of the tube to complete access to the observation platform (practically a small deck) on top of the hull.

At the rear end of the cabin you pass again through a door to a floor of ribbed aluminum plates. Its right corner serves as a wash-room, its left corner is partitioned off for the wireless telegraphy. In the center another door opens into the rear passageway -an endless vista, reaching beyond the rear car to the hind-most point of the hull, where a man may climb through one of the round canvas-covered portions, and out over the frames of the rudders and stabilizing planes to make repairs, a thousand feet above the ground. An engineer is always sent to the porthole shortly after the ship has got under way to inspect the running of the rudders. A narrow path of ribbed aluminum, carried on low steps, forms the floor of the passageways.

In the shed the cabin looks a poor protection against the weather; of the six large windows on each side, the three in the rear are gaping holes. Those in front have such neat and practical panes of "cellon," that if necessary the rear ones could be at any time equally protected. But when the airship ran into a drenching rain there was not a trace of dampness or discomfort in the cabin. Looking through the paneless windows, one might see whole streets of water blown to the rear, but the wide overhang of the hull above and the speed of the ship, never permitted a side gust to blow any rain toward the windows. To notions acquired in houses or in railroad cars or ships, the airship's cabin seems protected by magic. It was a pleasure to walk through its length and to think that you were virtually "walking on air."

There is so much room that the upholstered willow chairs seem hidden on the sides and never in the way of people passing each other. It was thrilling to hear the footsteps far back in the "hold," hear the door open and then see an engineer from the rear car, in damp oilcloth emerges through another door and continue on this way to the front car to report at the "bridge."

There was coming and going of sailors (aerial apprentices), who complained how nerve-racking the "dreadful responsibility" made even their short shifts at the "wheels" (in an airship there is more than one helm). The strangest sensation, after all, was the "cruise in cloudland." It was a stormy morning; on the way to the air harbor, heavy showers poured against the windows of the street-car. The clouds were hanging low, torn into fantastic and beautiful shapes of all shades between black and white. After ascending, the airship was directly among them; several times it ran into them and all became gray outside and a peculiar odor was noticeable. When we emerged it was uncanny to see the dark masses float by at the level of the ship. But the cabin felt so homelike that any feeling of fear or dizziness was out of the question. Wonderfully reassuring was the fact that one had a "roof over one's head," even a beautiful mahogany ceiling

The sunlit landscape, seen from not too great an altitude and from a swiftly-moving observatory, was an experience so novel that no comparison will give a true idea of it. It is different from the view from a mountain because most objects are so much nearer, while from a tower or sky-scraper the lower altitude makes the field of sight comparatively limited. The determined swift movement of an airship gives the vista the same depth as from a high mountain, yet things appear much more distinct. The result of this and of the entire lack of such experience is a truly bewildering richness of vision, quite beyond the mind's power of grasp. The most familiar scenery appears disguised beyond recognition. Well-known buildings are the most useful clews to identification; then rivers, districts, ponds and roads. Forests, trees, hills, the outlines of towers, help but little. In an airship one realizes the first time how little we see in everyday life. Everything is pitilessly laid bare; secrets seem stripped stark naked. We fly over a village; it is still misty and we pass it quickly. Yet during these few seconds we can make an excellent guess at the fortunes of each inhabitant. We take in all the telltale marks about a stable and learn the number and condition of the stock inside. There is no hiding in a forest, the ground is directly visible between the trees and through the branches.

The airship's freedom from any fixed line of travel, except among high mountains, has a very unusual effect. The country through which this trip extended was quite familiar to the visitor, yet the airship took him for the first time to two never-visited cities around Frankfurt, which were touched on the "airline" as a matter of course, and just as early as the other ones which he had been. Even with present high fares, airship travel pays well for the foreign tourist who wants to get acquainted with a country. He sees as much of it in hours as otherwise he could get in weeks.—The Pathfinder.

ST. PAUL M. P. CHURCH

Since our last report there have been two conversions, making thirty-one conversions and six reclamations. Fifteen joined the church last Sunday and six others yet to join. We are glad that the Lord has blessed us here with a very encouraging revival. The work is His, may it be to His praise. G. F. Millaway.

FROM LOCAL REPORTERS

WINSTON-SALEM

A beautiful change has come over the spirit of our dreams, and we gladly write to tell the good news, as the contract has been awarded and the building of our new church is to commence at once, and the contractor promises to try to have it completed by October. The builder is of a responsible firm, and we are looking forward to the time when we are to have a handsome new church. This agreeable change was made possible by the untiring efforts of our pastor and a few unfaltering members (whose names we hope are written in heaven) and the cost when completed has been estimated at about ten thousand dollars, one-half of which has already been promised.

There are so many attractive features about our church here; one is that there seems to be more real spirituality in our services than any other in the city, and our music is always fine and inspiring.

Brethren and friends, will you pray that we may glorify God in our church work here. More anon. Reporter.

THOMASVILLE

On Saturday evening, June 14, at from three until five o'clock, Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Boyles entertained a large portion of our Sunday school (the whole school being invited) at their beautiful home in the western part of town.

The smaller children enjoyed themselves for a while playing games in the yard, while the larger ones were in the parlor listening to music rendered by several of the attendants.

Eight of the girls were busily engaged giving the correct names of a basket of leaves Mrs. Boyles had gathered, of different kinds of flowers, vegetables and trees. Miss Beulah Harris, naming the most, was given a nice box of candy.

Just before leaving, the children were served with ice-cream cones and cracker sandwiches and delightful cold drinks on the porch, while the married guests were invited to the dining-room, where refreshments were served by the hostess, assisted by Mrs. Johnson and Mrs. Williams.

After spending the hours pleasantly the guests returned to the homes, feeling much indebted to Mr. and Mrs. Boyles for their hospitality and kindness.

Was sorry indeed our Supt. and wife, Mr. and Mrs. Connell, were not present, for I am sure they would have added greatly to the pleasure of the occasion.

A Guest.

ROSE HILL, MONROE CIRCUIT

Our pastor, Bro. Stacy, filled his appointment Sunday morning, taking as his text, For what shall it profit a man of he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul, or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?

We believe this was the most interesting sermon we have heard Brother Stacy preach. Two new additions were also made to the church Sunday.

Our S. S. has not been quite as large as usual on account of much sickness in the community.

Our special meeting will begin here the third Sunday in July. We are expecting to have Bro. D. A. Braswell to assist our pastor in this meeting. We want to ask an interest in your prayers for this meeting. Ruth Chavis, Reporter.

BURLINGTON

Our S. S. attendance last Sunday was 212 and the offering amounted to $4.40. Our school is progressing nicely under the wise management of Superintendent Rogers. While there has been no great increase in the attendance for the past six months, yet the average attendance has been greater than the same period of time comparing with the first six months of last year.

The children are being trained for Children's Day exercises which will be held very soon, probably the first Sunday night in July.

We were very glad indeed to have with us on Sunday, June 8th, Bro. B. M. Cates of Florida, who spoke to the Sunday school very interestingly on the Sunday school lesson. He told of his Sunday school in Florida, the average attendance, etc., but said our school was ahead of his in the matter of average attendance, which speaks well for our school.

Next Sunday morning is the time for the election of officers of our school for the remaining six-months term of this year. It is hoped that a good attendance may be had, as the matter of selecting officers is a very important one.

The Ladies' Aid Society held a call meeting Monday afternoon at the parsonage. They are preparing for a church anniversary which will be held on Wednesday evening, June 25th, in the annex. It s proposed to be of a social nature, and h addition to the sociable feature the nniversary will be celebrated by a special repared program consisting of a history f the church and addresses by ex-pastors. The Ladies' Aid Society will have charge f the exercises.

Bro. Davis, our pastor, preached at Glenn Raven M. P. Church last Sunday afternoon, filling Rev. G. L. Curry's appointment. Bro. Curry was called on to duct the funeral of one of his mem- rs at Haw River.

Miss Susie Stafford, who has been teaching in Henderson the past winter, is at home for the summer vacation.

MT. CARMEL, GRANVILLE CIRCUIT

Our Children's Day service was held last night, Sunday night, June 15. Really we think it was a success. Being a very beautiful night the congregation was unusually large. Some thought that the church could have been filled twice. The congregation, though many were standing, seemed interested and expressed their appreciation by a contribution of $9.50.

Next of particular interest with us is our annual picnic.

PINE GROVE, OAK RIDGE CIRCUIT

Our pastor, Rev. W. R. Lowdermilk, filled his appointment Sunday with a very interesting and helpful sermon to a very good and attentive congregation. Our S. S. is progressing nicely. We are surely very glad that our Sunday school has increased so much in the last month or so. We will be glad to welcome any more who will come. It is the duty of us all, whether we are members of a church or not, to attend Sunday school every Sunday when not providentially hindered. I am sorry to say that there are several people, children especially, who could attend regularly if they only would. It is my earnest hope that they may see and correct their error in the near future. M. C. J.

PINEY GROVE, UWHARRIE CIRCUIT

We were all disappointed Sunday because our dear pastor, Bro. Trogdon, could not be with us, as his health would not permit. We ask all the Christian people to pray that he may be restored to health, that he may go on and preach the Gospel.

We had a good prayer meeting, and the Lord did bless us. Oh! how good is the old-time prayer meeting! It binds our hearts together and makes us feel like praising the Lord and living near our heavenly Father every day.

Our Sunday school is still progressing nicely. We have on our honor roll eighty-nine. We are preparing to hold Children's Day service the fifth Sunday. We extend an invitation to the Editor to be with us and let us all pray that this may be the most bountiful year of saving precious souls. Turah Cameran.

CANAAN, UWHARRIE CIRCUIT

I will try again to write a few lines to this kind and welcome paper that comes to our home every week. We take several papers, but I would not give this paper for all of the rest, for when I sit down and can read so many good reports from all over this land, it seems to help me to live closer to our dear Lord, and that is one of the greatest things we are to do, to live close to our dear Lord and try to do the things that he would be pleased for us to do.

Our little Sunday school is getting on nicely and we expect to have a nice Children's Day the third Sunday in July. We still keep our prayer meeting up every first Sunday. We ask the prayers of the Christians. Margaret Ridge.

CONCORD

Bro. Suits is our pastor and we all love him and his family very much. He preaches some of the best sermons we have ever heard. His preaching is the straight gospel truth. We have good attendance at Sunday school. Our congregation at preaching is increasing each Sunday. We have an interesting prayer meeting every Wednesday night. The Ladies' Aid Society is doing a good work. May God bless Bro. Suits and his companion and sweet little girls, and make him a power here on earth for the upbuilding of God's kingdom. Wm. Earnhardt.

CENTER, ALAMANCE CIRCUIT

Children's Day was held at Center fourth Sunday in May. A large crowd was present and the exercises were enjoyed very much. A pantomime by Mrs. Rufus Curl who is deaf and dumb was very beautiful, the song being "Nearer, My God, to Thee." Collection amounted to $15.22.

Our missionary society met at the home of Mrs. Ed Lindley first Sunday in June. Our program was rendered and music was better than usual, as we had Miss Bessie Guthrie, one of our young girl members, with us. She has been in school at Guilford College. Our collection amounted to $1.29. We adjourned to meet next at the church second Sunday in July, at which time we are going to hold our Thank-Offering meeting. There will be two services and dinner on the ground. We are expecting a sermon by Bro. Pike on Missions in the a. m. and in the p. m. we will hold our service. We are anxious for a large crowd.

Miss Daisy Richardson is visiting her sister, Mrs. Causey, and is soon going to Piedmont to spend a few weeks. We miss her very much in our meetings and at S. S.

Mr. Web Lindley is at home now from Raleigh on vacation.

MT. CARMEL NO. 1, PIEDMONT CIRCUIT

Our president, C. A. Cecil, was with us the fourth Sunday in May and preached a splendid sermon. On the first Sunday our pastor, A. D. Shelton, preached a fine sermon. His text, The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want. I thought he explained it well. He surely does well for a young man. Hope he may never falter by the way and live to do much good. I like to give praise to any one trying to do good, and I believe in giving flowers to people while they are living and not wait until they die and then pile them all on their grave. We are getting along very nicely with our Sunday school. It is mostly the young children that come. I think the parents ought to come out more; it is more encouraging to us all. I thought Mrs. Thayer's letter to the young was good. I won't have time to praise all that write for the Herald, but I surely enjoy reading them all. I think every member of the M. P. Church ought to take the Herald. We get to hear from all the different churches, and I like to know how all are getting along. We can pray for each other and it keeps us encouraged to know some one remembers us in their prayers. I will close for this time with best wishes to all the readers of the Herald.

LIBERTY HILL, ANDERSON CIRCUIT

Our Sunday school is progressing nicely. The average attendance for this year has been about sixty. Cottage prayer meeting seems to be doing good.

Bro. Lamar filled his appointment at this place Sunday morning and night. Night services was given to Christian Endeavor work. Organized with 47 members. Officers as follows: Romain Poole president, Danyam Pearson vice president, Joe Leonard coresponding secretary, Geddis Wood secretary and treasurer.

The home of Mr. Ren Pearson was made sad by the death of his mother last Saturday night. Romain Poole.

MILL GROVE, STANLEY CIRCUIT

Our Sunday school is doing very well. People are not interested in it as much as they should be, but we have a few schol-

THE STORY OF A HAT.

We were all sitting together one day talking about spring fixings, hats in particular. The most wonderful thing in the world happened: Each one of the four daughters of the Rev. Robert Hardy was to have a perfectly new summer hat!

If you had perpetually and perennially worn an older sister's hat, you would understand. This glorious certainty would never have been but for father's article on "Predestination."

When the editor of the Theological Review sent on the check, father took it at once to mother and announced firmly to what purpose it should be devoted. Mother was pleased as could be, but the girls were simply weak trying to grasp the possibility.

To be sure, we had no idea what "Predestination" meant, and had tried to decide which daughter should read the article and instruct the others. We told Pris it was her duty, being the oldest, but Pris said she was getting tired of that sort of thing and meant to strike.

Honor insisted that she would be only too glad, but we must remember that the next to the oldest daughter hadn't any brains. Even with the best intentions she could never impart the meaning to us, and we know that only too well

Luckily I had done the last stunt, so it had to be Alice.

We had just returned from Farnum on a tour of investigation, and we were talking it over with mother when Pris let a bomb drop in the camp. Now Pris is just as different from the rest of us as satin is from satine, but just let her beckon, and the world tumbles over itself to follow. Talk of Helen of Troy! But then she was bad, and Pris is as good as gold.

Pris had tried on a certain hat in Farnum, the like of which Drayton had never dreamed, except on one occasion. It wasn't conspicious, but, when Pris had that hat on, you couldn't think of anything else.

When Pris told us her intention, we all began to talk, but there was an air about her that made us realize the futility of argument.

Now the hat was a fine white chip trimmed with black velvet, some quills, and rosettes of white satin ribbon. It was simple as could be, but of a shape quite unknown to Drayton. It had unusual curves where Drayton headgear was either turned severely up or uncompromisingly dow When Pris put on the hat, there was no one else to be seen.

The Sunday before, Lotty Cheston had appeared in church wearing a hat rather similar. Lotty's aunt lived here, and members of the family are apt to appear at any time for week-end visits, but that wasn't why we were afraid to have Pris have one.

"Is it becoming?" asked mother, looking at me.

"She's the dearest thing in the world in it," I owned.

"Is it conspicuous or saucy—or—what is the objection, girls?"

"It's too pretty," said Honor. "It's so elegant and unusual it will set every one talking."

"Yes, mother, old Mrs. Green will be sure to say to me, "Milly, ain't that hat like the frivolous Cheston gal's? Don't they get such fashions from Paris?"

"Yes, mother," broke in Alice; "when I wore the chain grandma left me, Deacon Sumner took hold of it and 'trusted' I had the 'ornyments' of a 'meek and quite spirit.' That's what you get by being minister's children."

"Just the same I am going to have that hat unless mother objects," said Pris, with the iron of determination in her voice.

"I see no objetion," said mother, quietly. We all gasped and just looked at her.

"But, mother," said Honor at last, "we've been taught to think of other people first. It seems as if I never did anything because I'm myself; I'm a minister's child first."

"I don't believe you'll regret many of those things," said mother, "but there is a limit. You are really a human being even before you're a minister's child."

Honor gave mother a grateful look as if relieved to realize the fact.

"I think it just the right moment to tell a story, a true one, and about another hat, when I was a little girl." At the mention of a story we all brightened.

"Once when I was about nine," began mother, "it was decided that I was to have an entirely new hat. Perhaps you have some idea what my feelings were."

We all looked at one another and nodded. Didn't we know?

"I had settled what it should be—a fine white straw trimmed with pale blue ribbon and knots of big field daisies with their golden hearts and curling white fringes. Mother said it was excellent taste for a little girl, and I should have it.

"We had planned to go to town on a certain Saturday, but the Thursday before Aunt Sarah arrived.

"Now Aunt Sarah was an excellent woman, my mother's sister, and devoted to her. She was also fond of my sisters, but some how I could never get on with Aunt Sarah. Instinct told me that this aunt neither understood nor liked one her nieces. I'm afraid I was especi naughty whenever she made us a visi

"Of course Aunt Sarah went to F ton, too, and I had a presentiment of e ing evil.

"In the millinery department of principal store, we passed by a table lo ed with children's hats ornamented w trimming made of straw. I loathed th the moment my eyes fell upon the rious array. Aunt Susan paused glanced over the table. I pull their's hand and tried to urge her on

"'Mary,' said Aunt Sarah, "this just the thing! Already trimmed and usually durable.'

"'Mother! Mother! I don't want hat like that', I pleaded.

"Mother hesitated. 'We had decid upon blue ribbon and daisies,' she beg

"'Nonsense!' cried Aunt Sarah. 'H long would that child wear such a d cate hat? You just let me choose.'

"Mother looked as uncomfortable I felt, but I think she stood in some a of her sister. At any rate Aunt Sarah h her way.

"Girls, if you could have seen that ha It was a coarse, yellow straw, too lar for my little head. I felt as if a wa basin had settled down upon it. It w trimmed with ropes of straw trimmi gathered into a huge black and yellow sette at the back, then falling in t streams, each terminated by a large gre glass bead. It was further ornament by a straw bird of Paradise with simp malevolent glass eyes, and the tail crue scratched my tender little neck.

"The very sight of that hat was ha ful, and to wear it was a punishment. M own wishes had been set aside ruthless and a promise had been broken. I sh bitter tears over that hat.

"On Sunday for some reason that h was left on the parlor sofa. Now children were not supposed to go in that sacred room by ourselves, but I ma aged to steal in. When Sunday came was found that the head of the wonder bird was missing. It was laid to the c who had committed similar unholy dee The bird was moved, and I wore the h with a lighter heart.

"Curiously enough, that was a shor lived article of headgear. So many thin happened to it! First the glass bea disappeared, then the straw streamers b gan to ravel. Finally mother remove them and put on a band and some r settes of golden-brown velvet, which wa a comfort.

"In August Aunt Helen was marrie and in church I wore my white frock an a brand-new hat—a fine white chip med with pale-blue ribbons and field daisies. The other hat was relegated to every-day use, and I am sure found its end on the rubbish heap that fall."

"Mother," said Pris, curiously, "tell us! What happened to that bird?"

"I never told my own mother until I was much older than any of you. Well —I stepped on it! I stepped on it more than once. When I had broken it, I carried the head up into the play-room and dropped it down between the mopboard and the wall. It is doubtless there now, as they plastered the room the next fall."

"What did grandma say?" inquired Alice with wide-open eyes.

"She said, 'I don't know as I can blame you one bit,' " said mother, triumphantly!

"O mother, you are such a dear!" cried Pris, jumping up to kiss her; and a great burden seemed to roll from us all.

"But Mother," said Honor, "you don't mean we are never to care what people say?"

"Not much," said mother frankly, "if you're quite sure you're right. We must have independence of soul as well as consideration for others. Take Mrs. Green. There are some things better worth remembering than her words. I can't forget how she came and helped nurse when Milly had diphtheria."

"And Deacon Sumner's given me many a ride, even if I haven't a meek and quiet spirit," cried Alice.

"I think you are making the application all right," said dear mother, smiling, and as usual having the last and best word.—Kate Louise Brown, in Christian Register.

ROSE, BIRD AND BROOK.

"I will not give away my perfume," said the rosebud, holding its pink petals tightly wrapped in their tiny green case. The other roses bloomed, but the selfish bud withered away.

"No, no," said a little bird, "I don't want to sing.

But when his brother soared aloft on joyful wings and sang with all his might, the little bird looked sorry and ashamed.

"If I give away all my wavelets I shall not have enough myself," said the brook; and it kept all its waters in a hollow place, where it formed a filthy little pool.

A boy who loved a fresh wide awake rose, a singing bird and a brooklet, thought on these things, and said:

"If I would be loved I must share with others all that I have."—Kind Words.

PLANNING THE MAID'S WORK.

"Don't dictate to your maid about times and seasons, insisting that she shall do a task at any one particular moment," advised a paragraph in a housekeeping journal. "'Straighten out the drawers sometime this week,' 'Clean that shelf in a day or two,' are far better than more exacting demands."

I agreed this mild suggestion sounded gracious and tried it accordingly, with the direct result that the drawer remaineed unstraightened and the shelf uncleaned until—well,to be exact, until I did them myself. The thing you set a definite day and hour for gets done, and no other does. Many a modern governor over the servant problem forgets that while the crude product of Ireland, Sweden and Nova Scotia easily possesses the brute strength required for the kitchen, the discretion for its advantageous application must come from another source. Bridget has the body, you have the brains. The average hired girl left to her own devices will wear herself out one day and loaf the next, Overtime labor in a straw-shop or cotton mill, followed by long periods of enforced rest, tells upon the health and consequent usefulness of the employee; why not in the kitchen as well? The foreman in the weaveroom or the finishingroom carefully lays out the work of each hand, the headman in the office determines just what letters his stenographer writes on a certain day and hour—why not equal system in our households?

Strive for as even a distribution as possible of the task of the week. For instance, washing day should spell simple meals, often set on by the mistress when only one maid is kept. Sweeping should be divided between Thursday and Friday, that it may not become burdensome. This will still leave Wednesday for odd jobs such as polishing silver or washing windows, and Saturday for baking and cleaning the kitchen. However, in swinging out from the Scylla of lack of system, beware of the Charybdis of ironclad days and hours. The maid who can never make muffins for Monday's supper, however short the bread supply, or sweep the spare-room on Saturday, whatever guest may telephone his prospective arrival, because these are washing and baking days, is a slave to ruts, and the family she serves in far harsher bondage.

Best results are obtained by writing out the menus ahead with directions for work. I once had a maid (oh, blessed memory!) to whom I could dictate at one time the details of meals for three days, when I expected company, and she never asked again or made a single error. "Don't you see, ma'am," she explained, "I know how hard it must be for a lady to keep telling and telling a girl, so when you go upstairs I just say it over and over to myself till I know it all." She was a high-school graduate. But why ask memory tests almost beyond our own powers when a written menu with necessary receipts or directions inserted and a list of rooms to be swept (or smaller tasks) costs us so little effort? Keep a coarse book with pencil conveniently tied on and take pains to write clearly. The advantages are manifold. Bridget soon learns to turn to her paper instead of shouting your name through the halls, interrupting precious morning hours at the desk or the sewing room, and, when errors occur, it is easy to fix responsibility by reference to said important document. Where lack of education makes this scheme impossible, you must just be resigned to constant repetition of directions.

Be sure, in any case, that all the materials are at hand to carry out your plans. Nothing is more trying to a maid than to collect stepladder, basin and cloths for the window-washing, only to find no Bon Ami in the house, or to get her flour all sifted for bread only to discover the yeast cake has been forgotten. In time she may be trained to supplement the mistress's memory, but after all, that isn't a green girl's job. Your head must save her heels and the nerves of the family at the same time.

Plan with as much regard to the girl's health as to your own engagements, with as careful consideration for her day out as for the day of your party. A good deal of trouble? Yes, but when your back is relieved of the literal burden oughtn't your mind to assume willingly a part of it. Remember your family has just as good a right to your brains as to Bridget's brawn, and one is just as necessary as the other to a well-ordered home.—Lucy Fairbanks Alvord, in Congregationalist.

The congregation was small and it was also small on Sunday on account of the rainy weather. We intended having preaching Sunday night, but it was rained out. We are expecting to have Children's Day the second Sunday in July. The S. S. Convention will meet at Mill Grove some time in July. Camp meeting begins as usual the third Sunday in August.

DIED.

Jobe

On last Tuesday, June 3, 1913, at 12 o'clock, the soul of Levi J. Jobe passed into the great beyond. He had been in declining health for more than a year, but did not take his bed until the previous Sunday. All that loving hands and constant care of both physicians and loved ones could do was done, but none could stay the hand of death.

He was 61 years of age and had been a consistent member of Hebron church for something like thirty years, and was always ready and anxious to do all in his power for the church and the advancement of his Father's Kingdom. None knew him but to love him.

He leaves a widow, four children, seven grandchildren, three brothres, six sisters and a host of relatives and friends to mourn their loss. But our loss is his eternal gain. Not only will he be missed in the home but also in the church and in the community in which he lived. May the Lord comfort the bereaved ones and especially his lonely companion. May they ever strive to live as he did.

The funeral services were conducted from Hebron church the following day by his pastor, Rev. W. E. Swain, after whirh his body was tenderly laid to rest in the cemetery to await the resurrection morn. His grave was covered with beautiful flowers.

Dear father is gone, but not forgotten;
Never shall his memory fade.
But sweetest thoughts shall ever linger
Around the grave where he is laid.
Sad was the hour of parting,
Here he will come no more.
The chilly tide of death he has crossed;
The storms of life are o'er.
Dear father, we hope to meet you
On that happy golden shore.

Written by one who knew him.

Fulk

Mary Fulk, daughter of Frederic and Catherine Fulk, was born March 5, 1824, departed this life May 24, 1913, aged 89 years, 2 months and 19 days.

She professed faith in Christ and joined the M. P. church at Hickory Ridge about 60 years ago; she remained a faithful member until death. Aunt Polly, as she was so often called, had the best of attention from relatives and friends during her illness, but none could prolong her life, for God had called her and she must go, and it was indeed helpful to those who stood around her bedside, to know by her manifestations that she did not fear to die, but was ready, for it's so much easier to give our loved ones up when we know they have no fear.

Her funeral was conducted by her pastor, Rev. A. O. Lindley, and she was laid to rest in the burial ground of her church in the presence of a large number of relatives and friends.

June 10. Florence Sullivan.

Spainhower

Mr. Jacob Franklin Spainhower was born March 14, 1865, departed this life June 7, 1913, age 48 years, 2 months and 24 days.

Thirty-four years ago he joined the M. P. church at Mt. Zion, where he remained a faithful member until 1898 when he moved to Pinnacle M. P. Church where for fifteen years he has lived a most consistent member until death. He loved his church and cheerfully gave of his means to its support.

He was one who always filled his place at church if possible. Even though he worked at Mt. Airy for 6 years he seldom ever failed to meet his Sabbath school at his home church. His place in the choir was seldom ever vacant until he lost his voice about a year ago, but now he has joined the heavenly choir where music never ceases.

He was happily married to Mary A. Ward December 10, 1885, and their union was blessed with eleven children, two of whom preceded him to the gloryland, one girl and one boy. His wife, five boys and four girls survive, also one granddaughter, three sisters and a number of relatives. The children's names are as follows: Misses Daisy, Edyth, and Jennie, Messrs. Roger, Richard, Roy and John of Pinnacle, N. C., Mrs. R. S. Moser and Mr. Bernard Spainhower of Winston-Salem, N. C.

He had been in feeble health for a year, being afflicted with tuberculosis. All that his physician, family and friends could do was done but none could stay the cruel hand of death.

His death means an irreparable loss to our home and we mourn as we realize that we shall see him here no more. Yet, we rejoice in the fact that he told us when he was dying that it was all right with him, and that when our time has come to go he will be there to welcome us.

He cannot come to us but we can go to him, so we will not weep, for God who gave has taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord. While it is sad to give him up and know that we have no earthly father to guide us, we rejoice in the fact that we have a heavenly Father who will never forsake us and who has been with us during the sickness and death and has given us grace to sustain us in these dark hours of bereavement.

One of the largest crowds ever seen at this church attended the funeral which was preached Sunday afternoon at four o'clock by his pastor, Rev. A. L. Hunter, after which, the fraternal order of W. O. W. of Mt. Airy took charge of, and concluded the service at the grave with their very impressive ceremony.

The floral offerings were beautiful, being sent by friends from far and near.

He was a devoted husband and a loving father, and we pray that when our race is run that we may be an undivided family in heaven.

Oh father, thy gentle voice is hushed,
Thy warm, true heart is still;
And on thy pale and peaceful face
Is resting death's cold chill.
We have kissed thy marble brow,
And in our aching hearts we know
We have no father now.

His Daughter.

Wood

Jasper Newton Wood, son of Handy and Julia Wood, was born Aug. 11, 1842, and died June 9, 1913.

He was taken sick last August and has not been well since, though he did improve some and was able to be up and go about for a while. For the past six months he has been very sick and his suffering was intense. He had heart trouble and dropsy. Oh, how our hearts ache when we think of how he suffered, and of the many long nights that brought no sleep or rest to him. All that the loving hands of relatives, many kind friends, and a good physician, could do, was done, but he gradually grew worse until death came as a relief.

Gone, but not forgotten. With aching hearts we say good-bye till the resurrection morn. He said, "I am not afraid to die.

I dread it, but do not fear it." Oh, may God help us all to meet in a better world than this where sickness and death never come. One by one, we must all appear face to face with God, our tender, loving, merciful Father.

God knows my heart, He said. Oh, how we thank God that He does know our hearts. All the good intentions and resolutions for a better life and each secret holy thought are known and understood by a God of mercy, for "God sees not as man sees," but does look at the heart. In many ways, 'tis a death inexpressibly sad, and only God and time can heal the wounded hearts. Dear Christian friends, we need your prayers.

He served four years in the Civil War, was a member of Company H, 54th regiment. During the entire war he was never wounded. Surely God's loving, watchful eye and tender care protected him in the many battles of the war and he came home safe and uninjured.

October 12, 1868, he was married to Addie V. Cain, of Fayetteville, who survives him. To this union were born four daughters, all of whom are now living: Mrs. L. T. Johnston of Mebane, Mrs. J. M. Foust of Bethel, Mrs. Joliette Henley, who resides at the old home near Swepsonville, and Miss Daisy Wood of Graham; also one brother and one sister, and ten grand-children.

The funeral services were conducted by Rev. G. W. Holmes at Moore's Chapel, and in the quiet beautiful cemetery of that place he was buried. Many beautiful flowers brought by kind friends who had ministered to his needs in the last suffering days of his life were placed upon the newly made mound of earth beneath which lies the dear body of father so quietly and peacefully now.

"Oh Father, grant thy love divine
To make these mystic temples thine,
When wasting age and wearying strife
Have sapped the leaning walls of life;
Take the poor dust thy mercy warms
And mould it into heavenly forms."

His Daughter,
Inez E. Foust.

McBane

Bro. George McBane, "Uncle George," as he was frequently called, died at his home in Newlin Township, May 29, 1913, and was buried at Concord M. P. church the next day; aged 83 years, 4 months and 20 days. He leaves three sons and one daughter, who were present at his burial. His wife preceded him to the glory world several years ago. He had been confined for a long time and suffered a great deal from that dreadful disease rheumatism; but it is all over now. Before he was afflicted he was a regular attendant at Concord and was interested in the church. As a neighbor he was kind and accommodating, always attending to his own business and letting other people's business alone.

Resolved, therefore, That we extend to the bereaved children and relatives our heart-felt sympathy.

Second, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Methodist Protestant Herald for publication, and recorded in our church register.

DENTON HIGH SCHOOL

——OPENS SEPTEMBER 1, 1913——

DENTON is situated in the Piedmont hills of Davidson County twenty miles South from Thomasville on the Carolina and Yadkin River Rail Road. This Railroad connects us with the Southern at Thomasville and High Point on the north and with the Southbound at High Point on the South. About 350 yards west from the depot on Salisbury Street, nestling among a beautiful grove of oaks, is the home of Denton High School.

OUR COURSE OF STUDY prepares for any College, also for our State University. We give each student personal atention and do everything necessary for their comfort and advancement. A thoroughly competent teacher has been employed for the Music Department, and those who take this course will receive special attention. A High School Business Course will be taught free of charge as to tuition. Special work in Pedagogy for those who intend to teach.

FREE TUITION to ministerial students and children of the ministers of the North Carolina Conference. Cost of all necessary expenses for a year ranges from $115 to $145. We board students in good private homes. Indigent young men can get rooms and board themselves at actual cost. If any one wishes to pay a part or even all expenses by work, write the Principal for particulars. The school uses water from deep drilled wells with pumps, which eliminates all danger from germs in the water. Pure air, pure water, plenty of work; if these do not give health to the student, he will never have it. Write the Principal at Denton, N. C., for any further information.

GEO. L. REYNOLDS, A. B., Principal.

ELON COLLEGE AND METHODIST PROTESTANTS

Our Conference last fall visited Elon College and enjoyed the visit very much.

A number of our young people, including several of our young men preparing for the ministry, are doing their College work there. Mr. D. T. Surratt was a member of the graduating class there this year and Mr. H. M. Neese, Mr. Will H. Neese, Mr. W. D. Loy, and Mr. B. M. Williams are members of the student body who are candidates for the ministry.

The president informs us that Elon does nothing to influence our young people from Western Maryland. Our young people are advised to go to our own College first, but if that is impracticable because of distance to go to Elon.

This College shows its appreciation of its large and increasing Methodist Protestant patronage by giving us a Professor on its teaching staff in the person of Dr. T. C. Amick, who gives special attention to our young people who are enrolled there, whether of the ministry or of the laity. It also invites some Methodist Protestant preacher once each month during the College year to preach to the student body.

The College gives our ministerial students and the children of our ministers the same privileges that it gives its own people, free literary tuition. We advise our people who are to send to school within the State to investigaate Elon before coming to a decision.

Murphy-Jones

Mr. W. E. Murphy, now of Reidsville, formerly of Alabama, and Miss Laura Jones of Reidsville, were married June 12 at the home of Rev. C. E. M. Raper. There were a few friends present. They preferred a quiet home-like marriage. The ceremony was performed by Rev. C. E. M. Raper at 8:30 P. M. May they have a prosperous life, and so live together here that they may live forever together in that home above.

Progress is never blessed with the aid of the downward current.

LOST IN REVERIE.

I have my thoughts to comfort me—
To bring back olden joys;
Far through the vistas of the years
I go and meet the "boys,"
And gladly roam, in silent thought,
Back to my childhood toys.

And there I think, as when a boy,
Ere reason first began,
Of all the future unexplored,
And measure life's broad span,
There to behold the things I'd do
When I shall be a man.

I see the peaks of yonder fame
Where other men have scaled;
Along the highway I shall tread,
The ones who've tried and failed;
Yet, trusting in my manliness,
The star of hope I hailed!

I try, and plan, and falter not,
Which seems to fan my thirst;
But, when my riper years matured,
My vision-bubbles burst,
I rallied forth a man again—
Much wiser than at first.

And then I knew, perhaps too well,
That thoughts are often vain,
For, as the flowers bloom and die,
So pass they in their train;
Yet I arose, in youthful pride,
Some noble end to gain.

JUDGE NOT

I knew a young man
Quite some years ago;
He "rode the circuit,"
As 'twas called, you know.
The clime was fair,
And his friends were new,
But he soon had made
Of them not a few.
He moved right on,
Went in and out,
And did good work
Without a doubt.
'Twas his very first charge,
Not carried without pain,—
There's something to think of
Besides pleasure or gain.
But on one of those days
He made a threat:
What think you it was?
Listen, don't fret.
The ministry he thought to quit
In this hour of gloom.
I'll tell no more now
And hope not to soon.
But let me say he received
Kindness instead of censure.
Circumstances should be understood,
Or it's better not to venture.
To whet, cut and slash
Is not always wisdom;
There's a grander work
Than the butcher business.
We all have sorrows to meet
As sure as did he,
And can we not offer
A word of deep sympathy?
There's been many a cross
Too heavy to bear,
The strong and the brave
Find the heaviest share.
Then let's be careful
How we harshly judge;
We might be engulfed
When the billows surge.
Yes, there's a cross
Too heavy to bear,
But the All-seeing Eye
Can fathom our care.

WHERE ARE WE?

As a nation we have set ourselves up No. 1. Let us stop and look facts square in the face and ask ourselves where we are. Some will say that is a foolish question. It do not think so. It is a serious one if we look at it from all points.

The first and most important one is or should be: Where are we in the sight of God? Are we fulfilling the purpose for which God made us? Are we conforming our lives to his will and word to the best of knowledge and ability? Are we doing what the Son commands us to do? Search the Scriptures. Are all that claim to be in the vineyard of the Lord laborers or idlers? If laborers, should not works prove it?

Are we not drifting into idolatry? How much more of our time is spent in studying and planning how to gather in the perishing things of earth, than how to win souls for Christ.

You perhaps have some money. How are you using it—for God's glory and honor? How may sinners have you led to Christ, to the paths of righteousness? Will yours be a starry crown? Where are we in the sight of heaven? Are not our general deportment and literature such as to cause them to say, Physician, heal thyself. Is not our civil government retrograding in the eye of God and all just men? Are not our so-called wise men in our seminaries, colleges and synods denying the fundamental law of all just laws and thereby laying a foundation for the wrath of an allwise God to fall on us as it did on Sodom and Gomorrah? They did not believe that Jesus was the Son of God, nor do thousands of Americans believe it. Is it not a blot on America to license men to go forth in this so-called Christian land denying the divinity of Christ and advocating the doctrine of no future punishment for the ungodly? Enlarging their buildings that were erected for the worship of God by annexing rooms for moving picture shows or for any and all other lewd games they may feel disposed to engage in: and still call it God's house.

What influence for good can an ungodly man or woman have over another ungodly man or woman for the cause of Christ who are themselves indulging in ungodly practices? Are we as a nation serving ourselves, God or the devil? If we are serving God, let us cut loose from the devil. You say, you are not serving the devil, and at the same time your most earnest thoughts are about those things that as well as you are so soon to pass away. Can you look God in the face and tell him you love him better than all earthly things, when he knows your first and last and most earnest thought is about secular things, things that you worry about, talk about most, and strive most earnestly to obtain; desiring to know how much of this earth's good you can gather in, and keep out of prison and in favor of men of much means. We are not taking into consideration our facilities and opportunities we have of worshiping the true God as we ought; not feeling our responsibilities to God and man as we should.

Are we not under obligations to the Heathen? What sins are those indulged in by the heathen that are not practiced by the people of America? The heathen know not God; the people of America ought to know if they do not: but do they? If they know him, should they obey him? How dare we to claim to be what we are not? Can we claim to be an exemplary nation? and if not, why not? Why do we patronize, practice and advocate those things that God forbids? He says Whatsoever you do, do to the honor and glory of God; and whosoever honoreth my Father, him will my Father honor. Are we glorifying God when we withhold the gifts and honor due him; that we use these gifts for our aggrandizement and our comfort and temporal pleasures and sinful indulgences and expect to obtain the blessings promised by God, if we would love and obey Him?

Again, where are we in our own estimation? When sickness and pain prostrate us, when going down the slope of time or rising in the bloom of youth, we look back and see how little we have done for God and his cause, and how little interest we have taken in the work of the Lord: how far short we have fallen in conforming our lives to our own words and solemn vows we once made to God, that by His help we would honor and obey Him and contribute of our God-given means when it was in our power to do so, in a way and at a time when sorely needed, by so doing fulfilling the purpose for which God created us. There are a faithful few who are trying to destroy the works of the devil. May the Lord continue to help them in their efforts to tear down the hold the devil has on so many who have their names recorded on some class book, that they may see the slippery ground on which they are standing, and whither they are going, and be enabled to lay aside all lusts of the flesh, such as idolatry, malice, hatred, envy, drunkenness, revelings, riotings and such like. For God says they that do such things shall not enter heaven. Thus saith the Lord, Do as I say and it shall be well with thee. T. R. T.

THE RURAL FLY PROBLEM.

In the country it is impossible to attack the breeding places of the fly. The prevention of flies, therefore, is out of question. The problem in the country is to kill the flies. The farmer cannot dispose of his stable manure every week or twice a week. The application of the following remedies, begun promptly in May and presently followed through the warmer months, will keep the rural home fairly free from flies:

Remedy No. 1: Buy one pint of formalin from your druggist. It will cost you about fifty cents. Keep it tightly corked. Every other day add two tablespoonfuls of the formalin to a half-pint of water; place the water, with an equal quantity of sweet milk, in saucers or plates about the barn. A crust of bread dropped into the plate will furnish something for the flies to light upon. Replenish the mixture in the saucers or plates every other day, or as often as necessary to keep some of the liquid standing in the plate or saucers. The number of plates or saucers to be kept at the barn will depend on the size of the building. The plates should be placed where the flies will easily find them, that is, in some well-lighted place. The amount of liquid is not sufficient to poison anything that might drink it. The mixture placed in a dairy barn was known to kill six quarts of flies within three days.

Remedy No. 2: Make a box 4 x 2 x1½ feet. Make the two sides of the box, which will be 4 x 2 feet, of eighteen-mesh wire screen; make the top, bottom, and ends of the box of any wood, preferably white pine; through the bottom of the box cut three round holes about six inches in diameter; over these holes, before closing the box, of course, fasten three cones of the same wire that composes the sides of the box; the opening in the little end of the cone should be about three-fourths of an inch in diameter; through either the top or one end of the box an opening with a sliding trap door should be made for removing the contents of the trap; tack two strips 18 x1½ x 1½ inches at the end of the box on the bottom, so that, when the box is placed upon the floor or level surface, the cone-covered openings in the bottom of the box will be about 1½ inches from the surface on which the box is resting.

You now have one of the very best fly-traps that can be made. Place the trap just outside the back door or near the window or door of the house where the flies congregate in largest numbers Place it close to where the slops are kept. Put sugar, molasses, clabber, or, best, when available, fish heads for bait just beneath the base of the cones. The flies in leaving the bait will fly upward towards the light into the cones and crawl through the small opening into the trap.

After a number of flies have been caught ignite a newspaper or some straw or grass and pass the trap through the flames and the wings of the flies will be singed. The sliding doors in the top or end of the trap should then be opened and the flies emptied out on a piece of paper and burned.—State Board of Health.

A DRUNKARD'S FUNERAL.

By Rev. G. R. Williamson of Oakland. Maryland.

The scene before us is sad beyond all power of description. It is not my business as a minister to apologize for the mistakes of the dead man whose body lies in this casket.

"As the tree falls it must lie." Our limitations are such, and we see through a glass darkly, so that it is not always possible to tell how the tree falls.

It is customary to exalt the virtues of the dead, and to minimize their faults, while we exalt the faults of the living and minimize their virtues. God would have us do justice to both the dead and the living. We who are living demand justice if we are the object of criticism. Our demands are not so imperative if some one else is the object. Certainly, if the pale lips before us could speak we could only hear a mild demand for simple justice.

So I endeavor to approach the task before me, which is by no means a pleasant one, with a sense of justice to both living and dead. A man who himself must stand before the judgment bar of God to "give an account of the deeds done in the body," surely cannot afford to do on an occasion like this anything that would embarrass him in the great day. This funeral talk cannot be delivered without taking into account the living as well as the dead. The dead can't talk back, the living can, and probably will, so I will say as little of the dead as possible, and speak directly to and of the living.

First, Clyde Liller, the man. It is needless to say his sun has gone down while it is yet day. When he should have been at his best, the supporter and defender of his family, taking his place as a citizen in a great Republic bearing his share of life's burdens, suldenly the light went out, and the "spirit went back to the God who gave it."

Clyde Liller, when at himself, was a generous, large-hearted man. His wife has said more than once to the speaker, that "When Clyde was sober one could not wish for a better husband, a better father." But when whisky goes in, the man goes out. Social life in America is such that the man with a weakness for alcohol has a tremendous battle to fight, and in most instances is the loser. At some time in his life, I know not when, he tasted the poison and later found the Scriptures true, "At last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder." The habit once contracted, its effect felt, his will power weakened, it got beyond his control until the finished product, the legitimate fruit of the American saloon, lies a helpless, pitiless corpse before us. A woman has been made a widow, three children made orphans, because the liquor traffic pays revenue, and some men will sell it regardless of the widow's cry and the orphan's wail.

Some one is saying, "He ought to have let it alone when he saw he could not control it." O yes, how easy to say that and how little it means. That man who boasts that he can take it or let it alone, usually takes it, and sooner or later becomes a hopeless wreck. Another says, "Let whisky alone and it will let you alone." This is another assertion as false as Satan himself These innocent children let it alone, but it did not let them alone. This heart-broken widow let it alone, but it did not, it would not let her alone; Either directly or indirectly this horrible monster, the liquor traffic has its satanic clutches around the throat of every man, woman and child in our fair land.

I want to say here that to my personal knowledge Clyde Liller did make a struggle, and a brave one, to stem the tide and free himself from the manacles that bound him hand and foot. When he would go to work in the hope that he was victor, on his way to the shop his nostrils were greeted with the stench of the foul poison; boon companions were ready to lure him away from all his good resolutions; men were ready to take his last nickel and sell it to him regardless of the protests of his innocent wife; every fiber of his being was crying out for alcohol. He fell time and again only to get up and make a brief struggle and fall again, until, a hopeless, helpless wanderer, away from home and friends the tired body lay down to sleep the dreamless sleep. Such is the picture, the awful tragedy, of one human life. But we make in this country 100,000 drunkards' graves a year, 277 each day. During this funeral hour 11 other of our fellow citizens will go in the same way, and thus the miserable work goes on from year to year.

Clyde sought the comfort and help of religion. He had a religious nature. I have prayed with him in my own home, and witnessed with profoundest pity his hopeless struggle.

My predecessor, Rev. J. B. Workman, told me he never worked so hard to save a man as he did to save Clyde Liller. But the miserable grog shop with its doors always open was sufficiently powerful to overbalance any influence for good, and thus the task of saving him under the present conditions had to be abandoned. He tried working in a dry town, but the national government itself is in the miserable liquor business , and for the small pittance of $25 will give a man a federal license, and then protect him if he violates the law of the state in which he sells. Then when a poor drunkard wants to free himself from his slavish chains he may go from Maine to California, from the gulf to the lakes, and on every foot of territory over which old glory waves her proud folds, he is hounded and hunted by this monster until at last like poor Clyde he lies down to the sleep that knows no waking.

Who can picture in all its hideousness the American liquor traffic? Human words are inadequate. Figures daze us. We are led in our desperation to exclaim, "O Lord, how long?"

Gladstone said, it has destroyed more human life than war, pestilence and famine combined.

Somebody is to blame. This poor body is a murdered body and the murderer goes

THREE PERIODS OF TIME

PAST

Destruction from the awful course
Where wind-swept prairies blaze.
Compared, it like unto the past,
Or retrospective gaze.
Time rolls along, and without pause,
At universal rate,
And man, and beast, and bird, and flower,
Receive a common fate.
Behold the empires buried low,
And kingdoms dead and gone;
So nothing lives but is laid waste,
Unless it's carried on.

PRESENT

To all the living things of earth,
The present may seem sure:
The past is firmly fixed with all;
The future, insecure;
And of the present some may boast,
But with a fearful sigh,
For time is swiftly gliding on,
And, one by one, we die.
No one has yet discovered where
The end of life is found;
But nature tells us, and we see
Death's certainties abound.

FUTURE

Should we forget the yesterdays
And live todays the best,
In contemplation of some sweet
Tomorrow for our rest?
Yes. Like the huntsman after game,
There's pleasure in the chase;
And he who seeks that future life
Is happy in the race.
Still, future time is mystery,
Like waters rough and dark;
But hope and faith and righteousness
Will pilot on our bark.

WORLD'S SUNDAY SCHOOL COMMISSION.—IV.

By C. E. Wilbur

THE COMMISSION AT WORK

Now that the commission has been at work three weeks in Japan, it is time to say something about the way in which its message is being received. Its message and method of delivering it are very distinct and definite. The object is to press upon the leaders, more especially in business circles, the great need of religious education, and to bring their attention to the Sunday school as a means of attaining such education. Furthermore, the aim is to study Sunday school conditions with a view to helping in the improvement of these conditions, to the end that the instrument proposed may be more effective.

In Japan this message has been delivered with great force and cogency. The aim has been more than realized; for not only have the business men been reached with the message, but also the educational, social and political leaders. This has been accompanied by means of social functions given by business men of every city, in honor of the visit of the commission—largely composed of business men. To these functions other leaders were also invited. It was thought at first that a great deal of diplomacy would be required in introducing the distinct message, lest the religious and social sensibilities of the Japanese would be antagonized. But in every city the fullest opportunity was given for the delivering of this message; and it appears to have been received most cordially. In fact, the Japanese leaders, as a whole, recognize the necessity for religious education, and also that the means they have been using have not been effective. They freely admit this and will cheerfully listen to any suggestions that will help in the improvement of their means. Hence the proposal of the Christian Sunday school by these practical business men, meets with a considerate, and, in some cases, almost an enthusiastic reception.

In Yokohama, their great port of entry; in Tokio, their new capital; in Sendai, the Athens of the north; in Shidzuoka, the great tea center; in Nagoya, the fourth city of the empire; in Kyoto, the ancient capital; in Osaka, the Pittsburgh of Japan, business, social, educational and political organizations have joined hands to extend a hearty welcome. At banquets and receptions given by these bodies, most frequently two a day, and sometimes three, the message is delivered. In afternoon and evening meetings the Christians, and those inclined to become such, together with many curious observers, have been reached by the distinctive Sunday school messages, given by the specialists of the party on the various departments of Sunday school work.

The native Christian leaders and the missionaries have been free to say that the work of the commission has already been the means of strengthening them greatly, and they anticipate still greater results in the future. The above is from the standpoint of the commission and the missionaries; what is being said by the Japanese themselves? The substance of a most remarkable editorial in the Japan Mail, of Tokio, the editor of which is not a Christian, will be a fair exhibit of Japanese sentiment. The paper gives five long columns in a blanket sheet to a report of the reception and work of the commission, all of which is complimentary. Two columns are devoted to an editorial. In this the editor says that many individual leaders and groups of religious teachers have come to Japan, but up to 1909 very little attention was given to them, and they came and went without touching the Japanese people, save as tourists in general. The above date marks the return of a remarkable commission of Japanese business men to the west, notably to America. Since their report of their observations, there has been a more decided inclination to receive favorably those who come from the west with a religious or educational purpose. Hence this commission of Sunday school business men have come at a most opportune time, and their welcome is assured. The editor of the Mail further states that Shintoism and Buddhism have failed to produce the proper results in the moral and religious life of the Japanese people; and this in spite of the fact that the latter religion has largely introduced the instruments and agencies employed by Chistianity, such as preaching services for instruction, Y. M. B. A.'s, Sunday schools and Y. P. S. B. E. He hints that these agencies have grown up out of the life of Christianity, and may not be adjusted to the teaching of a faith so widely different. Hence, he says the commission has come at an opportune time, so far as the religious aspects of its work is concerned. And, while he will not predict that there will be a large turning of the people to Christianity, he thinks it would be a wise thing to adopt the Christian Sabbath, as far as it is a day of rest.

The commission has undoubtedly, through the press and through the great meetings held in thirty-five great centers, brought Christianity to the attention of the upper and middle classes as it has never been brought before. It has set them to thinking and comparing, and this is of itself no mean thing to have accomplished.

SUNDAY SCHOOL CONDITIONS

It is no doubt true here, as in the United States, that each school has its special needs growing out of its local conditions, but the general needs that affect the great mass of the schools in the empire are three.

The grading of the scholars and the grading of the lesson helps are very imperfectly done. Of course, in the larger port town, where there are a large number of English speaking people, and where the teaching is done in English, this is not true, and even in some few churches in the interior this is not true; but in the main it is true. Even in the province of Sendai, where Christian influences have most deeply touched the people, the Sunday school workers admit that there is chaos in regard to the grading of the schools and the lessons and lesson helps used. This is largely caused by the insufficiency of Sunday school literature in the Japanese language; and the workers believe there will be much improvement in this direction as soon as the literature now being translated is in their hands.

The second condition, much to be deplored, is that the Japanese as a whole seem to regard the Sunday school as an institution for the young only. In one of the large towns great audiences of children can be collected. Just a short time ago ten thousand gathered in the great Wrestlers' Hall in Tokio, completely filling that great building; and large audiences of children were collected in Yokohama, Seudai, and Tokio, to meet the commission, notably so in the latter city, when on a stormy day hundreds were turned away from the great hall of the Methodist Episcopal mission, because there was no room to hold them. But in the average school, outside the distinctively educational centers, there are very few above the age of sixteen.

The third condition is the lack of trained teachers. Of course, Japan has many of these, but they are mostly missionaries, missionaries' wives and children, and some Japanese who have been taught in Christian schools, with a small sprinkling of those who have been instructed in the government schools. There are not enough of these to conduct the work properly, and to extend it into new fields. There can not be enough of the above secured to touch the 65,000,000 of the Japanese empire. Japan must, in the end, be Christianized by Japanese. Consequently, teachers must be secured from the mass of native Christians. They have trained minds; it is only necessary that they shall be turned toward the Sunday school. The commission is giving special attention to this work, and expects to leave something permanent behind it.

THE COMBINED SERVICE.

The matter of combined service is receiving considerable attention from church and Sunday school workers. We are glad to pass along the following suggestive statement concerning the movement.

Three great slogans have been successively emphasized in the modern Sunday school advance movement. The first, "All the community in the Sunday school," came as the result of the vision that the Sunday school existed not simply for church families, but for the last person in the community. The second, "All the church in the Sunday school," was sounded because of the right conception of the place of the Sunday school as the Bible teaching service of the entire church. The third, and more recent cry is, "All the Sunday school in the church service," and has come because of the general failure in the church attendance of the school membership.

All three are needed for a rounded vision of the place that the Sunday school is surely to occupy in its relation to the home, the community, and the church. Nothing less can be admitted if we know that, rightly organized and rightly led, the Sunday school is the solvent of the problems that have brought these slogans to the fore.

Abundant reason for trial of some such plans in many communities comes from a consideration of the following:

1. The Sunday school is dignified as an institution. It is not made by this plan a preamble or a postlude to the church service.

3. The pastor has a definite part in the service, and a chance for a message to his entire flock.

4. Instead of concentrating his strength on two sermons as his Sunday contribution, he can preach one sermon ad give some time to teaching a large adult class of men or women, or conducting a teacher training class of young people to develop them for future leadership in the church.

5. The faithful Sunday school teacher is not put to the disadvantage of attendance at three Sunday services.

6. Admission into church membership at the combination services naturalizes this step to the children and young people.

7. One opening and closing service economize time, and give opportunity for joyous yet dignified worship.

8. There is no dismissal or doxology between the two services to give opportunity for an exodus of children or adults.

9. Parents can accompany their children to and from the morning service when combined.

"HELP WANTED."

Did you ever see that sight? It frequently meets the eye of the traveler in store windows and elsewhere. It does not take much imagination to see it on the faces of many Sunday school superintendents. They want help. They want teachers who can help. Our Board is here to help the teacher by getting him in touch with a Teacher Training class. Few things are really more practical to the teachers than this. Why not join now and get help so you can give help. Remember the Board has an excellent book, Training the Teacher, paper 35cts. cloth 50cts. Send all orders to C. H. Hubbell, Adrian, Michigan.

The Biddle Bible Class.

One of the most successful Bible classes is the Biddle class of Philadelphia. You will be interested in the following account of its work.

Some unique features have been developed which are worthy of trial where the conditions are favorable. One of them is the plan of "Rotating Leadership." One or two of the class members in turn are appointed to conduct the class and give their ideas on the lesson at the next session, while the teacher sums up at the close. This promotes previous study of the lesson, and in a number of instances has discovered a talent that was unknown. In this way the Bible class becomes a most effective training school for teachers and workers.

Mr. Biddle encourages athletic sports in order to develop manliness and tennis teams play against teams from other classes. Meets are held and a generous and sportsman like rivalry is encouraged. Thus the young man is given his sports and games under the oversight of the churches and under healthful surroundings.

Inter-class visitation is another feature that has shown fine results. There are few classes that Mr. Biddle and his associates have not visited. Sometimes entire classes meet together for a joint session. United rallies of neighboring classes are held from time to time.

Cheerfulness, friendliness is emphasized, and the class becomes a social corner. To the young elements especially the movement's practical application of a friendly Christianity appeals with great force, and one of these classess, if imbued with the spirit of the founder, will go far toward solving the problem as to how to keep the young men in the churches.

Remember the Board will gladly send you free helps to start a class of your own.

—James Bryce, British ambassador at Washington, formally presented his letters of recall from the London government to President Wilson and took his leave. As a diplomat in this country he has been unusually popular. He has always shown great interest in the United States and his famous work on "The American Commonwealth" is the best and most sympathetic study of our institutions now in existence. Just why he is to be superseded is not known.

—A man recently in New York laid a wager that he would woo, win and marry within an hour a young lady whom, with his companions, he had just seen arrive at a hotel where he was staying. He introduced himself to the damsel, she smiled upon his suit, a minister was called in, and they were married within the hour. The stakes were handed over to the bridegroom, who left with his wife the following day. It was shortly afterwards discovered that the couple had long been man and wife, and that they had been traveling about playing the same trick at various hotels.

—Postmaster-General Burleson reports that there are postal savings-banks now in operation at nearly 13,000 post-offices and that the total deposits so far are about $35,000,000. The business is steadily growing and it takes 190 clerks in the central office at Washington to handle this end of it.

Yadkin College Ct.

Last Saturday being our day to hold 2nd quarterly conference, a large representation from four of the churches met at Bethel. A good sermon at 11:30 by L. W. Gerringer, after which a sumptuous dinner was spread by the ladies of Bethesda and we all ate till we were filled and still there was plenty and a nice box of what remained was sent to Mrs. Powell and children which was much enjoyed by them, and grateful thanks to those friends who prepared and sent the box.

Quarterly conference was called at 2 o'clock. The spirit of the Master led and business transacted in the spirit of love. Some one said it was indeed a sweet spirited conference. Bro. W. C. Gibson of W. Lexington and Rev. W. T. Totten of Yadkin College were declared nominees for delegate to Annual Conference.

Four subscribers to the Herald with several convicted whom we trust will come out all right and subscribe later.

We also had Bro. A. D. Shelton of Piedmont Ct. with us in the afternoon.

H. L. Powell.

There was a marriage at the parsonage last Thursday eve., at 4 o'clock. John Q. Finch, a prosperous bachelor and farmer, arrived with Miss Ida, the daughter of Bro. Frank Snider and a member of Shiloh Methodist Protestant church. These two were soon made one. We wish for them much happiness and success all through life.

H. L. Powell.

On last Sunday I exchanged pulpits with Rev. A. D. Shelton of the Piedmont Ct. Bro. Shelton preached for me at Bethesda. I hear comment and praise for Bro. Shelton. I preached for him at Canaan and administered sacrament for him. A large audience out to hear the word and it looked as if nearly everyone communed. I was at this point last fall in a special meeting; I learned then that this was a good people. Since I was there last fall they have made great progress in material things, church painted inside and out, aisles and pulpit carpeted. If they have grown spiritually and I have no doubt they have, as they have materially they are indeed a progressive people. I was glad to be with them again.

Yours truly,

H. L. Powell.

Piney Grove, Uwharrie Ct.

As I have been silent for a few weeks I will try this evening to give you and the readers a little message. Since I last wrote our pastor, Mr. Trogdon, has got home again, and getting on nicely. We are so glad that he is improving so fast. We are all anxious for Sunday to come as he always preaches for us the third Sunday. Seems ages since he last preached to us. He always has something good to say to believing children and good advice to the sinners.

Our little Sunday school is getting on nicely, and still increasing. As the beautiful summer comes, we hope to have a Sunday school that the community will be proud of and many blessings to our church. We still keep our prayer-meeting up every first Sunday. We ask the prayers of the Christians that we may be a faithful little band and that God will help us to be better this year than we have been in the past.

Fairview, Anderson Ct.

The second quarterly conference met with the church Saturday, May 17th. Mr. Frank Crompton was the only officer present from Liberty hill. We were glad to have him with us. Attendance was very good considering the showery morning . The Ladies' Aid Society was taken into the conference by a unanimous vote. Giving the Society the privilege of sending a representative to quarterly conference. Next conference is to be held at Liberty Hill.

Rev. Mr. Lamar returned Friday from Democrat, N. C., where he was engaged in a series of meetings.

Sunday was observed as mother's day at this place, tho' a week late on account of having Mr. Lamar with us. A large crowd was present and much interest was made manifest.

The C. E. Society held a consecration meeting Sunday evening at 8 o'clock in stead of usual preaching. Mr. A. L. Pickens gave an inspiring and uplifting address from this subject, "Growing up to the stature of Jesus Christ." Our Society is known as "The Golden Rule Society of Christion Endeavor." The officers are Mr. Frank Welborn, Pres., Mr Albert Foster, Vice Pres.; Miss Mary Hendrix, Sec. and Treas.; Miss Ethel Foster, organist.

Hawkin's Chapel, Littleton Ct.

Our president was with us April 21st, and delivered a helpful sermon to a large congregation. We are always glad to have our president with us. He brings to us the good gospel message that our souls so thirst after. We would love to have him with us often, if it were so he could. We pray the blessing of the Lord to rest upon him and his work where ever he may go.

We had prayer meeting the first Sunday in this month. Our pastor was with us again Sunday and preached another one of his good sermons to a large congregation. Bro. Edwards told Sunday how to increase our Sunday school attendance; hope that it may work and hope to have a large attendance each Sabbath. We were glad to have Mrs. Edwards and two children to worship with us Sunday. She presided at the organ for us; hope to have her with us very often.

We were sorry to hear hear of Miss Lucy Ann Edmonds' fall and injury. She can't get about unless some one helps her. And now we hear she has fallen and hurt herself again. She has two sisters that aren't able to get about unless some one helps them and have been helpless for sometime. The church was their place when their health would permit. We ask all Christian people to remember those suffering women in their prayers.

Vannah Shearin, Rep.

Younts.

Mrs. R. L. Younts, known here as Grandma Younts, was born April 10th, 1843, departed this life April 29, 1913. Grandma was spry for her age and no one knew she was a sufferer till she made it known some six months ago, though she had been suffering of an awful cancer for some ten years. She was a great sufferer the last few months of her stay on earth. She died at the home of her daughter (Mrs. Fannie Hanney.) All was done by her faithful children and friends that could be done to give her relief and pleasure but finally the end came, though not unexpected to grandma. She had realized for some time that she must die and frequently spake of her good home in Heaven. Would shout and praise God and exhort her children and friends to meet her in Heaven. She was the Aunt of Rev. N. M. Modlin and wife of Peter Younts who preceded her to the eternal some ten years ago. Grandma has five children living, one dead, 14 grand children, 11 great-grand-children.

She made profession of religion at Mitchel's Grove, Guilford Co., N. C., when young and has been for some 50 years a member of the Methodist Protestant church.

As the pastor could not attend funeral on account of the illness of his wife, Rev. Mr. Thompson of the Presbyterian church here conducted the funeral services at W. Lexington, M. P. church and her remains were laid to rest in Lexington cemetery to await the resurrection day.

A good and faithful woman has gone from earth to heaven.

May the bereaved be faithful and true is the wish of the writer.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Rockingham.

I failed to say I spent a part of my time with Bro. Plyler in his home while on his work. He had recently married Miss Maggie Davis of Mecklinburgh Co., near Indian Trail, May, Bro. Plyler's daughter, seemed to be enjoying life. On Monday night the 12th I preached for Bro. Plyler in his special meeting. We had a good service; five claimed conversion.

On Tuesday, A. M., I left Rockingham for monroe Ct.

Monroe.

I arrived at Marshville at 11 A. M., where I met Bro. Stacy and we went to Bro. Clark's boarding house and took dinner. Soon after dinner we started for Mt. Moriah, a distance of 12 miles. We reached Bro. T. C. Braswell's in due time where we took supper and spent the night.

At 8 o'clock we met a good congregation at the church, and we had an interesting service. At this church they expect to repair the church before their special meeting; this is a good way to prepare for the meeting.

Early Wednesday A. M. we drove back t o Marshville where I preached to a small congregation in the Presbyterian church; after dinner we drove to Pageland, a distance of 17 miles took supper at the parsonage. Bro. Stacy, Turner and I, walked out to the Rose Hill church and had a good audience of young people to preach to, after services I spent the night with Bro. J. A. Turner, and we talked over the entire situation of the Monroe Ct. This has six appointments and it's 60 miles long, and to make one round the pastor has to travel 152 miles. Some of the churches need to have preaching twice a month, and this is impossible if the field remains as it is. I have advised with the pastor and some of the leading brethren on Stanley, and Monroe Cts. to arrange such boundaries as will be agreeable to each field and report to the Boundary Committee at our next annual Conference. We left Pageland for our last appointment at New Hope. We took dinner, and spent the night with Bro. W. C. Belk. At 8 o'clock we were at New Hope church, and there was a good attendance and the sermon seemed to be accepted and enjoyed. Bro. Stacy conveyed me to Monroe and I took the 8:15 train for Matthews. He has my thanks. Claim over paid.

Mecklenburg Ct.

Bro. Martin met me at Matthews, and we started for Zoar church 18 miles west of Matthews. We took dinner with Bro. Josiah Helms then we drove to Pineville where I answered some mail. We then drove to Bro. J. D. Adkins to spend the night. At 8 o'clock we assembled in the church at Zoar, and services were not largely attended; but the attention was good, and that helps the preacher so much. This people have a very good church house and in very good repair. There is some complaint as to attendance and interest on the part of some of the membership. The finance is in a very low condition at this church; it may be partly on the account of sickness in the pastor's family which caused him to miss some of his appointments. I hope they will do better.

On Saturday at 6 A. M. we started for Bula church twenty miles away where the 2nd quarterly conference was to meet. We drove to Bro. T. B. Moore's for dinner, at 2:30 P. M. we opened conference with all the churches represented but one, a very good attendance of the officials; but ought to have been better. The conference was interesting; some things were brought out that the members were not accustomed to hearing and they seemed to enjoy it. Preaching at 8 o'clock P. M. not a large attendance; but good attention given to the word. The church house at this place needs some improvements, and I pointed them out and asked the people to make the repairs, and I trust with the pastor behind the matter it will be done immediately. Spent the night with Bro. Moore; he has an interesting family. Our next appointment at Antioch Sunday 11 A. M. A good attendance and a very spiritual service. This church ought to be painted and carpeted and made more attractive, if possible.

We tood dinner with Bro. C. M. Garmon, and then drove to the parsonage for supper, and I spent the night with Bro. Martin. At 8 o'clock I preached at Stallings to a well filled house. This closed my visit on this field.

We have an organization at Stallings; but no church house, but we have a good parsonage and a good church lot paid for, and I trust at no distant day we will have a nice church in this village, and it will be properly located if built on the lot now selected. This circuit has had some reverses, but if the attention is is given to it that should be by the conference it can be made a splendid charge. The people demand more pastoral work to be done, and the pastor says he is going to do more along this line of work immediately. This circuit has no plan for the finances as many others in the district. It is no wonder to me that so many of our fields fail to be on the honor roll after learning the failure to adopt any plan or system by which to work. I believe our people are capable of development, and all some of them need is a chance. I believe the Board of church Ext. could afford to assist the people at Stallings in the erection of a church, when they will take up the enterprise and help themselves.

My next appointment in Charlotte. Claim over paid. Truly, C. A. Cecil.

Notice.

I expect to be at my home in High Point, during the month of June except Saturdays and Sundays. I will fill the appointments as they appear in Herald except at High Point and Haw River Ct.

Will preach in High Point, N. Main at 11 A. M. on 1st Sabbath in June, and on Haw River Ct. June 28, 29, and Brown Summit at night on the 29th.

POPULAR TALKS ON LAW.

Contracts Enforceable and Unenforceable.

By Walter K. Towers, A. B., of the Michigan Bar.

When, in the ordinary dealings of life, you arrive at a business agreement, you expect to carry out your part, and expect that the other party will carry out his. Almost invariably, in the ordinary agreements that are reglarly arrived at, each of you promises to give something or to forego in return for what the other is to do under the agreement. He is to mow your lawn; you are to give him fifty cents. He is to rent your house paying you twenty dollars a month; you are to furnish him with the use of that house. There is mutuality of obligation, and thus the difficult question of the consideration so necessary to contracts does not arise

You have agreed definitely enough with your neighbor that he is to have the trees now growing in your acre woodlot, and he is to pay you a hundred dollars therefor, the trees to become his property as they stand. Each of you is to give something, so there is consideration. You do not want litigation to arise from this agreement; you do not want, or expect, to go to court to have it enforced, else you would not have entered into it—for the unprofitability of 'buying a law suit' is proverbial. But you do want to have the agreement in such form that, if disagreement should arise you would be able to enforce your rights. You may not be able to "lick" Neighbor Jones; and, even if you could, that would only involve you in an action for assault and battery. You want the contract in such form that if you must assert your rights you will have them in a form which the law—the procedure provided for the enforcement of rights—will recognize.

Probably the principal reason why the average man finds his contracts unenforceable is because of the lack of the written evidence which the law requires in certain classes of cases. In the case of the sale of the standing timber the law of most states requires that it be evidenced by a writing signed by the party against whom it is to be enforced, otherwise the courts would not enforce it. A statement of the principles which determine in what form a contract must be evidenced to be valid may not possess the interest attaching to other branches of the law, but they are of the utmost practical importance to the average individual in the guidance of the business affairs of everyday life.

There are probably no two sections of written law which possess the practical importance, or have had the far-reaching influence of the 4th and 17th sections of the Statue of Frauds, enacted by the English Parliament in 1676. These provisions have been reenacted by the legislatures of the various states in but slightly varying form, and the principles are firmly embodied in our law and are set down to guide all of us in the formation of our contractual agreements. Every student of the law memorizes these provisions.

What is known as the fourth section specifies certain classes of contracts which must be evidenced by a signed writing if they are to be enforceable. The first of these is an agreement by an executor or administrator to answer damages out of his own estate. Of course, one holding such a position is not personally bound to pay the debts of the deceased out of his own pocket; but if he does so agree, it must be in writing, if he is to be bound by his promise.

The next class of agreements covered are those "to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of another." If some third party suffers under an existing, or contemplates a future, liability and you agree with his creditor to make it good for him, that agreement must be evidenced by a writing signed by you if you are to be bound by it. Suppose John Sims comes to you, tells you he has no money, and must have a pair of shoes, and you agree to see that he gets them at the store. You go with him to the storekeeper and say, "Let Sims have a pair of shoes, I will see you paid." By this statement you have become directly and personally liable and it is not within the statute. But if you say, "Let Sims have a pair of shoes, if he doesn't pay you I will;" then this is a contract to answer for the debt of another within the statute and there must be some written memorandum signed by you if the agreement is to be enforceable.

One of the most important of the provisions is that any contract or sale of lands, of any interest in or concerning land, must be evidenced by a signed writing. This is the provision that requires that a contract with reference to standing timber be in writing for it is with reference to realty. So too, contracts to buy land, or for mineral rights are within this provision and must be in writing. It is to be noticed that if the contract calls for the delivery of timber or coal from the lands of the owner by the owner, that is not within his provision, since he himself is to cut or mine it, thus severing it from the land so that it loses its character as realty. But if he sells coal or oil as it lies beneath his farm the contract must be in writing. The same applies to all leases except short term leases, which are excepted in most of the states.

Or if a contract is not to be performed within a year from the making thereof it must be evidenced by writing to be enforceable. This applies only to contracts which cannot be performed within a year Thus leases for a period of over a year from the date when they are made, contracts to work for over a year, etc., must be in writing. But if you agree to support Sam Allison for the rest of his life, that contract is not within the statute for though Sam is but twenty years old and in good health, he may die within a year and thus the contract be performed. True if you hired Sam Allen to work for you for a year and a half he might die and that would end the matter but it would not be a performance of the contract as would the other.

The seventeenth section provides that contracts for the sales of goods, wares and merchandise for the price of $50, or over, shall not be good unless there is written evidence signed by the party to be charged, or part delivery and acceptance, or part payment. The amount below which the statute does not apply is varied by the statutes in the various American states which have reenforced this provision in varying forms.

It is to be noticed that the contract is the agreement, not the writing. The writing is merely evidence of the contract. It may be made at any time after the contract has been agreed upon, up to the time of suit. The writing need not be a formal document to comply with the statute. Any note or memorandum is sufficient so long as it contains all the material terms, as the names of the parties, the subject matter, the consideration given, etc. There may be several papers, as a series of letters or telegrams, so long as they are consistent and connected. The necessary signature of the party to be charged may appear at any point, and may be affixed either by the party himself or his authorized agent. Thus at an auction the auctioneer is the agent of both parties and if the memo contains the essential terms his entry of the names of the parties will amount to the necessary signature and complete the required writing.

The law of some states requires that some contracts be under seal as well as in writing. In many states seals have been abolished. In all states the tendency is to lessen their effect. The principal reason that makes the seal of comparatively little import is that it is required only on the most important and formal of contracts, as deeds. The printed forms proved for these instruments include a seal; and further, these are instruments of an importance that requires the services of a competent attorney who is familiar with the requirements of the particular state and will see to it that the necessary formalities are complied with. The simple legal scroll (L. S.) has now been generally substituted for the more formal wax seal. Seals, used where not necessary, are merely superfluous.

It should be remembered that all contracts need not be written. The general rule is that if no statute requires that the particular kind of contract be in writing it need not be, and so contracts other than those specified in the statutes may be oral. Of course, even though no writing be required, prudent men frequently draw their contracts in writing that the evidence may be preserved in more permanent and indisputable form should trouble arise. If the matter is of considerable importance, better embody the terms in a letter addressed to the other party, sign it, keep a copy, and see that he replies over his signature accepting the proposal and terms.

THOSE MARTIAN CANAL BUILDERS

Recent investigations at the Flagstaff, Ariz., observatory seem to have strengthened Prof. Lowell's theory that the "canals" observed on the planet Mars are in fact real canals of water and that they are the work of beings of high intelligence. Prof. Worthington in a recent article says that on account of the low atmospheric pressue on Mars, water boils at a temperature of 111 degrees. Thus evaporation must be rapid. He believes that the water which feeds the canals must be conveyed in closed conduits or pipes, as otherwise it would all evaporate before it reached the equator from the poles.

The progress of the water, or perhaps the vegetation due to it, can be traced in the telescope as the Martian season advances. But, owing to the shape of the planet, it is concluded that this water cannot merely flow by gravity; it is thought that it must be forced along by some sort of pumping system. Mars is in a more advanced stage of planetary existence than the earth is and it has lost most of its atmosphere and most of its water.

Each winter the water is locked up in the form of a polar ice-cap, and each spring this ice-cap melts, releasing the water. There is every reason to believe that under the conditions prevailing on Mars there are beings of an advanced order living there. It is argued that these beings may be farther along in the scale than the denizens of earth are, since the race there has had more time to evolve. Of course however all this as as yet merely in the realm of speculation—scientific romance as it were.—Pathfinder.

INDIVIDUAL CUPS ON TRAINS.

Arrangements have been made by the Southern Railway to furnish sanitary individual drinking cups to passengers on all trains and a large supply of cups of the collapsible paper type have been ordered. As soon as the cups have been received each conductor will be furnished with a supply and any passenger desiring a cup will receive one free of charge on application to the conductor. Notices to this effect will be posted in each coach.

Furnishing drinking cups to passengers on the large number of trains operated by the Southern Railway will involve a substantial expenditure which is being undertaken to provide for the convenience of patrons of the railway. All common drinking cups have been removed from trains in compliance with United States Government regulations and the statutes and ordinances of many states and municipalities.

Hereafter passengers on Southern Railway trains will be put to no inconvenience or expense in regard to drinking water and at the same time not be subject to any possible infection through the use of the common drinking cup.

To take advantage of the immense interest created in the dairy and poultry industries throughout the Southeast as a result of the operation of its dairy instruction car, the Southern Railway Company has enlarged the scope of its work for the upbuilding of these industries by appointing seven additional dairy and poultry experts who will devote their entire time in the field advising and helping dairymen and farmers. One of these is C. T. Rice, of Greensboro, N. C.

The services of these men, all of whom have wide practical experience and are thoroughly conversant with Southern conditions, will be without cost to dairymen, farmers and all persons interested in poultry or dairying along the lines of the Southern Railway.

—Secretary of State Bryan gave a dinner to the diplomatic corps and set a new pattern by cutting out all alcoholic liquors. As a sort of compromise unfermented grape-juice was served. In a frank statement to his guests Mr. Bryan said that he and his wife had always been teetotalers and their parents before them. He added that President Wilson had given them carte blanche to follow their own inclination in providing temperance entertainment.

LOOKING AHEAD

A charming young woman walked into a store in a village, and asked to see some type-writing-paper. After making her selection, she hesitated for a moment. "Do you make any reduction to clergymen?" she inquired.

"Yes," replied the merchant promptly. "Are you a clergyman's wife?"

"N-no," she answered.

"A clergyman's daughter, probably," said the man, as he tied up the package.

"No," was the young woman's hesitating answer. "But"—and she leaned over the counter and spoke in a confidential whisper—"if nothing happens I shall be engaged to a theological student as soon as he comes home from college next spring." —Pathfinder.

—Miss Loda Dirt, of Kansas City, who married James R. Mudd, now wants a divorce; the grounds no doubt will be that he failed to come up with the dust.—Washington Post.

—The daughters of the Chinese minister to the United Ctates are Misses Lily and Alice Chang. "Lily" and "Alice"! This recalls one of Zangwill's stories in which the first children of a large Jewish immigrant family were, if we recall aright: Abraham, Susana, Mordecai and Eleazer; and of those born after their parents becoming American citizens: Sam, Minnie, Jack and Bob. It is stated that there are Polish Jews in New York City named Jones, who were formerly Sapissiniskihiki, or something to that effect.

FROM OUR PASTORS

Gaston Ct.

It affords me a peculiar pleasure to write up this work; and I wish that I could do more of this work. But as my time is all taken up in the field, and in composing myself for the pulpit, I have but very little time to write up what is done in a general way. While I feel the importance of this work, I also feel the supreme importance of doing my pulpit work, and doing it well.

I believe what has been done on the Gaston Ct., and that which is now being done here, will speak for itself. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit." I rejoice in the fact that Fair Field church has taken on new life, and I believe that she is going to spread herself like a green bay tree. Fairfield church now has an organ, and it is almost paid for. We have thoroughly organized the Sunday school, and got plenty of literature. The Sunday school at that church is now progressing nicely. I believe that the Sunday school there will now fill its mission. The church has worked up to a sense of its duty, and we now have an extra large congregation at Fairfield. They have continued their prayer meetings and Sunday schools all through the winter, something that they have never been known to do before.

It is an inspiration to anyone to visit old Fairfield church now! My heart was made glad on last Sat. night, when I arrived at the church. They were singing, and it made me feel like I was going into a heavenly place. It reminded me of olden-times, it made me think of boyhood days when mother would take me to church; we could hear them singing long before we got to the crurch. It sounded like the voice of angels! But soon we were in the old church yard, and as I passed through the pale moon light, I could see the little mounds of dust all around me, with white slabs of marble at each end, marking the place of some of the saints of old Fairfield church.

If we live and nothing happens until the second Sunday in next month, we expect to hold a memorial service at Fairfield church, as we did not get to have it in this month. We earnestly request all the brethren to meet us at Fairfield church on Saturday morning before the second Sunday in next month; bring your hoes, shovels, and pitch-forks; we want to clean off the grave-yard, and have every thing in good order, for Sunday morning.

I also wish to ask the building committee at Cornelius to have a special called meeting, on Thursday night before the second Sunday in next month, and I will meet with them. With best wishes to Editor. I am fraternally,

D. M. Loy.

We have lost at Orange Chapel three members since our last report.

Omia Thompson died April the 3rd. She was 14 years and some months old. At our special meeting last July she confessed faith in Christ and united with the church. She proved faithful and was called higher to receive her "crown of life."

J. A. Thompson died April 22nd. He was 73 years 3 months 28 days old . He joined the church while he was young. He lived a quiet, peaceable, consistent Christian life. His influence in his home, community and church was truly a great blessing. He leaves a widow and several sons and daughters.

Daniel Thompson died May the 2nd. He had lived to be 80 years, 3 months and 17 days old. He connected himself with the church in his youthful days. He lived an irreproachable life. His neighbors speak of him in high terms of praise.

He leaves an aged widow several sons and daughters.

The S. S. at Concord will observe Children's Day in the afternoon of the 3rd Sunday in June.

An offering for the orphans was taken at Salem 2nd Sunday which amounted to $5.37.

We will hold election in June for delegate to Anuual Conference. Bros. A. N. Roberson and Jesse Bradshaw are the candidates.

G. W. Holmes, Pastor.

Monroe Circuit.

Our president was with us three days and preached four times and traveled in the country through the dust a distance of 62 miles, but left us in Monroe, N. C., yesterday morning in good trim for work, such as preaching, awakening pastors, laymen, and sinners from their lethargy, and we may truthfully say in regard to many out of their Ripvanwinkle sleep. Our president is a live wire proper, and made a fine impression on this work. President's claim, $7.00; paid president $8.70. If all signs don't fail there will be better reports this fall on Gen. Ind. and pastor's salary than here-to-fore. Notwithstanding our chief executive has lost his right arm he has taken the animal by the horns like a lion with the other and if we as people take hold we will turn the old "critter" around or break his neck.

O. D. S.

Thomasville.

Our president, Bro. Cecil, wiill be with us 4th Sunday, May 25th. Will preach at 11 A. M. come one, come all; he always gives us something good to feast on.

T. A. Williams.

St. Paul Charge, Liberty Church.

We filled the appointment at this church last second Sunday. Our membership in Liberty is worthy of commendation in many ways. They attend the preaching of the word, and Sunday-school faithfully. The mid-week prayer-meeting is also well attended, conducted by Rev. W. C. Kennett who is doing it well, but Bro. Kennett has shown his ability as a teacher of the word in the S. S. to a marked degree. As a S. S. teacher in Liberty Bro. Kennett has few equals and no superiors. Liberty church is very prompt with its finances. Bro. R. E. Patterson, the S. S. Supt., is always at his post. For quite awhile the church has thought of no one for Supt. but Bro. Patterson. The churches of Liberty have decided to have a union meeting, beginning on the 4th Sunday in June. We ought to have said in our last report that Bros. J. W. Curtis and W. H. Chilcutt were elected nominees for delegate to the Annual Conference. We will have something to say about Liberty Grove next week.

G. F. Millaway.

THE POSTAL CARD.

W. F. Kennett, Editor.

Special Mention.

Gideon's Grove church deserves special mention on account of having paid one half of assessment for pastor's salary up to the middle of the conference year. Palestine is a close second lacking only $1.50 of being half out on the pastor's salary.

Last Sunday.

We had fine congregations at Palestine and Gideon's Grove last Sunday. Mrs. Verginia Carroll was received into the church at Palestine, coming, by letter from the M. E. Church, South.

The Sick.

Harvey Jones one of our Bethel boys underwent an operation for appendicitis at St. Leo's hospital on last Saturday. We are hoping for his speedy recovery.

We have just learned that Bro. Jonah Parker, of Bethel, is quite sick.

Marriage Bells.

One of our splendid Methodist Protestant young men will this week take as his bride one of Stokesdale's fairest maid-ens. The invitations read as follows: Mr. and Mrs. George Brown request the honor of your presence at the marriage of their daughter, James Bluford to Mr. Robert Augel on Thursday evening, twenty second of May nineteen hundred and thirteen at eight o'clock at their home Stokesdale, N. C.

Uwharrie Ct.

Dear Editor:

Yesterday was a very pleasant day to me. I filled my regular appointment although was not able , but the Lord blessed me in the effort. There was a right large congregation at Canaan and Piney Grove, and better listeners to the word I never talked to, and that helps one so much in preaching the word. Many show their appreciation by remembering us with their means as well. But we have some people that seem to think that the trouble of going to church costs them all that it is worth to them, therefore they never do anything to help the cause along. But when it is all done they are like the old man that climbed the tree while his wife killed the bear, he came down and said, "There! look what we did, we killed a bear." But I don't think he ever felt good about it because his conscience would not let him. They are having a splendid S. S. at both places under the leadership of Bros. Edmond Ride and C. H. Hill. They both seem to have the work at heart and if the people will stand to them they will do more for their children than time will ever reveal. They are both planning for children's day service. Their singing at both places is uplifting. I had the pleasure of being with the people at Jerusalem and Cid the second Sunday; like those I have just spoken of, they were very appreciative of my presence and showed it by their means, and by their kindness in other ways. The people seem hopeful of a good year. Dear readers, pray for us. I want to say that I think my health is improving. I think I am due to say right here that some of the articles that have come out in the Herald seemed to imply that I had intimated that the operation which Dr. C. C. Hubbard and others performed on me was not a success. I have never intimated such a thing to any one; if it seems so, I did not mean to, because he is one of our most successful surgeons as a practicing physician, and any one that was as attentive to me and did as much for me since I have been here as Dr. C. C. Hubbard I would feel it very wrong to leave a wrong impression on the minds of the people. Praying God's blessings upon the church militant I am yours for Christ. Joel Trogdon.

Our special meeting began Sunday the 18th, with Rev. T. A. Williams as pulpit help; the interest is good up to the present time. We have had eleven conversions and reclamations. Bro. Cecil will fill our pulpit next Sunday night, the 25th, at 7.45. D. R. Williams.

FROM LOCAL REPORTERS

Pee Dee Church, Rockingham Ct.

Bro. Plyler began a meeting at St. John's church April 13 and closed 27th. He did some noble preaching. We had 10 or 12 conversions, but no one joined the church at that time. One has joined since and some others will join. The church is greatly benefited by this meeting and we ask the prayers of all readers for our success at that point.

On closing of the meeting Bro. Plyler came home and rested one day and on the 29th of April he went over to the station and got on the car and went off in search of a wife. On the 30th at 2 o'clock he was married to Miss Maggie Davis of Union. When they came home they found supper waiting for them, prepared by Miss May Plyler and some of the good ladies of the Pee Dee church. They also found a good number of friends that served supper with them. We hope that sister Plyler will like her new home fine, we wish them success.

Now a few words about our meeting here at Pee Dee church. Bro. Plyler began his special meeting here on May the 4th. We are having a very good meeting; we have had noble preaching. Bro. W. M. Fitzwater has been helping Bro. Plyler here. He too has done some fine preaching and in mean time, Bro. C. A. Cecil, our president, came to our work. He was here on the 11th and preached two most noble sermons for us and on the night of the 4th he went to St. John and preached for them. Bro Cecil told us many helpful things. We were glad to have him with us and in our home. Our hope is that he will come again. Our meeting has not closed yet. We have had 10 conversions up to date and one joined the church. Hope we will have a wonderful meeting here yet. Pray for our success here and that God may save many souls before the close of this meeting.

Rev. O. D. Stacy filled his regular appointment at New Hope the first Sunday. He also preached Sunday night. A large congregation was out both times. He is to preach to the children next first Sunday.

Our Sunday school is doing just finely and we are going to try to keep the good work up.

Rev. C. A. Cecil preached at New Hope on the 15th. He made a fine thing of his text, and it was thoroughly enjoyed by all. He and Mr. Stacy stopped over at our home . We enjoyed having them with us very much.

Yours very truly,
Eva Belk.

Union Hill, Fosyth Circuit.

Our pastor, Rev. Mr. Austin, filled his regular appointment Sunday and preached an interesting and helpful sermon.

Mr. Gray Stimpson and his sister, Miss Esther, spent a few days of the past week with their sister, Mrs. T. A. Williams, of Thomasville.

TRAMP.

"Here! You stop that! I'll tell my papa on you!" screamed Eva, running down to the street, where some bad boys were pelting a dirty yellow dog with mud and stones. "Come, doggie! Come, doggie!"

"Go into the house, baby!" called back the boys. "We don't care for you."

Eva was only five years old, and much afraid of the boys, so she began to cry; but just then her brother Joseph came out of the house and in a very few minutes the poor dog was safe in the little old woodhouse. The boys were angry that they had lost their fun; but they did not dare open the door, and soon went away.

"What in the world are you children doing?" said the cook when they ran to her for scraps of meat and bread.

"Got a poor dog shut up in the woodhouse? You must let him out this minute! Maybe he's mad."

But Eva and Joseph promised not to go near the dog if she would only give them the scraps. The poor fellow was indeed a sorry sight as he shivered and tried to curl up in the old rags they threw into the house. He ate greedily, and then the cook came and pushed in a pan of warm milk, which he drank as if famished.

When their papa came home he looked very grave, and said the children must not touch the strange dog. "He's only a common animal and just a sort of tramp, so it would be kindness to have him killed," he explained to the liittle ones. "Nobody owns him, and he will starve in the end."

But the children begged that the dog's life might be spared a while, for they felt sure someone would claim him. "Tramp" as they called him, soon began to look better from the good food they gave him, and one day Sam gave him a bath in an old tub that helped his looks wonderfully. Still he was nothing but a common dog, and no amount of feeding or petting could make him handsome. The weather was still cold, and he huddled most of the time in his shelter to keep warm, and as if afraid of the bad boys who had hurt him only a few days before.

But one day when the sun shone out warm and bright and the children were playing on the lawn Sam put an old collar on Tramp's neck and tied him to the fence by the woodhouse. He seemed to enjoy the sunshine and fresh air, but would have liked to be with Eva and Joseph as they played together. As the children had promised not to touch him and they kept their word; but they wanted to be with Tramp quite as much as he with them.

"Mamma! mamma! look there! There is Yellow Top!" cried a little child as a carriage drove past. "Let me get him."

Tramp was looking joyously and trying to get away when he heard the weak little voice, and Eva and Joseph were glad to learn that he belonged to the little girl in the carriage. She cuddled him up to her and thanked the little boy and girl for taking such good care of him. "Folks say he isn't worth much much," she said, "but I wouldn't take a thousand dollars for Yellow Top."

"I just knew somebody loved him," cried Eva, as they ran to tell their papa and mamma the wonderful story. "I'm sorry to lose him; but he's at home and better off, isn't he?"—Selected.

THE PLOWMAN.

By Frank H. Sweet.

Craig's berry field, in the suburbs of Waynesboro, presented a busy scene during the picking season. All the boys and girls of the neighborhood, who wanted work, were there—and all the other people, too, for that matter. Little tots of seven or eight, and their great-grandfathers and great-grandmothers of seventy or eighty, were spread out like animated spots all over the strawberry beds, or scattered along the rows of currants and gooseberries, or perhaps hidden by the tall sprays of blackberry and raspberry vines. Every day hundreds of nicely packed crates and baskets and boxes were taken to the station by the delivery wagon; and every evening the small army of pickers crowded about the office door to exchange the cardboard checks representing their day's labor for their equivalent in money.

So one day when a rough, half-grown boy slouched up to the manager and mumbled something about work, he was promptly directed to join the pickers. Work? There was lots of it ,the manager said.

But the fellow drew back, his face clouding. Evidently the answer was unexpected.

For a single instant they gazed at each other; then the lad's eyes shifted and dropped, and the manager's darkened. He had met this manner of man—or boy—before, and knew his ways. Asking for work was but a feeler, that being refused, he would tell some pitiful story and beg for his dinner and perhaps a little money, in the meantime looking about with stealthy, covetous eyes for whatever was valuable and profitable.

Very likely he had associates in the vicinity, and the manager's eyes glanced down the main road, toward the bit of woods a quarter of a mile away. Yes, there were two men sprawled upon the grass beside the road, smoking. Even at that distance he could recognize them as tramps. A hard look came into his eyes, and sharp words to his lips. But only for a moment; then they were lost in something entirely different.

It all came about from the little four-year-old son passing by them toward the berry fields. The tramp had been slouching away when his shifting eyes caught sight of the boy, and for an instant a new look came into them and transfigured the face. Then it was lost in the habitual expression of sullenness. But brief as it was, the manager had seen it.

John Groves had not been a hirer of help all these years to make mistakes in his men. Besides, he was fond of experimenting. Sometimes the best firewood had the roughest, knottpiest bark on the outside, and of all the varieties of strawberries he raised, his own choice was a small, irregular fruit, not half so handsome as the other berries. This unprepossessing applicant for work might not be as bad as he seemed. He was of good figure, evidently strong and healthy, and his very sullenness and lack of confidence were in his favor, for they indicated that he was ashamed of his position. Moreover, he was only a boy, and very likely the tool of others.

"Yes, I have plenty of work," the manager said, looking keenly at the lowering, discontented face. "Did you ever pick berries?"

"No," surlily.

The manager's eyes examined his critically, comprehendingly.

"And yet you were brought up on a farm," he declared.

The tramp's eyes sought him suspiciously.

"How do you know?"

The manager laughed.

"I haven't delt with men without learning some of the signs of their vocations," he answered. "Your hands have been hardened and toughened by plow handles. I can see that. And you walk like a farmer. But come," as the other scowled and glanced toward the road, "let us go down to the berry field."

"But I don't want—" The sentence was cut short abruptly. He had asked for work, and it would not do to arouse suspicion.

"I don't believe I can pick berries," he grumbled, as he slouched along beside the manager, "my fingers are too big."

"Oh, well, there's plenty of other work," the manager said easily; "and to tell the truth, it's the other work I'm anxious about. Anybody can pick berries. Now this," as they paused beside the strawberry field, "is our banner crop. We have forty varieties, and a daily yield of fifty to sixty-five bushels. Taste that," stooping and selecting a large, thickly-crowned berry. "it's a Bubach, and in just the right condition for eating."

The hulking, overgrown boy took the berry diffidently and placed it between his teeth.

"Yes, it's good," he said after a moment, "prime good."

"Our market thinks so. Now we'll go on to the currants and raspberries and blackberries. Then there is a field I want to show you. But about work—it's curious how many people there are who haven't learned their own business. The country's full of farmers, for instance, and yet there are very few who can plow a field of heavy ground properly. I've a dozen men here now who think they can handle a plow, but there are only two or three of them I'd trust with really fine work. You know how it is, though, being raised on a farm."

The heavy face lightened for an instant.

"Yes, good plowers are scarce. I used to—" The sentence was not finished but the manager looked across the field to hide a sudden twinkle of satisfaction in his eyes. It was the first sign of interet the tramp had shown.

From the berry field they went across some meadow land and a brook to a square, inclosed field of ten or twelve acres. Around it several furrows had recently been turned, for the soil was still moist. The manager nodded toward them significantly.

"I want you to look that work over," he said, "and tell me just what you think of it." He then appeared to busy himself about the fence, but did it in such a manner as to keep a covert oversight of his companion's face.

But the caution was unnecessary. The heavy face was animated now, critical, disapproving; and the hulking figure had straightened up and seemingly grown more compact as it moved back and forth along the furrows.

"Well," the manager asked at last, "what do you think?"

The fellow started and resumed his slouching gait.

"It's botch work," he replied, "every furrer of it; and the furrers are all done by different hands, too."

"Right you are," cried the manager, heartily. "You've got keen eyes. The way of it is this: Yesterday a man came who said he could plow. I sent him to work here and let him go round once, then put him to picking strawberries. This morning two other men came, and I gave each one of them a chance at the plow. They are now with the pickers. This ought to have been ready for plant ten days ago, but I want it plowed right or not at all." He looked at the face before him a moment, then appeared to decide its owner was not yet ready for overtures, for he went on:

"My experts will likely have to come over and do the work, though I hate to spare them from the job they're at now. It's curious how many there are like you, who know good work when they see it, but who don't do it themselves. I don't doubt but every man on the place really believes he is a good plower."

"Huh! I could do that lot with any man in the country," said his companion quickly. "Haev you any plow horses handy?"

"Why, yes; I believe so," the manager replied, with apparent indifference. "I wouldn't wonder if there was a pair all harnessed, just as the man left them. I'll have them brought."

When a boy appeared with the horses, five minutes later, the tramp caught the lines from him with dexterous familiarity, guided the horses through the opening in the fence, fastened the traces to the plow, swung the plow over for another furrow, and then chirruped quickly to the horses. The manager watched with approval. By the time the plowman had made one turn around the field he had established his position as an expert.

As he completed the round and approached the opening in the fence, the manager looked for him to leave the field. But no! he kept right on, apparently oblivious of everything but his work. He seemed, indeed, like one who had returned to a favorite occupation after a long absence; and was unconscious of aught else. The manager watched him for another ten minutes, then went to the berry fields. It was noon when he returned.

"Hello," he called, cheerily, "it's about time for something to eat. We'll take the horses to the barn, and then get dinner."

The tramp started and passed a hand across his forehead.

"Why, I didn't know it was so late!" he ejaculated. "I must be goin.'—I've got some friends waitin'. I'll look after the horses fust, an' then go. No, you needn't take 'em," as the manager laid his hands upon the reins. "I'll do it. I like horses."

The manager smiled as he walked beside him to the barn, and waited for him to feed the horses. Evidently this was the avenue to the fellow's heart.

"Now come up-stairs with me," the manager said, as they left the stable.

The fellow hesitated then followed.

Over the stable was a long room, lighted by two windows, and several chairs. It looked wholesome and inviting. The manager pointed to the bed.

"Sit down," he said, quietly. "I want to talk with you. No, there is no hurry," as the other seemed about to refuse. "Your companions have gone, I went to them and said you were at work, and that they could have ten minutes to leave my premises. They will not return," grimly. "No, you cannot go yet," blocking the stairway, "and you need not look so fierce. I am doing it for your good."

He waited until the lad had seated himself upon the bed, scowling and sullen, and with an all-concealed expression of anxiety on his face. Then he went on more gently:

"Let me tell you something now, my boy. These men have a hold on you, and you are afraid of them. They sent you in here to look around, and were waiting for you to come back and report. But you needn't fear. I talked pretty plain, and they won't dare to cross my land again. You can have this room, and charge of the horses down-stairs, and I will give you steady work. Unless you wish, there will be no need of you to leave the place for a year to come. I have a boarding-house on the farm where most of the men stay, but I think you will like this room to yourself and near the horses the best. No," as the other's face began to work curiously, "you needn't tell me anything yet I am willing to trust you. I am not generally mistaken in men. Will you stay?"

The hulking figure straightened at it had done while criticising the furrows. Then he rose heavily and came forward.

"Yes, sir, I'll stay," the fellow said huskily, "an—an' thank you, too."—Sabbath Reading.

For Chickens.

Put copperas in the chicken's food. It will cure all diseases. Give tincture of iron for gapes—ten drops in the food for twenty chickens. Feed whole corn as soon as they can swallow it. Smoke with tobacco for vermin. Put chickens in a slat basket covered; smoke for half a minute, and give them air, and smoke again.

Our Sunday school is progressing nicely, having good attendance.

Messrs John and Frank Poindexter spent Saturday night and Sunday at the home of her father, Mr. W. M. Poindexter.

Miss Brooxie Dezern left Sunday for Winston-Salem where she will spend the summer.

Our Sunday school is improving in numbers. Our attendance was in 60 today; mostly small children. It is very hard to get older people to attend Sunday school. We have 4 classes. Bro. Mitchell is our superintendent and he seems to take much interest in Sunday school. Our president, Bro. Cecil, will be with us on Saturday, the 31st of this month 3 P. M. That will be a very busy time among farmers, but hope to have good congregation out to hear him. Bro. Cecil has lots of good friends on this charge. Bro. Fogleman preaches for us twice each month; 3rd Sunday at 11 A. M. 4th Sunday 2 P. M. and I think our people think lots of Bro. Trogdon, for I hear no complaint and he seems to gain in strength each time we see him.

Our special meeting will begin 2nd Sunday in August. I think Bro. Swain is to help. Success to our paper and Mr. Editor. He used to come down and preach for us, but not for quite a while. (The writer thought of asking him to come down and preach for us during Bro. Fogleman's illness, but thought probably he was too busy.

(The editor thanks the brother for the invitation he thought of extending and didn't.)

Lincolnton.

Our S. S. report for the last few Sundays has been encouraging; we had 117 present Sunday, and our collection was $3.27. We have on our cradle roll 59 babies' names; those babies were visited Sunday by the girls of the school and presented a bunch of flowers in the name of the Methodist Protestant Church. On May 10th, we had a church reception which was a complete success from start to finish, a very large crowd was present and all seemed to enjoy the whole thing which was well planned by a special committee

The writer and Rob't G. Wood failed to take in the best part of it, as we had to leave on the evening train for Caroleen to attend quarterly conference. Anyway we took in conference and the report from the three churches was encouraging. We are just now in the midst of our revival meeting. Our pastor, H. W. B., is doing the preaching, as he failed to get anyone to help him. Souls are being saved and the outlook is good, pray for us. Sunday was Holy Communion, also the day to dedicate children in baptism; I think good impressions were made on the people by those services. If this keeps shy of the waste I will write more after our meeting closes. Success to the Herald and its many readers.

Thomasville.

Our meeting began on Sunday, May 4th, and lasted until the 12th. We had Rev. J. D. Williams of Henderson with us to do the preaching, and he certainly is up to his job. He is full of it, and did us quite a lot of good in our work. We had eleven conversions and a good many who asked the prayers of the good people and showed a spirit, that they were tired of the sinful life they were living; yet they didn't come into full fellowship with Christ and are still walking in darkness. Our heartfelt prayers go out for the wanderers, that some day they may be overtaken by the Holy Spirit, and will be found working hand in hand with Christ, who promises to never leave them alone.

On Sunday, May 11th, at 2:30 P. M. Bro. D. R. Williams of High Point preached a sermon to the men from these words, "And he left his garment in her hand, and fled" Gen 39:12. His sermon was good from start to finish; being preached partly from personal experience, he knew well how to talk to sinful humanity.

May 11th, we had 186 present in Sunday school, 224 enrolled, collection, $3.20, against 124 present, 158 enrolled, collection $1.68, a year ago. We think that quite a good increase in one year. Sundayschool was good today. After Sunday school today, we had Class Meeting, of which we had several interesting experience talks. We should have Class Meetings oftener, it brings church membership closer together than almost any kind of worship.

Our pastor is absent today, helping Bro. D. R. Williams in a meeting at High Point.

The ladies of our church have organized a "Philathea" class and are getting members right along.

We have recently had our church roof painted which adds much to the appearance of the church.

Our Sunday school is progressing nicely. We are surely very glad that our Sunday school has increased so much in the last month or so. We will be glad to welcome any more who will come. It is the duty of us all, whether we are members of a church or not, to attend S. S. every Sunday when not providentially hindered. I am sorry to have to say that there are several people, children especially, who could attend regularly if they only would, living in the immediate neighborhood. It is my earnest hope that they may see, and correct their error in the near future.

I think our school has decided to prepare the children's day service for the third Sunday in July. The second quarterly conference of this circuit will be held in this church next Saturday, May 24th, at 10:30. It was announced for last Saturday, but on account of the rain it was postponed.

We will have prayer meeting next Sunday at 2:30. We have been holding these services every 2nd and 3rd Sunday evening for some time, and they are very interesting indeed. Our pastor, Rev. John Bowman, was with us last Sunday and preached an excellent sermon. Rev. Bowman intends to hold two services next third Sunday. Piney Grove, Zion, and this church are making arrangements to have a Sunday school picnic together on Saturday, May 31st. I will close wishing much success for dear old Herald, and much love for its readers.

Birthday Surprise.

On Friday evening May 8th, I was very agreeably surprised. About 5 P. M. one of my lady friends sent for me to come out to her home, she wanted to see me; so I went at once and in about 30 minutes I returned home. and she came home with me, and when I walked in my dining room there was a table set reaching almost across the room loaded with almost everything good to eat. and eighteen of my lady friends rushed in from the cook room. I could not comprehend what it all meant, till they informed me that they wanted to remind me of my birthday. And then I realized I was growing old, and I guess I looked as silly as I felt, but they were all so bright and jolly I soon came to my senses, and I can't find words to express the good time we had together, and in connection with the supper they brought along a nice rug and carpet for my sitting room.

Now I don't know who all took a part in the game, but I take this means of expressing thanks to each one, and hope that I may prove to be more useful in this community in the future than I have been in the past. Mrs. D. R. Williams.

Charlotte Richland Ct.

Our protracted meeting began Sunday, May 4th, and closed on Thursday night following. We had ten conversions and six received into the church. We feel thankful that God gives us the privilege to express our thoughts before the people. We want to thank the people for their kindness shown us during the meeting.

Third, we are thankful for having Bro. Braswell with us, but we all felt sad to tell him good by.

We have three little children and we want to raise them for heaven. I thank God for sparing our lives so long as to set new and better examples before our children and many friends.

I feel sad to think of so many days we have lost, but we feel thankful that we can stand up before God and say that we are going to live a better life. We hope to have Bro. Braswell with us again.

There will be preaching at Charlotte the first Sunday in June. Bro. Whitaker will fill his regular appointment. We hope to see many out.

scott free in this land of freedom, this land of churches, boasting one hundred thousand pastors; this land of colleges and universities, this land that has been styled "God's last chance for human race," goes on murdering other wives' husbands, other children's fathers, other mothers' sons; goes on ruling congress, dominating state legislatures, intimidating town and city councils; goes on throttling the voice of the pulpit until God in His righteous anger has sent our and its greatest spiritual drought. And the pity of it all is, but few seem to care.

Lincoln said: "This nation can't live half slave and half free." Neither can it live half drunk and half sober.

Sin will down any of us; even in the strongest of men it is too mighty to contend against unaided. The greatest delusion in the world is that you can build yourself up by tearing somebody else down, or that success can be reaped out of the frailties and misfortunes of others. Upon this false principle the licensed liquor traffic acts. By this delusion the people of this fair town allow the accursed, stenchful, blackening, damning institution that fosters and perpetuates an evil almost as old as sin itself. An evil, haggard, monstrous, furious and diabolical, that for ages has walked and crawled the earth combining all that is obnoxious in the races of men. It has gored with its horns, it has torn with its tusks, it has crushed with its hoofs, it has poisoned with its fangs, it has stung with its insectile javelin greater numbers of the human race than have perished from all other causes combined. It bribes, it lures, decoys, charms, fascinates, tempts and seduces; has the eye of an eagle, the tooth of a rattlesnake, the jaw of a crocodile, the crushing coils of a boa constrictor, the slyness of the scorpion and the "worm that dieth not." It has cheated and deceived the nations. By our false system of regulation, or attempted regulation, it hisses, it lies, it cheats, it debauches, it kills.

I hate it with an eternal, uncompromising hatred, and I don't care who knows it.

It puts its poison talons on the home and robs it of its furnishings. It takes the clothes off the backs of innocent, helpless children and shoes from off their feet. It brings mothers to the wash tub and scrub brush, and straps burdens on their shoulders too heavy to be borne. It dashes out brains and pulverizes the human heart. It fills the poor houses, the penitentiaries, the lunatic asylums and peoples our grave yards with the flower of our manhood.

By somebody's consent ten saloons are fastened upon this fair town of Oakland, which, were it not for them, would be an ideal place in which to live. We silently tolerate them, and the authorities grant the license for a very small consideration in the way of money. Thus for less than two dollars apiece the town is sold to the liquor traffic.

A county seat should be the best town in the county. Here our professional men live, here all the people must come at times to transact business. We owe it to the surrounding country to have a decent, moral town so that a country boy can leave his mother in the morning, come here on business and return to her sober in the evening. But alas! How many boys go home whooping and yelling and cursing, reeling and staggering to their home late at night because Oakland thinks she must have a little revenue.

Is there not some way to elect a man to represent us at Annapolis who will say this thing shall stop?

Whose boy will now take the place of Clyde Liller? Somebody's will.

To you men who are before me: The griefs, the scalding tears, the deferred hopes, the strangled aspirations of this woman ought to lead every man of you to lay the axe of absolute prohibition at the root of our license system and rest not till the whole tree is burned up root and branch in the fires of a holy and righteous indignation. As you behold the wound will you not bring the healing balm? As you witness the bondage will you not seize the hammer and strike off the manacles that bind at this very hour so many citizens of Garrett county? I know full well that criticism will be heaped upon me for saying this today. I have weighed every word and am prepared for the consequences. But I will not stand by and see a man cut down by liquor and witness the wreck and ruin of home without raising my voice in solemn protest against the liquor traffic in Oakland, at whose door lies the responsibility of Clyde Liller's murder.

I am going to say something else. The men who run saloons are not alone in this. Others are responsible. When we get to the judgment the man who made the foul stuff, the man who sold it to him, the man who gave it to him when he could not buy it, the man who is bondsman for the saloonkeeper, the citizen who by his silence or vote indorses the liquor traffic will not come up with fingers streaming red with blood of poor Clyde Liller who fell a helpless victim into the clutches of the liquor traffic.

And now a word to those two precious boys: Hear me today. You are old enough to know what I am saying. You will never forget this hour. You have been left without a father at this early period in your lives, and will have struggles in life and heavy burdens to bear, but I beg you today to resolve down deep in your hearts never to taste, handle or have to do with that which ceaused your poor father's untimely death.

Stay with your mother, encourage her, support her, be honest and true and the world will give you a place and you can make a living in it.

And to this widow let me say: You have the heartfelt sympathy of this congregation. You have my prayers, and in your hours of loneliness when dark shadows gather around and life's mighty storms threaten to dash your frail bark to pieces, may you hear above the roar of the conflict the voice of Christ saying: "It is I, be not afraid," "Peace be still." And the voice that silenced the waves of old Galilee will still your troubled soul, until at last the day breaks and the shadows forever flee away.

To this congregation: May you all live so that at last when you are called to answer the roll call of the skies, you may be numbered with those who shall hear the words: "Come ye blessed of my father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

YOU AND THE FLY.

Are you bald? Did you ever have a fly crawl across your head? Or did you ever have one crawl over your face and wake you up? Nuisance, isn't it? Well that's only the smallest part of the quarrel we have with flies.

Flies are scavengers. Do you know what a buzzard does? A buzzard is a large, loathsome bird which eats dead and decaying animals. They are not nice to have around. What buzzards are to birds flies are to insects.

Flies hatch from eggs. The eggs are laid in filth. Fly eggs are not nice. Another name for them is fly-blows. But about the only harm which fly eggs do is to make more flies. After a few days the fly eggs hatch into maggots. Maggots are not nice, but they do not do much except that they make flies. The maggots crawl into dirt and in a few days they come out flies.

Flies are very busy insects. They are active all day long, and at night, too, if you have a light in the room. During dry days they like to stay out in the grass in the yard. They can feel a rain coming before you can, so they always try to get in the house before a rainstorm. They are not fools. They like the light. If a room is dark they do not like to go in it. If there are flies in the room a good way to get rid of them is to darken the room and leave one window open and bright. The flies will fly out of this window. On a warm day you can easily persuade them to walk out into the yard or to stroll around the block. If it is getting cold or if a rain is coming up they will stick to the house like a hungry dog to a frankfurter.

But what can we do about it? Don't let any manure stand in the boxes. Don't let any garbage accumulate. Screen the houses. Kill the flies. Keep everything clean. In other words, starve the fly.

Winter Life of Flies.

How do flies live through the winter? A few lazy, logy flies can be found half dead but still living aroung chimneys and warm places in the house or stable. They will come to life just as soon as the boys get to playing marble. An old she fly will go off to some bit of manure or garbage and lay a million eggs, and then, in about two weeks, there are flies galore—there is no danger of the stock being exhausted.

High ideals are often lived out in lowly places.

The tree which blooms all the time bears no fruit.

A BACK NUMBER

At a recent gathering of advertising men in New York this story was told: A man entered a store one bitter cold day and bought a woolen muffler. When he opened the muffler he found inside it the photograph of a beautiful girl, together with a note saying: "If you are single, please write to me."

A name and address followed, and the man smiled. He was single, and he put the photograph on his sitting-room mantel. There, every evening, looking up from his book, he beheld it. It was very beautiful, and in a week he had fallen head over heels in love. So he wrote to the girl.

Another week passed, a week of anxious, nerve-racking suspense. Then the lovesick man received this crushing letter: "Sir. The Mary Smith to whom you wrote was my grandmother. She died nine years ago, aged 86.—Yours truly."

Our heart-broken bachelor, on looking into this strange matter, found that he had foolishly bought the muffler from a dealer who didn't advertise.—Pathfinder.

Class of Fair Grove Sunday School.

Carter.

Recently the death angel visited the home of Mr. Walter Carter, who lives near Littleton, and took his daughter little Hazel to the beautiful beyond. She was two years old 3rd of April, day she was taken sick. How much she suffered during her two weeks illness no tongue can tell. What disease? Her physician did not say, neither could he cure. Her death was not for the lack of good attention. She had all, and the very best that could be given her, by her mother, father garndmother, uncles, doctors and trained nurse. She was such a sweet child! Her mother's darling, papa's little lady, grandmother's treasure, grandpa Edd's idol. So often he took to Sunday school, we called her our little Sunday school girl. Wanted so much that she should live, but God wanted her more, and now she is His little angel, a shining light in that beautiful mansion he is preparing for all those who love and serve him. Mamma, she is there beckoning for you and papa and little sister, to come and stay with her forever-more. Her remains were taken to Corinth. Pall bearers were Messrs. Bernard Morris Jesse White, Grady Moss, Robert Robinson. Slowly they took her form, which was placed in little white casket, down the aisles to the altar while Miss Nellie Sledge presided at the organ. Bro. Edwards preached her funeral. The church was full of sympathizing friends and relatives, who accompanied her body to the grave, on which pretty flowers were placed, last token of respect we can show the deceased. May we all be as careful in shaping our lives for the heavenly home as you were dear friends in administering to Hazel's many needs. A sweet little flower budded here on earth to bloom in heaven. Heaven a beautiful place so many dear little ones there, Christ said: Suffer the little ones to come unto me, forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.

Sympathizingly,
Fannie Barnes

—Rev. W. D. Fogleman came over yesterday to attend the annual meeting of Masons—members of the "chain gang" he calls them. Several hundred usually attend this meeting. Bro. Fogleman's health is not satisfactory yet, as he is unable to digest starch foods. He says work is what is keeping him up. He has his heart in the work and this, we trust, will enable him to conquer his disease.

—Mrs. W. C. Hammer and Mrs. J. F. McCulloch have gone to Foosland, Ill., to attend the annual meeting of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society. Mrs. Hammer went early to visit friends in Pennsylvania, and Mrs. McCulloch expects to remain a few days to visit relatives in Michigan.

—Bro. A. F. Edmunds, of Buncombe, is here to attend the meeting of Odd Fellows, which he claims is the true "chain gang." He is a member of three fraternal orders, including the Masons, but says he pays more to the church than to all of them. We were glad to see him in the Herald office.

—More than 300 North Carolina shippers met in Raleigh last week and passed a resolution requesting the governor to call a special session of the legislature to act in the matter, of freight rates. It is asserted that unjust rates are extorting from the people of this State millions of dollars each year.

The little nine months old child of Mr. and Mrs. William Staley died last week and was buried in Mt. Pleasant cemetery. It's life was short but it suffered a great deal, having had, (during the winter and spring) measles, whooping cough, pneumonia with complication. Doctors and loved ones worked hard to save it, but could not. We sympathize with the bereaved parents. May the Father above give them the peace He can and does give to those who trust Him. Reporter.

Canaan.

I feel like this paper is a friend of mine. I enjoy reading the reports. When I am with good Christians and talk with them I don't know when to leave, and I love to be in meetings and singings.

Our Sunday school is getting along finely, but could be better. So many don't seem to be interested in God's work. I think our church is improving some. We are looking to have a good meeting this fall. Bro. Trogdon was with us Sunday and preached a good sermon. He seems to be not very well, but hope and pray that the dear Lord will give him his health again.

—The Biederwolf meetings continue with unabated interest. Several hundred people have gone forward and committed themselves to a Christian life. Mr. Biederwolf's method is this: After preaching in his powerful manner, concluding his discourse in a way to affect the feelings, he asks all to bow their heads in prayer. He then asks those who wish to begin a Christian life to hold up their hands, he continuing to appeal to them. After a few minutes, he asks the congregation to stand, and then he asks those who have held up their hands and any others who wish to become Christians to come down to the platform and give him their hands. He appeals to Christians to speak to those near them, and has previously arranged with Christian workers to be scattered through the congregation for this purpose. After a few minutes spent in this way, he calls on some brother to pray for those who have come forward and asks Christians to gather round them at the altar. He then leads them in a prayer of confession and consecration, which they repeat sentence by sentence after him. He then has cards passed to the converts on which they place their names and indicate the church of their preference.

Whether there is time for the psychical changes involved in genuine conversion may be questioned by some, but this method in Dr. Biederwolf's hands succeeds in inducing scores at almost every meeting to take the steps indicated. If this be not complete conversion, it may be the beginning of it to all who will continue in the Way.

—Rev. W. A. Ledford is in Eden, Md. He sends for the Herald, saying he can't be satisfied without hearing from his brethren in N. C.

WHAT SHOULD PASTORS WRITE ABOUT?

A young pastor writes: "Since Peter S. opened fire I feel somewhat like I think a great many pastors feel—a hesitancy about writing about their work. But what else is a pastor to write about? I wish you would answer that question in the Herald."

We believe that Peter Slewfoot has been misunderstood. We understand his article to be simply a protest against exaggerated reports—not an objection to true and proper representations. Brother Slewfoot is himself a pastor, and his own reports indicate to us that he is not opposed to taking considerable space, even for poundings.

Each pastor must judge for himself what are proper subjects for report in the church paper, and what it is proper to say about them. And no one should be restrained from doing his duty to his people and to the church at large by fear of criticism. Everyone should be on his guard against taking space for communications that will profit nobody. But the criterion of profitableness is one that must be used with latitude. What is not profitable to one may be to another. An expression of appreciation of some small deed may be the means of encouraging the doer to do greater deeds. We believe in freedom exercised with due regard to the feelings of all. Critics are to be regarded, but they are not the only people to be regarded. Let each pastor be fully persuaded in his own mind, and so let him write,—approving and appreciating that which is good, and reproving and condemning that which is bad.

If some of our pastors would write more, they would through their own practice develop the power to discriminate, and would write with more confidence than they can now.

There are subjects of general interest to the church that are open for discussion to pastors and all other members of the church. The great question of union now upon us, for example. What have you to say about that? Don't go off half cocked, but have your gun loaded—there may be some fighting to do. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. Error ever encroaches upon the truth and must be driven back.

—We thank Principal Totten for an invitation to the commencement of Yadkin Collegiate Institute, May 21st and 22nd. A pleasant time is expected. Bro. Stowe preaches on the 21st at 11 A. M. Prof. Noble of the State University speaks on the 22nd at 2 P. M. Other hours are occupied with students' exercises.

—Bro. W. F. Grabbs sent us some money for the flood sufferers. We sent it to our church people in Zanesville, Ohio. Eli A. Palmer gratefully acknowledged receipt of it, and added that help from others would be appreciated very much. He is treasurer of the Relief Committee of our church there. The editor will be glad to forward other contributions while the need continues.

—Bro. Gerringer returned to North Carolina last week from Westminster Theological Seminary. After a brief rest he will go to Creswell to enter upon his pastorate. We wish for him the success he deserves. He has labored long to prepare himself for the ministry.

—Bro. Raper extends invitation to the members of the Board of Church Extension to attend the dedication of the Reidsville church coming on the first Sunday in June. Over $5,000 has been raised for this church. Says Bro. Raper, "We have had no icecream suppers or sales of any kind." The day of dedication will be a "red letter day" for Reidsville. Bro. Dixon is to preach the sermon, and we trust he will have a house full of hearers. We presume there will be preparation for the music, floral decorations, etc., to add to the joy of the occasion.

—Is there a charge that can show a better record than Halifax circuit in the matter of church papers? Bro. Pritchard reports that 57 out of 64 homes receive the M. P. Herald and three the Methodist Protestant.

EDITOR FARRIS ON OUR CHILDREN'S HOME.

Dear Mr. Millikan:

I am enclosing check $25 on my subscription to the orphanage. I was out there yesterday and you have a beautiful building, a credit to the town and to the denomination. I am proud of it as a citizen and as a friend to those who have promoted it and want to do all for it that I can.

UNITED IN DEATH

There is a little cabin home
That's nestled 'mongst the Piedmont hills,
Near where the tireless Yadkin swells
From bubbling brooks and running rills—
A home where pilgrims oft have sought
And found a pleasant night of rest;
And he who found that open port
Was honored as a royal guest.

Long years ago when days were bright,
And youthful springtime was a-glee,
Young Herbert, in his youth and pride,
There wooed and won his Mary Lee.
But ere the fading of the leaves—
Or dying of the autumn breath,
A courtier from another world
Took off his Mary Lee in death.

For many years he roamed the world
In quest of peace; but all in vain;
With Jackson fought, with Seabold sailed—
Contented not, it seemed but pain.
Three score and ten allotted years
He roamed, save twenty, from his birth,
Then, bent and old, returned to die
At home—the dearest spot on earth.

Outside, the darkness of the night
Lay deep and cool upon the air;
The fire had slowly died away;
The old man sat in his arm chair.
An aged pilgrim passing by
Beheld him, quiet as a stream,
Perhaps engaged in reverie—
Asleep—re-living in a dream.

Then, suddenly, he called aloud:
"O Mary, is that you? And you
Have come for me? I'm ready now,
We'll go; my earthly journey's through."
A low voice whispered, "Come with me."
His weary soul then took its flight
With a comrade, who had returned
For its companion on that night.

JOY AND HUMILITY

"In that hour Jesus rejoiced in spirit, and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent and hast revealed them unto babes; even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight"—Luke 10:21.

It was the hour of the return of the seventy whom He had sent out. They came back having joy, and their joy was principally founded on the fact that they themselves had power and that God had especially used them. He tells them not to rejoice in that but rather to rejoice that their names are written in heaven. When He tells them not to rejoice in the way they were rejoicing, it says in that hour Jesus rejoiced in spirit. What Jesus rejoiced in was the spirit of humility—the childlike spirit. He saw very clearly that just as His disciples would have the spirit of humility they would have everything. He had a great vision of it.

May God give us also some reflex of that vision. Every Christian needs to have it.

He saw two elements in these disciples that came back. There was an element of humility there, because they had become His disciples and were willing to obey and learn of Him; but at the same time there was a temptation to pride. He saw both pride and humility in them. I fear that when the Lord looks at His present disciples, unless they have learned the deeper lessons He taught, that He will find in them both pride and humility.

Jesus discerned pride in their glowing reports, and He said to them, Rejoice not that ye have great power, but rejoice that you are counted as disciples and have your names enrolled among the learners. Rejoice that you have started in the pathway of humility, for it is to the humble that God will give everything.

The main purpose that the Lord had in reference to the seventy was to rebuke pride and inspire and encourage them to practice humility. He saw Satan fall from heaven. The thing which made Satan the devil was pride. Satan had wonderful knowledge and wonderful ability. He was created one of God's highest creatures. No creature ever lived that had such spiritual knowledge, and yet we know it was pride that caused him to become a devil. In this connection Jesus says, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven. The only thing that can dethrone Satan is humility, the contrary thing to pride.

WORLD'S SUNDAY SCHOOL COMMISSION.—IV.

By C. E. Wilbur.

Approaching Japan.

The voyage of the Commission from San Francisco to Yokohama was, in a sense, one continuous welcome from Japan. On board the Tenyo Maru was Dr. Takamini, president of the Japanese Club of New York, who is an international figure, having been employed by both the United States and Japanese government in connection with pure foods. Whatever could be done to make the voyage pleasant, and to assure a royal welcome, he did. On his own initiative he cabled from Honolulu, announcing the coming of the party to his friends and business associates, bespeaking from them a true Japanese welcome. Two thousand miles out the following wireless message was received from the National Sunday School Association of Japan: "Japan Sunday School Association reciprocate cordial greetings, and extend to you all hearty welcome; hope to meet you off Yokohama harbor." One thousand miles out the following was received from the Shidzuoka Mission Board: "Welcome you to Japan." Gracious words were also received by wireless from Baron Shibusawa, by far the greatest business man in Japan, a veritable "general" of industry.

While we await the lifting of the fog of the outer harbor, there is time to write something about the voyage. It was one of the most remarkable ever made across the Pacific; that ocean truly exemplifying its name in the weather that prevailed during the seventeen days of sailing. Surely some one on land was praying for us.

On the ship were a dozen or more missionaries, besides the twenty-nine people of the Commission. The officers of the ship were kind enough to say that the influence of these two groups, acting together was great enough to prevent almost entirely the gambling, drinking and carousing that usually characterize the last two or three days of the voyage.

On the arrival at Yokohama the usual scene attendant upon such an arrival in occidental countries were enacted: the rush of reporters, the click of cameras, the shouting and handshaking of friends long separated, the joyous smile of missionaries on the wharf as they welcome reenforcements, all made up a marvelous picture. Not the least impressive evidence of the fact that the Orient is moving was the presence of a woman reporter—a Japanese lady. The coming of the Commission had been thoroughly heralded in Japan and the newspapers both in English and Japanese gave abundant space to the incidents attending the visit of the Commission, and also sympathetic and thoughtful educational comment, showing that they were fully aware of the object sought by the Commission.

Reception in Japan.

All doubt as to the cordial reception of the Commission—doubts that existed in the minds—were at once swept away. All Japan, in the persons of three great men, was there to extend the hand of cordial greeting. There was Mr. Asano, a representative of the older type of business and social life, who lives in great elegance surrounded by "Old Japan." Twice was his generous hospitality enjoyed by the Commission. There, also, was Baron Shibusawa, at type of the modern, active, alert, progressive business man, ready to seize upon anything, native or foreign, that will add to the commercial and moral prosperity of his country. His country villa was thrown open, and the party entertained with all the great resources at his command. There, also, Count Okuma, a type of the best and most progressive statesmen of modern Japan. He is called the "grand old man of Japan." By some he has been called "the Gladstone," by others, "the Cromwell" of Japan. He is living in elegant, but democratic retirement in his beautiful villa in Tokio, under the shadows of the great university of his own founding, that is attended by seven thousand students. These, according to his plans in founding the institution, are studying the problems of politics and society with the object that Japan may have trained men for the public service. In an interview the writer had with him, he said that America was doing more for the moral improvement of Japan than all the rest of the world, through the missionaries, and that Japan must look to America for all that is best in Western civilization. In a public address made before the Commission, he said, placing his hand on his head and heart in turn, "Japan may furnish me food for my head, but America must furnish me food for my heart," meaning that Japan lacked in its own native resources what America is trying to furnish through the missionaries. It is easy to see that, while he does not profess to be a Christian himself, he is favorably inclined to Christianity and Western culture. All these, together with the mayors of the cities, bankers, lawyers and professional and business men of all kinds, extend the most warm welcome to the Commission; and all gates in Japan were open.

But the most remarkable ovation yet given to the Commission, in many respects, was on the occasion of its visit to Sendai, a city two hundred and thirty-five miles to the north of Tokio. When the party left Tokio a deputy of the prefectural government attended it to Sendai. Ten miles before reaching the latter city a deputation of citizens boarded the train at 4:30 A. M. and extended the hand of welcome. At the depot, at 5 A. M., the mayor, a deputy from the office of the prefectural governor, were awaiting, with hundreds of distinguished citizens. Breakfast was provided, and the Commission was hastened forward on its sightseeing of Matsusima, the "Thousand Islands" of Japan. A steamer and barge were provided to convey the party through the islands, attended by lunch as a guard of honor. Here again the mayor and public officers of Matsusima met the party with the children of the public school, the most famous school of its kind in the empire. The priests of Shinto and Buddha invited the Commission to visit their temples and shrines, and attended it even to the wharf, amid the crack of rockets and ascending balloons.

On reaching Sendai, on the return, the same group was at hand to receive the party, only grown more dignified by the addition of the governor and thousands more of the citizens of that populous and thriving district.

The governor, mayor and Chamber of Commerce now took matters in hand and conducted the party about the city, furnishing conveyances at their own expense. The final public function was in the city "Social Hall," where the public officers and Commissioners listened to gracious words of welcome for the mayor, and responded as best their full hearts would permit. The officials then turned the party over to the missionaries and to the officers of the North Japan College for further entertainment. A large public meeting was held in the chapel of the girl's school, largely attended by Japanese.

How much of this gracious treatment is to be attributed to the natural courtesy of the Japanese, how much to the commercial impulse, and how much to their regard for the Americans, it is hard to tell, but it is remarkable as coming from the representatives of one religion to those of another, coming to them with the avowed purpose of introducing their own type of religion among them. Their leaders publicly acknowledged that their native religion, and education, to which they have trusted so much, have failed to do what they know ought to be done for their people. The work of the missionaries has favorably impressed them with Christianity, and they are inclined toward it. This will also in a large measure account for the reception given the Commission by leading men.

However, it is not to be expected that there will be any great rush to accept Christianity. That religion is in their minds on trial. They have been disappointed in the efforts of their own religious teachers, and now in education, pure and simple; and they have put themselves in the waiting attitude, to see what Christianity can do before they accept it, lest they shall be disappointed.

Hence it will appear that the thoughtless tourists, who bear the name of Christians, without being such, have done very much to retard the acceptance of Christ. From their point of view it is hard to understand how a man can live in a Christian country and not be a Christian.

The next letter will deal with the Sunday school and the problems of religious education in Japan.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

By Walter K. Towers, A. B., J. D., of the Michigan Bar.

Can one be cruel to an angleworm? Can one be cruel to an oyster? These queries are not part of any foolish question series, but are examples of the inquiries upon which courts of law have engaged themselves in their efforts to prevent unnecessary suffering to animals. As the Judge leaves the decision of these questions to the jury, one average citizen is as competent to answer them as another. It all depends upon what happened to the worm or the oyster, whether it hurt the victim, why it was done, the viewpoint of the person making the decision, and a few simple rules of law.

A recent case of simple nature has attracted public attention and drawn forth an interesting opinion from the judge. The case arose in New York and involved the question as to whether cruelty to turtles is cruelty to animals, and further, whether you can be cruel to a turtle. Sixty-five green turtles were shipped from Cuba on a steamship with their flippers perforated and tied together by means of ropes passing through the holes. The turtles were placed on their backs and so allowed to remain until the ship reached New York City. The captain of the steam-ship was prosecuted under the penal law of New Work, the charge being that he had caused these turtles unnecessary and unjustifiable pain and suffering while in transit.

The first objection made was that a turtle is not animal and so the act was not covered by the statute. The statute of New York defines an animal as not including the human race, but every other living creature. Notwithstanding that a turtle is a species of reptile, the court held that a turtle is included in the definition.

It was next considered as to whether unjustifiable pain was inflicted. On this point the court commented as follows:

"Hogs have the nose perforated and a ring placed in it; ears of calves are similarly treated; chickens are crowded into freight cars; codfish is taken out of the waters and thrown into barrels of ice and sold on the markets as 'live cod'; eels have been known to squirm in the frying pan; and snails, lobsters and crabs are thrown into boiling water. Irrespective of the devious means that might be adopted to destroy life before these cruelties are perpetrated upon them, still no one has raised a voice in protest. * * * The Emperor Augustus nearly exterminа-

ted peacocks to regale himself in Rome with their brains. Today the world would hold their death unjustifiable. Then again juries and magistrates of different localities, race, or education, with varying ideas of taste and cuisine, may hold widely divergent ideas as to whether the improved flavor of lobsters boiled alive makes such torture 'justifiable.' ''

The court left the matter to the jury. How would you decide the case?

The protection offered dumb animals against needless cruelty rests upon particular statutes as enacted by the legislatures of the various states, and not upon any general principle of English law, unless the act be done in public and so amount to a nuisance. Thus, just what may be punished as cruelty to animals in a particular state depends upon the wording of the laws of that state. Criminal statutes against cruelty to animals are virtually universal. These laws are generally of similar nature and usually apply to all animals other than humans, as does the New York statutes. The law does not, of course, prohibit all acts that cause animals pain or suffering, but only such as are unjustifiable and not necessary to the accomplishment of some lawful purpose. The butcher may kill the steer he has bought, and is not legally guilty of cruelty since his act is in the accomplishment of a lawful purpose. But if he slaughters the steer in a needlessly cruel manner he becomes guilty of cruelty to animals. Thus the butcher who dismembered hogs and plunged them into boiling water before they were dead, in the process of slaughtering and dressing them, was punished for cruelty to animals. Further, a needless, wanton killing, even though unaccompanied by any torture, has been punished as ''cruelty,'' and that though the animal was a chicken.

Cock fighting is quite generally held to be cruelty to animals within the terms of the ordinary statute. Releasing a captive fox and permitting it to be hunted by dogs, who tear and mangle it, has been punished as a criminal act. Shooting captive pigeons for sport or to improve marksmanship, has been held to constitute legal cruelty by some courts; but others have held that where the wounded birds were at once killed and with those shot dead used for food, the killing was justifiable. We need not remark that the familiar case of the old lady who protested against the shooting of clay pigeons as being cruelty to animals failed.

Overdriving or overloading horses and work-animals are familiar forms of cruelty and are frequently punished. Driving animals which are unfit to work is also cruelty. The cruelty may consist of a passive act of neglect as well as an active abuse or mistreatment. The man who left his horse hitched to the buggy, standing in the woods for over twenty-four hours, without food or water, was held guilty of cruelty. Transportation of animals for like periods of time without food, water or exercise, has also been held cruelty.

Some juries have ruled that dehorning cattle was cruelty, because unnecessary and unreasonable; but generally a different view is taken, and if the act is customary in the community, skillfully performed and for proper purposes, no legal liability attaches. Working a dog in a treadmill is not itself cruelty; but harsh and unreasonable treatment of a dog in a treadmill was held criminal.

Unnecessary and unreasonable beating is a commonly punished form of cruelty to animals. Poisoning is also cruelty where there is no justification for the action. Hacking a pig with an axe and permitting it to lie wounded without attention, pouring turpentine on a chicken and setting fire to it, and keeping a horse with a badly diseased leg in a pasture in which in order to support life by grazing it was inevitably put to great pain, have caused criminal convictions.

That unjustifiable killing is cruelty has been stated. One man killed chickens which had invaded his garden to eat his peas, and for doing so was subject to prosecution for cruelty to animals. The court stated that his proper remedy to protect his garden was to impound the chickens until their owner made good the loss or to sue for damages.

The owner of an animal, if cruel to it, is as liable as others under most of the statutes. One who advises the doing of a cruel act may be convicted as an aider and abettor. A man who incited a dog to attack and tear a cow was held guilty.

Prosecutions for cruelty are generally instituted and conducted by the public prosecutor. Any person, noticing an act of cruelty that should be redressed, may bring the matter to the attention of the prosecutor, who will then act.

I am sorry to report the burning of one of our churches last Friday night. It was struck by lightning and everything destroyed. This is a severe loss with a small membership. It was Mt. Carmel No. 2.

Fraternally,
A. D. Shelton.

Rehoboth Granville Ct.

It seems that we are putting on new life at Rehoboth. Our Sunday school is growing in interest and attendance. One phase of our work this year is, we have a new superintendent every quarter and they are all young men—this works well. We make it a point to get as many young people into active service as possible. We have just gotten fifty new song books; these are wide-a-wake Sunday school and revival songs. Yesterday was prayer meeting day too. Miss Jewel Floyd led this meeting. She took for her subject ''solid and sandy foundations.'' Her comments upon the subject showed earnest and careful study. We are getting ready for a Children's Day service; hope to have it the 2nd Sunday in June.

Mr. and Mrs. Gooch Cheatham's little daughter died a few days ago. Little Bessie was just twenty months old. The bereaved parents have our sympathy.

The Sunday School Convention in Greensboro was good. We hope to put into practice some of the things given us there. The music was good too. Messrs Tullar and Meredith had charge of the singing. We attended two of the Biederwolf services. On Sunday night Mr. Biederwolf preached from the text ''Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting.'' He used the ten commandments as weights. That was indeed a heart searching sermon. We hope that Mr. McCulloch will tell us more about these meetings.

The Sunday school at Grace church has an ''on-time'' plan which we would like to copy. Just before the school is called to order on-time buttons are distributed. This is a neat little button with the words, ''O. T. at the ringing of the bell.'' Wonder if there is a prize for the most buttons?

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

May 2nd I left High Point for Stokesdale to visit Flat Rock charge. I found Bro. W. F. Kennett at the station looking for me. We walked north about one fourth of a mile, and we reached a nice looking residence and we turned in to spend the night. I soon had the pleasure of meeting Mrs. Kennett, and it is useless for me to say to those who know her she is a kind, congenial lady and that she knows how to make one feel at ease in her home. She is indeed an ideal pastor's wife. On Saturday A. M. Bro. K. and I drove to Bethel about three miles to meet our appointment at 11 A. M.. We were greeted with a splendid congregation. Preaching over, and then came the good dinner such as the good sisters in Bethel community prepare. At 2 o'clock we met in the 2nd quarterly conference and all the business was carefully looked after in detail, and it was a very interesting conference. The attendance was good and the members were interested in the progress of the Ct. Reports were good. A committee was appointed to consider the advisability of building a church in Stokesdale. The stewards report on pastoor's salary was in advance of last year, and this made the pastor feel better, and all seemed to be encouraged to try to do better in the future.

Trough the kindness of Bro. J. B. Ogburn I was taken to the home of Mrs. J. L. Ogburn with whom he lives, to spend the night, which I did very pleasantly. I was pleased to meet the family and share their hospitalities.

At 11 o'clock on Sunday I preached to a splendid congregation at Flat Rock church; a very good service. After service a young Bro. Moore drove me back to the parsonage where I took dinner, and here I joined the pastor, who preached to the Bethel people at 11 A. M. In the afternoon we drove to Palestine for our 4 o'clock service where we held another good service, a very good attendance.

At 8 o'clock P. M. found ourselves at Gideon's Grove for our last service for tht day and for the charge. Almost a full house and had the very best of attention. The services were all well attended and I trust good will be the final result.

I spent Sunday night with Bro. Kernett and wife. On Monday A. M. I bade them good by and left her home. My claim over paid.

High Point, N. C., May 6, 1913.

C. A. Cecil.

May the 7th I left High Point for Albemarle, N. C., to visit Stanley charge. I reached the station at Albemarle at 6 o'clock. Bro. Reynolds met me, and we took supper with Mrs. E. A. Plyler. She is getting along nicely by the help of her children and they are all working or going to school. She has a good home, and located near our church. Bro. Plyler was a good financier, and left his wife and children a home.

At 8 o'clock I preached to a very good audience considering the show in town. This church is practically out of debt; they have paid $150 since Conference on the debt, pastor's salary and general interests for the year raised, and they are going to make an effort to paint and carpet the church before the year closes. This church has some good workers. We spent the night with Bro. Marshal Hatley

Thursday A. M. we drove to the parsonage, and at 11 o'clock there was a small congregation gathered at Friendship church for preaching; a very good service. I took dinner and spent the night with Bro. Reynolds, and met a few of the people I used to see in my boyhood days thirty odd years ago. On Friday A. M. at 6 o'clock we were on our journey toward Love's Grove, we reached there in time for 11 o'clock service. Not a large attendance. Service over and we took dinner with Bro. D. M. Dry. At this church they have purchased an organ recently. My next appointment was at Mill Grove about three miles away, we reached there on time and had an attentive little little band of hearers. They have paid about $170 for church improvement and there ought to be some more work done on the church. Bro. Reynolds and I spent the night with Bro. Marion Garmon. This completed my visit on the Stanley Ct.

The parsonage has been improved at a cost of about $225 since last Conference. This field is too much scattered for the pastor to develop it properly. Albemarle, Simpson's Grove and Friendship ought to be a charge and the pastor give his entire attention to these three points, provided Love's Grove and Mill Grove could be cared for; and I trust the pastors and people will take up the matter in their quarterly conference and be able to so arrange the work that all can be better cared for. Claim paid.

Bro. Reynolds conveyed me a distance of about twenty miles to Matthew's Station where I took the train for Rockingham charge. I thank him for his kindness. I left Matthews on Saturday A. M. 10:31 for Rockingham. I arrived at the station 12:52 found no one to meet me. I made my way up town and found Bro. Fitzwater who soon gave me dinner, and I saw several of the brethren on the street and later in the evening I went to W. T. Collins to spend the night; at 11 o'clock I preached to a good congregation at Pee Dee church and took dinner with Bro. Braswell; at 3 o'clock Rev. T. A. Plyler preached at Pee Dee as there was a special meeting in progress, a good meeting. Bro. Plyler and I drove to St. John's church and took supper with Bro. J. W. Woodard. At 8 o'clock we met a splendid congregation, and apparently the services were good. These churches are located in the mill sections, and there ought to be a splendid membership of mill people gathered from the number of people in these mills. The pastor needs to do a great deal of visiting and pastorate work in order to succeed in mill towns and this I learn has not been done lately on this charge, and this is no criticism or reflection on the former pastors; but this part of the work simply has not been done; but if we are to succeed in such places it is essential that pastors mingle with their people; this has been my experience and I have served mill people for twelve years and many of them are splendid people. If the pastor on this charge hopes to succeed and do good he will have plenty of work to do as all successful pastors have found.

There is a debt on St. John's church and I hope the pastor and the membership at Pee Dee and St. Johns will so plan and work that the debt may be settled in the near future. Claim over paid,

C. A. Cecil.

OUR FOREIGN MISSIONARY WORK

Still Running Ahead

Orders for the Children's Day supplies are in excess of those at this time last year, but the vast majority of the schools, as has been the case heretofore, have delayed sending their order early. This is a disadvantage to the schools in lessening the time for preparation, and it will add to our labors by large numbers of orders reaching us en masse later on.

Rest assured that every order will have careful attention, and be filled promptly. Let us have your order today. Do not put it off. Write your name and address plainly, please. Give the name of your Conference, and also the membership of your school, whether you use the order card we sent you or not.

Every Sunday school in the denomination ought to use the service prepared by the Board for our own schools, and remember they are sent free of all cost to our schools. We send beautifully illustrated music pamphlets, recitation sheets, and illustrated collection envelopes.

It is gratifying to state that our fiscal year which closed April 30th shows that the receipts of the Board of Foreign Missions are larger than our last fiscal year from both the Assessment and the Children's Day offering, but unfortunately there was a decrease in the Special Contributions owing to the fact that the Christmas offering from the Sunday schools and contributions through the Laymen's Missionary Movement were less. However, there is a net increase for the year which is encouraging.

The Board's Annual Report is to be published in pamphlet form this year, and much information will be imparted to the church therein.

This Is Special

The church knows that we are still in the period of the year when receipts are totally inadequate to meet the Board's obligations. Practically every Board in America has this unpleasant experience. Our Board needs within the next two weeks the assessment from every charge in every Conference which can possibly be secured. Brother pastor, I appeal to you in the name of our Lord and His great work to do your utmost at once to get the assessment for foreign missions, and send it to me without a day's delay.

I'm Moving Slowly, but Moving

A Baltimore lady said she liked my way of asking for office equipment, and sent one dollar on the Board's new typewriter. We need now just nine dollars, and it will be mortifying if I have to ask for this small amount again. Send your part, and any excess will be applied on Multigraph.

We rejoice in a new oak type writer table, and a new oak type writer chair. The first from a Baltimore friend, the chair from a loyal man in Delaware.

Nothing was received for Multigraph, and yet it would be of greatest help in this work which suffers for the want of more secretarial labor. A Multigraph, a Multigraph, A MULTIGRAPH! Who will give us one?

AS TO THE PANAMA CANAL.

The undersigned, members of the Board of Trustees of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, invite the attention of their fellow-citizens to the following statement concerning the grave international discussion which has arisen over the exemption of American coastwise vessels from tolls on the Panama Canal:

On November 18, 1901, a treaty "to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans" was concluded between the United States and Great Britain, at the request and on the initiative of the United States. The essential provisions of the treaty were (1) that "the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States," and that "the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the providing for the regulation and management of the canal"; (2) that "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these Rules, on terms of entire equality"; (3) that the plant for operating the canal and the canal itself shall be "neutralized," and shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents; (4) that the United States shall be at liberty to maintain an adequate police along the canal; and (5) that "no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country of countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall effect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the High Contracting Parties under the present Treaty."

The concluding of the treaty—commonly spoken of as Hay-Pauncefote Treaty—was a necessary preliminary to the construction of any Isthmian canal by the United States or under its auspices; because by a previous convention between the same parties concluded in April, 1850, the United States and Great Britian had bound themselves that neither would "ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over" an Isthmian canal or "maintain any fortifications commanding the same," or exercise dominion over "any part of Central America." The contracting parties further agreed to protect the canal from "interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation," and to guarantee its neutrality.

This convention—commonly spoken of as the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty—made at the request and on the initiative of the United States, established the general principle of the neutralization of any Isthmain canal which might be constructed a principle which the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty reaffirmed.

The great design of both treaties, that of 1850 and that of 1901, was to promote the construction and maintenance of a ship-canal between the two oceans, for "the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all," and to protect the neutralized canal effectively when built. In urging on the British Government the making of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, the American negotiator said to Lord Palmerston: "The United States sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication (that is, a canal or railroad), and their sincere wish, if it should be found practicable, was to see it dedicated to the common use of all nations on the most liberal terms and a footing of perfect equality for all. That the United States would not, if they could, obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway which naturally belonged to all mankind." This statement expresses accurately the avowed intention and resolve of the United States from 1850 to 1912 concerning any Panama Canal. All treaties on the subject are based on this intention and resolve, many times reiterated by official representatives of the American Government.

In the summer of 1912, Congress passed a bill fixing the tolls to be paid for passing through the Panama Canal—constructed by the United States and approaching completion—but added a section which exempted American coastwise vessels from paying tolls, thus giving American coasting vessels a privilege which no other vessels would enjoy, and diminishing the probable income of the canal in operation.

After an interval of several moments, Great Britian has presented to the Government of the United States a protest against the exemption of American coastwise vessels on two principal grounds. First, that such an exemption is inconsistent with the provision of the Hay- Pauncefote Treaty that the canal shall be open to vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality; and secondly, that the exemption of American coastwise vessels would inevitably tend to increase the charges on all other vessels using the canal, to the disadvantage of all other nations in comparison with the United States, a disadvantage which might increase in the future, since the higher the rates the greater would be the privilege of exemption from paying them.

The British arguments are calm and free from exaggeration, and prove that the action of Congress in exempting American coastwise vessels from the payment of canal tolls involves a construction of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty which is fairly open to question. A difference has arisen concerning the interpretation of a treaty.

On the 4th of April, 1908, the United States and Great Britain made another treaty in which they agreed that "differences which may arise of a legal nature or relating to the interpretation of treaties existing between the two Contracting Parties and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, shall be referred to the Permanent Court of Arbritration established at The Hague by the Convention of the 29th of July, 1899, proving, nevertheless, that they do not affect the vital interests, the independence, or the honor of the two Contracting States, and do not concern the interests of third Parties," The question whether American coastwise vessels shall pay tolls for passing through the canal cannot be said to effect either nation's vital interests or independence, or the "honor" of either of the two governments. Clearly, a difference relating to the interpretation of a treaty has arisen between two governments which have agreed to submit such differences to The Hague Court of Arbitration.

In a special sense the United States is bound to observe faithfully and without question the treaty of April, 1908; for the United States has been among governments the great advocate of arbitration, has practiced it in important cases, and has urged it strongly on all other governments. The United States cannot refuse to arbitrate the difference which has arisen concerning the proper interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, without urning its back on a very honorable chapter in its own history, and damaging throughout the world the cause of free institutions. The republic ought to be the most scrupulous of all governments in the exact observation of treaty obligations. It must be absolutely faithful to its word, even to its own hurt.

Assuming that the difference which has arisen concerning the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty must be arbitrated unless the cause of the difference can be withdrawn, we desire to urge on our fellow-citizens the expendiency of promptly repealing that action of Congress which gave rise to the difficulty.

Granting that some American shipping interest might be benefited by the exemption of coastwise vessels from canal tolls, since the term coastwise now includes voyages half round the globe, America surely has much larger interests which would be greatly served by the prompt abandonment of any interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty against which Great Britain can enter a reasonable protest. The United States has an immense interest in the sanctity of contracts, and in the strict observation of all international conventions and treaties. It has an immense interest in the faithful observance of any treaty between two or more nations which has been entered into "for the benefit of mankind." It is true that in time past treaties have not been strictly observed; that others have been suffered to lapse quietly; and that some have been violated by one or more of the parties, too impatient to wait for a new convention. Despotic and monarchial governments have often sinned in these respects ,and republics have been accused of like conduct. All the more reason that the American Republic should do no act under a treaty which can be even questioned by candid and honorable men. In the efficacy of international agreements lies the chief hope of the world for progressive civilization.

The further promotion, in a method of uncertain value, of the interests of American coastwise shipping, interests already protected by the possession of a complete monopoly as against all nations, is a doubtful matter of commercial improvement. The whole country considered, the pecuniary advantage would not be large, and might easily be completely offset by accompanying disadvantages; but whatever advantage might come to this well-protected industry, it would be as nothin compared with the interests of the whole United States in carrying out the noble work of building a canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Ocean for the common advantage of all nations.

The greatest interest of the United States as a free nation is to represent worthily before the world the principles of civil and religious liberty and the public efficiency and well being which those principles develop, and thereby to promote the adoption of these principles the world over. This is a great material as well as a great moral interest. In comparison with this large interest, the interest of the United States in its coast wise vessels sinks into insignificance. By securing the repeal of that part of the act of Congress on the Panama Canal which provide for the exemption of American coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, the American people would embrace a precious opportunity to prove that they understand their highest interest, and recognize their duty to promote it "for the benefit of mankind."

ASHEVILLE'S SPRING TIME.

Just a glimpse of Asheville's scenery,
In the "Land of the Sky,"
Where the birds sing and twitter;
O, it draws our hearts nigh.
I view from my window,
Some of nature's new dress;
The fresh air, and gentle breeze,
Fills one with real zest.
The eastern horizon is bedecked
With mountaintops variagated;
The springtime's numerous tints,
In sunlight, are gloriously radiated.
There's a bare spot on each mountain,
All covered with grass so green;
Hamilton's residence on "Beaumont,"
One on "Lookout," and Henry's between.
Five beautiful mountain-tops in view,
With only three homes to greet
The grand and glorious atmosphere,
So refreshing, so pure and sweet.
The forest gleams with lovely colors,
With here and there a dark pine
With only enhances the beauty,
And makes the whole thing sublime
Many homes now meet the eye
As it descends to the valley;
And to a true lover of nature,
Surely, all this is no folly.
We are glad for folks to come,
And make us a visit;
We believe you will find good fun,
If you look on our little city.

The President's Visit

We always look forward with pleasure to the visit of the president. President Cecil came to see us on the afternoon of May 2nd, and began his work Saturday, the third, at Bethel, preaching at 11 A. M. and holding the quarterly conference in the afternoon. We had a fine attendance; splendid sermon, a good dinner, good reports and a most interesting conference. Bros. J. B. Ogburn and N. W. Gordon are the nominees for delegate to annual conference.

Sunday

Sunday was a full day and for the first time in the history of Flat Rock Circuit each church had preaching on the same Sunday. The pastor filled his regular appointment at Bethel while President Cecil preached at Flat Rock, and then at 4 P. M. the president preached at Palestine and at 8 P. M. at Gideon's Grove. We had good congregations at all the churches.

The Ladies' Aid Society

The Ladies' Aid Society met last Monday at the parsonage and had the best attendance yet. This society has been and is a great help to the church.

Generosity

Our people continue to show their love and interest in us by generous contributions. We can not now mention names and articles. We are too far behind to undertake to catch up at one writing. We have no fear of Peter Slewfoot, however. Peter can do as he likes.

William Canada

Among those who were present at our quarterly conference last Saturday was Brother William Canada, of Summerfield. On last Tuesday Bro. Canada had been preparing his melon patch and came to the house at 11 o'clock. After he had entered the house Sister Canada heard him fall and running to him found him dying. He lived only a few minutes, passing away before help could be summoned.

Bro. Canada was nearly 74 years old. He leaves a wife and four children. The children are all married and three of them live out of the State and were not present at the funeral. The children are by his first wife. Some twenty years ago he was married to Miss Lavinia Dwiggins, who survives him.

Brother and Sister Canada held their church membership at Bethel and have been among the faithful ones there. The funeral service was held in the old Hopewell church three miles from Summerfield, and was conducted by the writer.

Brother Canada had held his membership at Hopewell until the church went down. For a number of years he was the only male member. It was here that his first wife and his four children were buried and here we buried him also. Wm. Canada was a Confederate veteran and was in the service four years. I have been told and it has been said that he fired the last cannon at the Battle of Appomattox. He was a good citizen, kind neighbor, loving husband, indulgent father and a faithful Christian.

Sister Canada is left in great loneliness and in deep sorrow. May the "God of all comfort" be with and sustain her.

Reminiscent

Last week on reading the beautiful tribute to the memory of Wm. A. Carter by Rev. J. S. Williams and Mr. Ed. Swain the reminiscent mood took hold upon me. I thought of my first pastorate, on Buncombe, while Moton was pastor on Ivey circuit and I remembered spending a night in the home of Wm. A. Carter and recalled some of our conversation. The home of John A. Carter also came into my mind. He kept a public inn at Democrat. I remember taking supper there one evening. A large red pickled beet was about the center of the table. Among the guests was a northern man and pointing at the pickled beet he asked, "Mrs. Carter, what do you call the big red one?"

Then I thought of Rev. J. P. Eller, of Buncombe, a man of a great heart and of mighty power in evangelistic work, and of his brother, A. C. Eller, so powerful in prayer, and of "Aunt" Harriet Eller, who was kind as a mother to me, and I thought of the great meetings we held and of the towering mountains, of the beautiful mountain streams and I said, That is a great country—"The Land of the Sky," and those were great days. The man who can't preach there had better quit trying to preach and go into the butcher business or some other calling.

Halifax Circuit

I would like to give a synopsis of our work on Halifax Circuit, though I am quite sure it will not be interesting to Peter Slewfoot.

The president's visit was a great inspiration, both to pastor and people. He not only preached some splendid sermons, but reminded us of several things people ought to know about how to run a church.

Our all-day S. S. Rally in April has meant a great deal to the Sunday school interest. Especially has there been a wonderful improvement at Bethesda, where the regular attendance has almost been quadrupled.

The congregations for the past month at the regular preaching services have been unusually large. At every church on the circuit the pastor has preached a special sermon on some phase of the call to Christian service with especial emphasis on the call to the ministry. There is already one young man from this charge, N. M. Harrison, Jr., in College preparing for the ministry and another young man is thinking seriously along the same line and we are hoping that there may be others who will hear the call.

Soon the sound of the hammer will be heard at every church on the work. Lee's Chapel has the money in hand to improve the pulpit, Ringwood voted a few days ago to paint inside and carpet the pulpit; Eden is to spend a considerable sum soon in building recess pulpit, painting and plastering, Union is in the midst of a campaign to raise funds with which to build a new church, while Bethesda voted last Sunday to re-paint the outside of the building right away.

A few weeks ago we organized at Bethesda a Baraca Class, Philathea Class and a Teacher Training Class, the latter to be taught by the pastor during the week. Twelve members joined.

Mrs. Mamie Neville has been at Richmond for several weeks with her father, Mr. T. H. Taylor, who is there for treatment. We are glad to hear that Bro. Taylor is improving.

Sometime ago we took a census of Halifax Circuit and here is what we found: There are sixty-four homes on the circuit where there are two or more Methodist Protestants. Fifty-seven families take the M. P. Herald and three take The Methodist Protestant.

The people continue to remember us kindly with their gifts and we thank them.

J. E. Pritchard.

Charlotte, Richland Circuit

We have just closed a very successful meeting. Though it was right in the midst of corn planting, nobody said it was the wrong time, and that we ought not to have had a meeting then. Fear of measles and smallpox kept some away; other sickness hindered some. All things considered, attendance was good. The church was much revived; a number professed conversion. There were six additions to the church.

Our Conference Evangelist was our help.

C. H. Whitaker.

ANDERSON AND YARBOROUGH NOTES

Third Sunday in April was a good day for Fairview church. I think we made a forward step. Mr. Andrew Pickens, of that community, made a fine talk on Christian Endeavor work. The pastor preached, after which we organized a good, large Christian Endeavor Society. Sunday evening the Ladies' Aid had charge of the service and made us all feel that they too were of some force in the church. A full house enjoyed the program. Rev. Bab, of First Baptist church of Easley, addressed us on Missions. Readings by Miss Willie Allgood and Mr. R. F. Wyatt. Collection was $10.00.

The Sunday school has grown rapidly in the past few months. Our superintendent, H. A. Foster, is awake to our Sunday school needs. Second Sunday will be Christian Endeavor day with Liberty Hill church. The work will be represented by Miss Mary Leslie and Mr. Andrew Pickens, as I will be away at that time. We expect to start societies in all our churches within three weeks.

First Sunday at Yarborough was a good day in some ways. The largest congregation since I have been here, and most interest manifested. One convert at Harmony church Sunday night.

We enjoyed the Bible Conference held in Atlanta Bralton tabernacle in March; heard G. Campbell Morgan, Weatherspoon, Vance, Bralton, and others.

We enjoyed a trip to Charleston in April and now on our way to the mountains. These outings from our work have helped me. I have missed no appointments.

Bro. Dan Yarborough has returned home from the hospital, but is still sick. Bro. Grover Watson, who was thrown from buggy and received a fractured skull, has returned also after an operation, and is gaining ground real fast. He was unconscious for eight days.

W. A. Lamar.

Randleman Circuit.

Our second quarterly conference met May 3rd, 5 o'clock P. M. All the churches were represented. Fullest attendance we have had at any quarterly meeting since we have been on this work. Business was gone through in perfect harmony. Reports were good. We are moving along slowly but surely; we hope for a good year.

Pastor has been suffering much for the past month with his eyes which has hindered some in reading and preparing for service; however, we have met all the appointments up to the present. Our congregations have been increasing all the year. They have been better than last year up to the present.

We are planning to hold Memorial Services, old people's day, or some special service at our churches and have all day service and spend one day together at church and on the church grounds. This we believe will be helpful as we will have time to mingle together as brethren and sisters and get better acquainted with each other.

FROM REV. D. A. BRASWELL

May 3rd, I went to Bro. C. H. Whitaker to help him in a revival meeting at Charlotte Church. The meeting began Sunday morning, May 4th, and closed Thursday night of the 8th. The writer did most of the preaching. The meeting resulted in ten conversions and six accessions, and a good revival among the members. All this teaches us that we do not have to wait until August to get people saved. I learned that Bro. Whitaker has a strong hold upon his people, and he is doing a good work. He deserves the love and hearty cooperation of his people. I thank Brother Whitaker and his kind people for the substantial help they gave me.

I am at Charlotte, N. C., during this week, doing pastoral visiting during the day and preaching in the M. E. Church at Belmont at night. We are having good services. Our church interest is growing. We thank Bro. Bradley and his good people for the use of their church. We have a live Sunday school. We are looking forward with delight to the coming of Bro. Cecil on May 19. We continue to find more Methodist Protestants. We need two M. P. churches here. We have people in all parts of the town. Brethren, pray for us.

D. A. Braswell.

FROM LOCAL REPORTERS

MILL-GROVE

Our Sunday school is doing very well; we have a better attendance than we had during the winter.

Our President preached an excellent sermon for us on the 9th inst. Our pastor, Rev. G. L. Reynolds, filled his regular appointment Sunday. The service was enjoyed by all present.

We intend to have Children's Day as soon as it can be gotten up. We are having cottage prayer meetings on Sunday p. m., and think they are enjoyed by all, as they all seem interested.

Nealie Fincher, Reporter.

HICKORY RIDGE, FORSYTH CIRCUIT

Our pastor, Bro. A. O. Lindley, was with us the second Sunday and preached to us from Ecclesiastes 3:11, He hath made everything beautiful in his time. Bro. Lindley made this plain to us. He caused his hearers to think and to realize that God did make everything beautiful. We are very glad to say that Bro. Lindley will be with us, for this quarter and possibly longer, every second and fourth Sunday. We feel that greater good may be accomplished by having a service twice a month instead of only once.

Quarterly conference was held at our church on Saturday before the second Sunday in April. The usual business was transacted though the attendance was not very large on account of the inclement weather.

We are having a very good Sunday school at present. Our township S. S. convention will be held the first Sunday in July at Antioch M. E. Church.

The work on the parsonage for this circuit is in progress now; we hope to have a home for our pastor and family before a great while.

Annie Sullivan, Reporter.

SHOALS CHURCH, PINNACLE AND MT. ZION

On account of sickness our pastor, Bro. Hunter, failed to meet his regular appaintment yesterday. Hope he will soon recover. Our S. S. is moving on reasonably well, but not what it might be if more would attend and take an interest.

Mrs. Virginia E. Starling, one of the oldest members of Shoals church, died May 4th. Burial services were conducted at the home by Rev. R. P. Coram, pastor of the Baptist church, Bro. Hunter being unable to attend. She was a quiet, unassuming woman, had been afflicted for a long time. Her husband preceded her several years ago. Three children and several grand children survive.

Another one of the community's oldest citizens passed away May 8th in the death of Mr. Adam Scott. He was a member of the Baptist church and a highly respected citizen. Ten children and several grandchildren survive.

Ira O. Hauser, Reporter.

CHARLOTTE, RICHLAND CIRCUIT

Our protracted meeting began Sunday, May 4th, closing on Thursday night following. Although the time seemed short we were all wonderfully blessed. Ten were saved and six were received into the church. Bro. D. A. Braswell was the helper of our faithful pastor, Bro. C. H. Whitaker. It

HOW THE PREACHER WON JUDGE RANKIN.

"Hello, Judge!"

"Hello, parson! Come in. Have a chair. Fine morning, isn't it? By the way, they say you had a warm time in the council last night. How was it? Tell me about it."

"Rather warm, sure as you're alive. We thought we had sufficient names and some to spare; but that committee is as 'wet' as a soaked rag and has about as much conscience. Had it not been for Mr. Wilkins they would have declared every 'dry' man in town ineligible to vote, I suspect."

"Mr. Wilkins held them level, did he?"

"Indeed he did. It is almost unusual to find an attorney who has the backbone to risk his reputation in this local-option fight. But Mr. Wilkins doubtless feels his reputation is made. He tells me he has voted prohibition ever since the movement was inaugurated."

"Mr. Wilkins would doubtless have made a better living had he not been so radical, however."

"How about his character, Judge Rankins?"

"Well-I-I-I, you know we lawyers are not supposed to look deeper than the surface. Facts and results are the things in which we deal."

"'Facts and results,' you say, Judge; and I suppose your estimation of them depends largely on the seer's viewpoint. The 'facts' in this case are that Mr. Rankin did his duty, paying no heed to the sneers of the mayor, the frowns of the committee, nor to the cursings of the chief of police."

"Well, you must have had an interesting time!"

"Indeed we did. The council chamber was filled with 'wets,' some of them half drunk. They swore and smoked and spit until the atmosphere was both fetid and livid. The mayor not only permitted but joined in the cursings. There is scarcely an honorable citizen in town who was not viciously maligned. When Uncle John Meredith was presenting the petition, the chief of police interrupted him by openly calling him a liar."

"Did the mayor allow such a thing to go unreprimanded?"

"He did until I called upon his honor to permit one who was speaking in behalf of the people to be heard without being insulted."

"Had to call the court to order, did you?" laughed Rankin.

"Yes; and when I did the chief walked behind my chair, clutched my collar and hissed between his teeth, 'You black devil, I'll get you for that; see if I don't.'"

"What did you do?"

"Never recognized the fact that he was in existence."

"Well, the petition was granted and the time of election set, I understand."

"Yes, that's the 'result.' We thought at one time they were going to throw out sufficient names to lose the petition, but we detailed four men to slip out and hustle as many more as could be gotten. Then I had up my sleeve forty-four names, those who have signed with the direct understanding that their names would be used only in case of extreme necessity. So when we filled up the first big gap they had made, I quietly remarked, 'Just as well be square. We've lots more where those came from.' The bluff worked and they concluded we had more names lying back than we really had."

"And so the fight is really on. Parson, you'd make a politician if you'd bury your conscience. You've got the head all right. You're always ready for the next move, and seem to see what the other fellow is going to do before he does it. You ought to be the leader of this local-option-campaign."

"Do you really think so?"

"Yes, I do. But I suppose your crowd will put some pious old jay, who doesn't know the Civil War is over, at the head of your forces. That's the trouble with your temperance people. You never get the right man to the front. And when you do, the whole bunch will lie down on the leader the minute the fight gets a bit warm, and the political pot begins to boil."

"Not always, Judge. There are some men who will stand by the guns without being paid for it."

"Not many, I tell you. If such fellows as you would go to the front, and we could depend upon piety for loyalty, I think I'd have cut my crowd long years ago. But what's the use? The temperance fellows throw you down, and there you are! Influence lost, position gone, and whiskey grinning in your face. You're right morally, but you can't win Your men won't stick. They'll lie down before the campaign's half over. You'll see, I tell you—

"Hold on, Judge. Let me say what I came to say. What you say is true to history as far as this old town is concerned. But, Judge, I came into this office this morning for the purpose of changing the course of history."

"What do you mean, Halliday? You're going to turn the world upside down, are you? Well, you are like all the other preachers. You think because a thing ought to be, therefore it will be. But I tell you conditions are what men make them; and the majority are against you. It's no use—"

"Wait, Judge; listen to me. You said if I were at the head of the local option forces you'd have some faith in the movement. I appreciate the compliment, and now I want to say that I am the head. They organized last night at the Christian Church and I was chosen chairman of the campaign—"

"Good for—"

"Hold on, please. Let me finish. I did not come to tell you that, except incidentally. This is what I want to say. With you at the head of the politics of this thing we can win; and I came to ask you to organize this movement politically. I'll take the publicity end, and together we'll win."

The Judge gasped, then frowned. Though they belonged to different churches, yet he and Mr. Halliday had been friends. The judge was a man, every inch of him. And yet that strange inconsistency that is found in many a good man was an element of the judge's character. He was superintendent of one of the largest Bible schools in the city. As such he had been a success, according to the readings of ten years ago. But for the last eighteen months his influence had been waning and his Bible school had been shrinking. The judge himself was on the point of resigning. He was also the leader of the dominant party in the politics of his county and congressional district. Six years had he been on the bench. This honor was handed him by the political machine of which he was head. A candidacy for Congress was the plum they were offering him at this particular time. While there were many good men voting with the judge's party, yet to say that his party was dominated and controlled by the saloon element of the county and district is but to state a fact that is patent in more places than in Johnson County. Here, when Mr. Halliday said to the Judge that he wanted him to organize and conduct the political end of this local option fight it took his breath. "The nerve of the preacher!" thought the judge. Everybody knew the judge was a manager of the "wets" campaign two years before, and to him was credited at that time the defeat of the "drys" more than to any other force. In fact, it was said, and undisputed, that whatever Rankins wanted politicall they could have; for ever since they had sent the old leaders Henderson and Harnley, to the "pen" for embezzlement the Rankin crowd had had undisputed sway. The judge was an organizer and his brother was an excellent lieutenant.

Mr. Halliday was a newcomer to the city; but he and Judge Rankin had been friends from the start. A virile man was Halliday. He was kindly disposed toward all men, even to his bitterest enemies, but he had firm convictions on moral questions. His backbone had lime in it. When he wanted to say reformatory things from the pulpit it never occured to him to ask old Elder Jenkins, the board of trade manager, nor Sister Buzzabout, whether he dared. He simply said them and expected results.

He had not been in the city two months until he began preaching reform. And the strange thing about it all was that those whom he criticized the most unmercifully came to hear him the most eagerly. He was no fanatic. He was a man of clear convictions and sane judgment. The men of the city were not long discovering that his suggestions were practical and his judgment reliable. His fearless, sensible, manly frankness both pleased and attracted the judge, and he had openly said: "Halliday is my kind of a preacher. There'll be something doing if he stays in this town a year."

And so it had come about that a fast friendship had sprung up between the judge and the preacher, for they were not only attracted by each other's talents, but by that instinct in man that enables one to sense a real man when he meets him and compels him to give of his nature for what he receives. This is not the kind of friendship that is secured by bargain-counter methods, but the give-and-take, help-yourself kind.

So, when the preacher made known his errand, the judge turned pale. He leaned forward in a chair and pulled at his collar, as if it was too tight. His frame was quivering with excitement and his hand was visibly trembling.

"Man!" cried the judge, "do you know how much the doing of what you ask would cost me?"

"Indeed I do. I thought it all out last night. It will cost you your congressional ambitions, the confidence of your political friends, the machine which you have so successfully built up, the destruction of clients and the sacrifice of an income for at least three years. It will cost you your social position and your financial prestige. Your very friends will turn against you. Your brethren in the church will call you a traitor and fear to trust you. You will be accused of hypocrisy for selfish ends. It will cost you days and nights of tears and anguish and loneliness. Judge few men are worthy to pay such a price for the saving of a county. You are worthy and you are able to make the sacrifice. Here is my hand in this work no matter what comes. Say you will do it."

"And in the face of all you have said you still have the nerve to ask me to thus slaughter myself?"

"I am not asking you to slaughter yourself, Judge. God knows I'm trying to save you. You are too good to allow this whisky-guzzling crowd to carry you on their shoulders and at the same time sap your manhood like vampires. Come, Judge, cut the saloon and stand out and open for political righteousness as well as Sunday school piety."

The judge turned and gazed out of the window, seeing nothing. Five long minutes passed in which neither said a word. Finally he turned to the preacher and said: "Halliday, you are a brave and true man." Rising and offering his hand, he continued: "Come to-morrow evening at 5 o'clock and you shall have my answer."

Promptly on the hour the preacher returned. The judge's face was flashed and his eyes were shining from victory in the hardest battle he had ever fought. He grasped the preacher's hand and in a quiet tone slowly said: "Halliday, I'm with you, and—I—will—pay—the—price." And he paid it to the last farthing.—J. K. Shellenberger, in Christian Men.

AVOID TEMPTATION.

Temptations are of all kinds—those that come as penalty, and those that lie in opportunity. An immediate and awful consequence of wrong-doing is its creation of new temptation. This new form of temptation, new especially because of its power, is due in part to familiarity which dulls the sense of antagonism; in part to habit which quickly fastens chains upon us; to the love of ease which makes us unwilling long to struggle; to loss of shame which so quickly follows undetected transgression; to sophistry with which an unquiet and disregarded conscience soon surrenders; and to loss of moral sensitiveness which marks the gradual but sure surrender of the whole nature to a form of transgression which has become as easy as it is seductive.

We find ourselves in an atmosphere of temptation. We say: "Others do it." We give away to temper, or passsion, or the habit of being cross, etc. We, in one direction or another, make temptation for ourselves, solely because we have not resisted the beginning of evil; and this whole line of conduct and relationship comes as a penalty for the initial surrender.

Now, with this form of temptation we may, perhaps, say that God has nothing to do. We make it for ourselves, and His sole connection with it is that He has placed us in the universe, and given us individual powers which make it possible for us to do what we will. We have to form our own character. Not even God can do this for us. This comes as a part of our own work, which we cannot charge upon God, but over which we may well believe God grieves.

It is of no use to ask God's help while we continue in such a course. We are doing what we want to do, whether we know it or not, and the petition which Jesus has given us in the prayer, "Leads us not into temptation," is not for men and women who deliberately make temptation for themselves, and love it.—Henry A. Stimson.

THE BIBLE.

The book contains the mind of God, the state of man, the way of salvation, the doom of sinners, and happiness of believers. Its doctrine is holy, its precepts are binding, its histories are true, and its decisions are immutable. Read it to be wise, believe it to be safe, and practice it to be holy. It contains light to direct you, food to support you, and comfort to cheer you. It is the traveler's map, the pilgrim's staff, the pilot's compass, the soldier's sword, and the Christian's charter. Here heaven is opened, and the gates of hell disclosed. Christ is its grand subject, our good its design, and the glory of God its end. It should fill the memory, rule the heart, and guide the feet. read it slowly, frequently, prayerfully. It is a mine of wealth, health to the soul, and a river of pleasure. It is given you here in this life, will be opened at the judgment, and is established forever. It involves the highest responsibility, will reward the greatest labor, and condemn all who trifle with its sacred contents.

FAIRVIEW

Our Sabbath school is progressing very nicely at present. But we wish our school increased, and are glad to welcome any who may come. But we should not wait to be invited, but consider this our duty to Him who cares for us.

We have preaching service twice a month, the first Sabbath at 11 o'clock, the third at 3 o'clock. Sunday, May 4, a very interesting and helpful sermon was rendered by our pastor, Rev. Edward Suits, from the Crucifixion of our Savior. In this discourse he very plainly put forth the leading sins of the people, leading up to the Crucifixion; namely, jealousy, envy and covetousness. Also these three sins were ascribed to the people of today, showing they were the root causes of Sabbath breaking, thefts, murders, and so on. He very urgently pleaded with the people to turn from this way of crucifying the Savior anew. Following this the Lord's Supper was commemorated. We are glad some partook of this ordinance that had not for years.

On Saturday night before the first Sunday we held our second quarterly conference. Quite a number from Concord attended. Our people were fairly well represented, but could have been much better.

Some of our faithful members have been unable to be with us in some time, but our prayers and God's blessings are theirs.

We are being urged upon to subscribe for our church paper. This would be one wise step for our people; not only would we receive enlightenment concerning the Christian work, but would be spiritually benefitted thereby. Subscription price, $1.00 per year.

Our church has recently been painted and papered, and are now planning for a new musical instrument which we hope soon to have. Reporter.

Burlington.

Our Sunday school attendance yesterday was 214 and the offering amounted to $38.73. The Junior Philathea class had charge of the exercises of the Sunday school, and rendered their program in a splendid and creditable manner.

The exercises were enjoyed very much by all, and the Junior Philathea class is receiving congratulations upon the splendid work they have accomplished since they first organized eleven months ago. In the matter of finances, they have raised about $108.00. This is an example of what can be done among the young girls of a Sunday school by being organized and having a good teacher and leader.

We shall not fail to make mention of the successful play entitled "Rebecca's Triumph," given by the Philathea class of our Sunday school on Friday evening May 2nd. The proceeds amounted to about $50.00, of which about $40.00 was net profit. This class is doing much financially in canceling the indebtedness on our Sunday school rooms.

On Sunday afternoon, May 4th, at the home of Bro. T. T. Stafford, Miss Mary Cole, one of our most prosperous Sunday school scholars, and a member of our church, was happily united in marriage to Mr. Adolphus Moser, a most prosperous farmer living near here. They have the best wishes of the Sunday school and church for a long and happy life.

We were pleased to report that, in the recent municipal election held in our city, Bro. J. Ed. Moore was elected Mayor of the city of Burlington, receiving the largest majority given in several years. Bro. H. C. Stout was reelected a member of the Board of city aldermen. Bro. Ed. Thomas was elected a member of the Board also. Bro. T. Jackson Isley is Sanitary Policeman of the city. We are well represented on the official board of the city.

The writer had the privilege of attending Sunday school and preaching service at the Glen Raven M. P. church yesterday. This school is small in number, but is accomplishing something in the Sunday school work. Bro. R. G. Hornaday, the able superintendent, is a tireless worker, and, under his wise management, the the school surely will prosper and grow. Rev. T. A. Sikes, of the M. E. church, filled the pulpit at the preaching hour. Glen Raven is a young little cotton mill village, and, with such enthusiastic workers as Bros. Hornaday, Scott, Humble, and their pastor, Rev. Mr. Curry, great progress may be expected and much and lasting good accomplished.

Bro. L. W. Holt, our assistant superintendent, and teacher of the Baraca class, was absent from Sunday school yesterday. He was on the program and delivered an address before the Sunday school convention held in Coble's Township, Alamance county.

Our young friend and brother, T. Paul Davis, who is the official reporter of the Herald, is a member of the Senior class of the city graded school this year, and will graduate this month with high honors. Paul is a very bright and promising young man, and we predict a most successful career for him in whatever vocation in life he may choose.

Mitchel's Grove, Guilford Ct.

As I have never had anything to say in the Herald I wish to say a few words in regard to our church work. Our pastor, Bro. McCulloch, filled his regular appointment Sunday to a very good and attentive congregation, preached a very interesting and helpful sermon. There were two new additions to our church, Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Nance. We give them a hearty welcome to join in working for the Lord. We appreciate having Bro. McCulloch with us in our home Sunday night. We always feel spiritually blessed and strengthened to have our pastor with us.

Our Sunday school is doing very nicely. We have for our Bible class Mr. W. L. Kivett as teacher. He is not a member of our church, but he is a good teacher and takes great interest in the S. S. All of our teachers are good and take great interest in their classes. We are hoping and praying for a successful year in the Lord. J. L. C.

Hebron, Lincoln ct.

Bro. Waldrop gave us a good sermon Sunday mostly to the young people; also touched on the responsibility of parents bringing up their children. Showed them that bringing them to the Sunday school was a great help in the training of their minds. We did not have as good congregation as usual on account of measles in the neighborhood, though we had a very nice crowd. Our Sunday school is doing finely considering everything. We were glad to hear that so much good was done at Caroline. Bro. Braswell surely is a good revivalist.

We had a sad occurrence here on last Tuesday. They brought home Mr. Ambros Hoyles from Wadesboro killed, and buried him at Hebron. Bro. Waldrop attended the funeral service. There was a very large crowd present to sympathise with the bereaved ones. This young man was shot by a negro. He is the son of Mr. Jeramiah Hoyles of Macedonia. We hope this sad affair will be the cause of some one taking warning to always be ready, for we know not when the summons will come.

SEMINARY COMMENCEMENT.

May 4-6 marked the date of the thirtieth Commencement exercise of Westminster Theological Seminary. Ideal weather conditions contributed much toward making this occasion most pleasant. According to custom, President Hugh Latimer Elderdice, A. M., D. D., preached the baccalaureate sermon on Sunday morning in the Methodist Protestant church in the city. A large and interested audience was privileged to listen to an address of rare power. It was eloquent and practical and one of the best of the many baccalaureate sermons Dr. Elderdice has preached. His subject was, "If Paul were Pastor of my Parish." He said, in substance, that if Paul were a modern pastor he would know something worth knowing, he would have something to say that was worth saying, he would not only speak the truth but he would speak it with force and variety in deliver, and finally he would do something worth doing. Then, in one sentence after another, Dr. Elderdice gave to the graduating class some opportune advice. His earnest words will not soon be forgotten.

At the evening service, Rev. W. B. Judefind of the class '91, pastor of the Eutaw Methodist Protestant church of Baltimore, gave the Alumni sermon. Mr. Judefind proved himself fully equal to the occasion and preached a sermon that will long linger with a hallowing influence in the minds of his hearers. He spoke of the peculiarly high calling of the minister, of the sovereign message he is to bear, and of the divine equipment of his mission which is the essential.

Stockton Anniversary.

On Monday evening of Commencement week Stockton Society always holds its anniversary. The program this year, tho' unusually long, was of superior merit and reflected great credit on those who took part, as well as upon the quality of the work done in the Society during the past year. Under the auspices of the anniversary committee composed of Messrs Orwick, Shimp and Kirkley, assisted by the wives of a number of the Seminary men, the Chapel, hall and Stockton Hall were beautifully decorated with bunting, mottoes, pennants and violets. After the program the students and visiting frienls together with the faculty were invited by companies to Stockton Hall, which served as a parlor, to partake of refreshments.

One feature, which was not on the printed program, was the presentation. in behalf of the Senior class, of a life sized bust picture of Dr. Elderdice, to the Seminary, and Dr. Elderdice as well, to be left in the Seminary Chapel. Mr. Grove made the presentation for the class in a delightfully appropriate speech and little Mary Walden unveiled the picture at the opportune time.

Commencement.

The commencement exercises were held Tuesday evening in the Methodist Protestant church. After the opening prayer by Rev. J. D. Bowers, D. D., president of the Maryland Conference, Lindley W. Gerringer, A. B., delivered the class oration. His subject was, "Church Co-operation versus Competition." It was an earnest and truly eloquent appeal for greater federated unity among Protestant churches. Mr. Gerringer's oration was a credit to himself and his class, and amply justified the selection.

The address to the graduating class was given by Rev. Aubrey Franklin Hess, Ph. D., B. D., of the class of 1903. His subject was "The Dignity of Man," and he developed it in an eloquent manner. It was full of practical wisdom and valuable suggestions which should prove beneficial not only to the graduating class but to all who heard it. It was a high compliment to Dr. Hess to be called upon to make the address so soon after his own graduation but he was fully equal to the occasion.

After the address, Rev. J. L. Miller, D. D., president of the Board of Governors, authorized Dr. Elderdice to confer the diploma and degree of the Seminary upon the following:

A week or two before the close of their work Mr. and Mrs. Walden entertained the seniors and the wives of those married and gave them a feast on Maple sugar.

During the last week of the school the seniors were delightfully entertained at the homes of President and Mrs. Elderice and that of Dr. and Mrs. Forlines.

Schedules have been arranged for the different members of the faculty who will travel throughout the church in the interest of the Seminary during the summer months.

It is interesting to note that five of the seniors are farmer's sons, three are minister's sons and two were city bred and raised. Seven states are represented in the class and seven conferences while seven are college men—four from Adrian and three from Maryland.

The picture presented to the Seminary by the senior class is a splendid likeness of Dr. Elderdice and will be an ornament to the chapel.

Mr. Root has been the chapel organist this year and by his voluntaries and sympathetic playing added much to the chapel services.

Minnis—Brown.

On Sunday A. M., May 11, 1913, at the home of the bride four miles south of Mebane in Orange county, Miss Rebecca Brown was united in marriage to Mr. Robert Minnis. Both are Methodist Protestants and members at Chestnut Ridge. Their pastor, R. C. Stubbins, officiated. The prospects for this young couple are bright as they are both consecrated Christians and of fine moral character.

Troxler

Isaac Rivers Troxler was born November 16, 1835, and departed this life April 13, 1913. He was therefore in his seventy-eighth year. He was a son of John and Elizabeth Troxler. He served nearly the whole of the four years' war between the States, and at its close returned home to begin life's work for himself in an impoverished country, and by frugality and integrity accumulated more than enough of this world's goods to keep himself and his family comfortable in his declining years.

He was married to Miss Catherine Maxwell on September 26, 1865. To them were born seven children, five of whom are living.

Brother Troxler joined Fairgrove church on Haw River circuit thirty-five years ago, and he lived the Christ-life during all those years so well that all with one accord say, "Brother Troxler was a good man." "He was a good father," said one of his daughters.

He has served in every office the local church has to bestow, and right well did he serve, always doing his best. He was always ready to do his part with his means. Fairgrove church and Haw River circuit have lost one of their best friends, the community a good citizen, the wife a loving husband, and the sons and daughters a kind and indulgent father. May our Father give grace and comfort to enable us all to emulate his virtues.

Funeral services were held in Fairgrove church by the writer in the presence of a large gathering of people.

Caroleen.

The second quarterly conference of the Caroleen circuit convened at Caroleen Saturday evening, May 10. There was a large number present. We had with us two delegates from Shelby and two from Lincolnton. We were glad to have them. The report from each church was encouraging. The churches on this work seem to be moving along nicely.

There was one hundred and fifty present at Sunday school. Our collection was fifteen dollars and eighty cents. Reporter.

Large congregation out to hear Bro. Edwards Sunday. He "hewed to the line" close, gave the majority of us a pretty hard blow. Before church he told the S. S. of the "Cross and Crown" system. Forty-five voted that we adopt this plan. Let us rally to the front, see how many of us will have won the gold pin the close of twelve months.

We feel thankful to the good Lord that he has spared Bro. Trogdon's life and health to return to us again. He filled his appointment at Cid yesterda, and delivered one of the ablest and touching sermons. It sank deep in many hearts, as there were six came forward for the prayers of the Christian people. We hope that this year will be the record breaking of saving lost souls. It made my heart rejoice when I read of the large number saved at the M. P. church of West Lexington and may there be many more just such.

Bro. Joshua Morgan of Piney Grove worshiped with us Sunday and gave us some excellent advice. Oh, may his prayers be answered!. We are always very glad to have such a worker in our vineyard, for the harvest is great and the laborers are few. The measles have about subsided in this vicinity. May God's blessing rest on the people everywhere is the wish of an humble servant.

Expressions from Biederwolf.

He refers to the young man who smokes as "the insignificant appendage of the moist end of a cigarette."

He says "If I were a saloon keeper and you a church member that voted for license, and God did not admit me to Heaven with you or send you to Hell with me, I would go out and stand on the incinerated shores of Hell and lift up my voice and cry, Unjust! Unjust! Unjust! till the foundations of the throne of God would tremble and totter and fall into Hell."

These don't fully represent him. He plays upon many different cords. He is a fine impersonator, and his changes are so rapid that attention is kept on the alert.

THE THIRD MEETING OF THE JOINT COMMISSION OF THE UNITED BRETHREN AND METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCHES

HELD IN COLUMBUS, OHIO, APRIL 28, 1913

When the second meeting of the Joint Commission adjourned at Columbus, March 20, it adjourned to meet at the call of the chairmen of the Joint Commission, provided a majority of each commission could be present. On consultation with the members of the commission the time for the third meeting determined upon was April 28, 1913. There were present of the United Brethren Commissioners, G. M. Matthews, W. M. Weekley, W. M. Bell, T. C. Carter, Sherman W. Lott, R. H. Bennett, J. M. Knight. The following members of the Methodist Protestant Commission were present: Lyman E. Davis, D. G. Helmick, C. D. Sinkinson, M. L. Jennings, J. E. Peterson, J. F. Howe.

The Joint Commission met in the parlors of the Great Southern Hotel, Columbus, at 10 o'clock a. m., April 28. It may be proper here to state that the proceedings of the commission were marked by an apparent desire to reach the very best and most satisfacotry conclusions possible, and by the utmost freedom and frankness of discussion: the spirit of conciliation, concession and fairness characterized all the proceedings, and when conclusions were reached they expressed not only the unanimous sentiment of the Joint Commission, but the best judgment of the individual members thereof. As was stated by one of the leading members of the Methodist Protestant Church, not a member of the commission, but who was present throughout its sessions, in reply to a question: "They seemed to me like a body of strong, earnest Christian men, with a great work to do, freely discussing in an informal but candid, conciliatory and sincere way what ought to be done and trying to decide the very best things to be done for the welfare of both churches and the interests of the kingdom." It was in this spirit that all the reports herein comprising the basis of union were discussed and adopted. We believe we are correct in saying that there was not a single vote by any member of either commission recorded against any report finally adopted.

And further it may be stated that the question of name came again before the commission on a reconsideration. After careful consideration it was unanimously agreed to call the new church "The United Protestant Church." Just that and nothing more.

With this prefatory statement we give as the result of the deliberations of the Joint Committee the following Basis of Union. It will be noted that the basis of union is in the form of the reports of the four committees—the Committee on Doctrine and Polity, the Committee on Vested Interests, the Committee on Educational Institutions, the Committee on Benevolent Boards, all of which were unanimously adopted:

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON DOCTRINE AND POLITY

We, your committee, would report as follows:

DECLARATION OF FAITH

We, the representatives of the United Protestant Church, desiring to confess our inward and personal faith in Jesus Christ as our divine Saviour, and, also, to express our acceptance of the Holy Scriptures as the inspired source of all our faith and the supreme standard of Christian truth, and depending upon the guidance of the Holy Spirit to lead us into all truth, do make this declaration of our faith, and in so doing we do heartily renew the consecration of our lives to Almighty God and to the service of mankind.

1. We believe in the one living and true God, the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost; that these three are one; that the Father and Lord of all, maker of heaven and earth, did send his son Jesus Christ to redeem us from sin and death by the perfect obedience of his holy will in life, by the sacrifice of himself on the cross, and by his glorious resurrection from the dead; that the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of God and of Christ, moves in the hearts of men, calling them through the gospel to repentance and faith, awakening in them spiritual sorrow for past sin and confidence in the mercy of God, together with new desires and a new power to obey his will.

2. We believe that, though man by disobedience became alienated from God, yet God would have all men return unto him; that to this end he has made himself known, not only through the works of nature and the consciences of men, but above all, through Jesus Christ his Son; further, that God is ever calling to men through his love and that they who hear this call of divine love, and do heartily put their trust in the Saviour whom his love has provided, are assured by his word of his most fatherly forgiveness, of his free and per-

I WILL.

I will start anew this morning with a higher, fairer creed:
I will cease to stand complaining of my ruthless neighbor's greed;
I will cease to sit repining when my duty's call is clear;
I will waste no moment whining and my heart shall know no fear.

I will look sometimes about me for the things that merit praise;
I will search for hidden beauties that elude the grumbler's gaze;
I will try to find contentment in the paths that I must tread;
I will cease to have resentment when another moves ahead.

I will not be swayed by envy when my rival's strength is shown;
I will not deny his merit, but I'll strive to prove my own;
I will try to see the beauty spread before me, rain or shine;
I will cease to preach thy duty and be more concerned with mine.

MORMON DOCTRINE.

Strange That Such Things Could Become Believed. Polygamy, A Doctrine of Lust, is a Central Aritic1e.

By William Burton Hopper.

In the ancient Oriental religions we find a gradual change of doctrine and practice—a result of the unguided mind searching through countless ages for truth which God alone can give. Not being in fellowship with the divine will, the point reached was far from that truth. An almost identical, but much more rapid, transition is found in the Mormon religion. And notice, too, the similarity of the conclusions.

The Mormon church was founded by Joseph Smith in 1830. For about nine years we find no direct contradiction of the Bible. Nor do we find any doctrine that was not already held by some other church. Mr. Smith, though not a scholar himself, had attended religious meetings of various denominations and knew pretty well what they believed, and also what the Bible taught. As his early converts were mostly from other countries, he was naturally able to win them with more rapidity by teaching what was generally accepted by them. Then, being fully persuaded that he was a prophet, they were ready to accept anything that he might claim to be a revelation. The same is true with the Mormon missionary today. He is instructed to avoid as far as possible, all Mormon peculiarities. The majority of their so-called converts have little or no idea of Mormonism until they are decoyed here by the missionary. Then they see the deception. Many of them leave the church within a week, and about half of them within five years after arriving in Mormon territory. Had they remained in their home-land, they might have continued under the delusion in happy ignorance.

Curious Indeed.

The Mormons, by their attitude toward other denominations, their mode of living and their method of obtaining property soon incurred a bitter persecution. Guided by a "Prophet," whatever they did was thought to be right. As the Jews were directed to "spoil the Egyptians" by borrowing without returning—and they were the Jews' successors—so the Mormon doctrine appeared: "All things belong to God. We are God's people, and therefore have a right to his property." The opposition that followed caused them to forget the Bible and their early teaching, and look alone to their leader for protection and salvation.

No sooner had Joseph Smith gained the absolute confidence of a few thousand followers then we find him advocating new doctrines. The first of these is a plurality of gods, and the last plurality of wives. The first trace of more than one god is found in the "Doctrine and Covenants" (the second Mormon book), under date of March, 1839. Within a short time that idea acquired immense proportions. Failure to accomplish his many ambitions, and being met by so much opposition, caused the religious enthusiast to long for more power. And this desire led to an expectant possibility of eternal progression.

God But an Exalted Man.

Just before the death of Mr. Smith he said: "God himself was once as we are now, and is an exalted man....and you have got to learn how to be gods yourselves, the same as all gods have done before you." (Quoted: Leahona, The Elder Journal, December 5, 1911). A few years later that doctrine assumed its present form, as it is taught to all children in Mormon Sunday schools: "As man is God once was, and as God is man may become." To this has been added: "God has body, parts and passions just like a man." Before a Mormon is sent out as a missionary he is required to believe that there are millions of gods, that they have all been men, that they are now living in marriage relations like men, and that he himself may be a god. Brigham Young went farther and said: "He (Adam) is our father and god, and the only god with whom we have to do." Though many Mormons are worshiping Adam, that doctrine is not required of the missionary. It still reamains, however, as a fundamental feature of their religion. And why not? If men have and may yet become gods, why not Adam? They even sing of Joseph Smith as "mingling with gods," and many Mormons actually consider him a god.

The Mormon religion supposes matter to be eternal. It rejects the word "created" in the Bible and substitutes "organized" in its stead. This doctrine is sufficiently demonstrated by the closing sentence of a lecture on "Eternal Progression," as heard in one of their regular meetings: "When I leave this world I expect to be a god; and I expect to go right out into space and organize a world out of the eternal matter already existing; and I expect to populate that world, and worship just exactly as I am worshiping God here." What shall be our attitude in the face of such errors?

At the same time, with the development of the idea of God, other changes were also occurring. The thought of Jesus as a Savior was forgotten, and man was considered able to save himself. When he had done this by performing certain "works," why not save others also? Now a Mormon is expected to save himself by submitting to baptism and paying tithes— one-tenth of his income—to the head of the church. Then, if he will perform the same "works" for those who have died before him they, too, may be redeemed from endless punishment and sent on their way rejoicing. They sing: "We will save ourselves and our dead." They find nothing left that Jesus could have done except to "atone for the sin of Adam."

Purification by Baptism.

As baptism is supposed to be the only means of removing sin, the child, who has early learned the use of vile language, is seized at the age of eight and purified by the waters of baptism. Coming up out of the water, it sometimes goes to the limit of its vocabulary in pronouncing curses upon the officiating elder. But he promptly puts it under the water a second or third time until its voice is hushed —and he thinks its sins are removed. No change of heart is expected—though some, women especially, give evidence of such an experience. Then the laying on of hands by one "holding authority"—no matter how great a sinner he may be —is required for the gift of the Holy Ghost. Last winter a "high priest" was found stealing coal from the church; but as he held authority, nothing was done. A man committed murder in Utah, was found guilty by the jury, sentenced by the court, pardoned by the governor, appointed bishop by the head of the Mormon Church and sent into Idaho to collect tithings and baptize innocent children for the remission of sins. His own people consider him the greatest sinner among them. But as he was "called by prophecy and laying on of hands," it required two years' time and another "revelation" to remove him from that position to one a little lower. And that revelation came only when the people refused to give him their money. With such a man as community leader, the resultant conditions are not surprising. The next morning, after the new meeting house in that ward was dedicated—by a dance—there was found around that building twenty-three pint and twenty-six quart bottles, all of which had been emptied of liquor at that dedication. We conclude by asking: "To whom was the church house dedicated?"

The Mormons teach that we have had a former existence. In that state we were the real children of God and his many wives. Brigham Young says: "When our father Adam (god) came into the Garden of Eden he came with a celestial body and brought Eve, one of his wives, with him" (Journal of Discourse, 1, 50). While our heavenly parents are supposed to have bodies of flesh and bone, the children were only spirits. They came to earth that they might obtain bodies that they might enjoy the passions—the lusts of the flesh—throughout eternity. Jesus and the devil were among the earliest born of these spirits. In a counsel of the gods it was foreseen that when those spirits acquired bodies they would sin. The Father called for a volunteer to redeem the world when that should become necessary. The devil offered his services, but would take the honor to himself. Jesus then volunteered to do the work and give all the glory to the Father. When the latter was chosen the devil rebelled and a great war followed. One-third of the spirits fought with God, and are, or will be, Mormons. Another third fought with the devil, and are those who reject Mormonism. The other third remained neutral, and constitute the Negro race. The punishment inflicted upon the devil was that he should never receive a body. Practically all Mormons know this story, and with few exceptions suppose it to be in the Bible. They fail to notice, however, that it is the flesh and not the spirit of the Negro that is black. Nor does this story even give room for a mixed race—either the races do not mix or the Mormon religion is false.

Only Married Women Arise from the Grave.

Though all the earlier Mormon writings denounce polygamy, that practice dates back to the author of those writings, a year or so before his death. And as a doctrine it will surely remain there as long as the church lasts. This, however, being considered the most offensive feature of Mormonism, requires special attention.

These are the doctrines of the men in the Mormon church where that church has the majority. Outside of this territory they may never hear it. As to women, they seldom know anything about the hopes and ambitions of their husbands. A woman is not even supposed to rise from the dead unless she is sealed for eternity to a man. Her children must also be sealed to her or they will be given to another in the next world. Her own salvation, too, depends upon the number—but to no extent the quality of these children. It is a man-made religion, and made of man.

We find no fault in people believing what they wish. But the fault lies in propagating a religion and at the same time attempting to conceal from the public that which they believe to be its most fundamenal truths. Especially is it wrong to conceal such "truths" from those whom they most vitally concern. A woman will ruin her health over the wash-tub to support her husband while "on a mission," and at the same time be absolutely ignorant of the fact that his religion differs from hers as night differs from day.

The reason for such beliefs among the Mormons is found in the fact that they never read the Bible in public, and very seldom in private. Neither do they read any considerable extent the Book of Mormon, nor the Doctrine and Covenants—the only two of their books that have even a semblance of Bible doctrine. The prophet announces a revelation, and the people assume it to be scriptural. There can always be found a quotation from the Apocalypse, or sometimes other books of the New Testament, and from Daniel, Job or Isaiah of the Old Testament, that can be interpreted for its support. These interpretations, in the form of books, have displaced the Bible in home and pulpit. For special reasons the Bible is still used by the missionary, but never do they use any quotation until it has been "interpreted" by the head of the church. The Bible, to them, is only needed to support their preconceived ideas.

DO I LOVE MY CHURCH?

If I do not, I should. With all her blemishes, the church has meant more to many of us than we can ever tell.

While we were yet children it was to her sacred portals that our feet were turned by our loving parents, and there we received those hallowed impressions which still linger, and which shall outlast the corroding touch of Time.

There, in our more mature lives, we have received courage to fight our battles, strength for our daily needs, wisdom for our perplexity, inspiration for better living and Hope for the Road that stretches on in darkness beyond the grave.

I ought to love the church.

My church. I wonder how many of us say "my church."

Perhaps someone may read this who cannot truly say that they have a church, for they do not "belong."

In that case I would urge you to join. You are missing a great deal. You are cutting yourself off from the best, sweetest, truest influence that earth knows.

Some day you will realize all this. Upon that darksome time when bitter sorrow shall fall like a ghostly shadow across your door, your broken heart will know not where else to turn save to the church and her Lord Christ. Then, indeed, you will regret that you have been a stranger to God's people.

You are wasting precious time. Come to church. Let us make you welcome Learn to live for others and you will be surprised to find how much more life will mean to you.—Selected.

—Prof. W. O. Carver says in the Religious Herald in an extended article: "On its thought side Christianity had for most of its history been under the domination of the Latin forms and influence. In the last century Greek thought entered again and has now become dominant. Accordingly we now stress the immanence of God. Whereas until a while ago it was his transcendence that controlled our thinking of him. Then he was above and beyond, 'on a throne high and lifted up,' external to us and exercising a majestic authority over us. Now he is 'not very far from everyone of us, for in him we live and move and have our being. He is our life and imparts himself to us, even realizes himself in our life. We do not know him so analythically as the fathers thought they did, but we feel him much nearer to us."

—Rev. Hugh Black, the eminent Scotch preacher and author, will deliver the literary address and the baccalaureate sermon at Wake Forest College this year.

3. We believe that all who are through faith the children of God constitute the church of Christ; that they are the spiritual body of Christ of which he is the Head; that it is their duty to associate themselves together in churches, not only for the maintenance of worship and the promotion of spiritual growth and fellowship, but also for proclaiming his gospel to all mankind, and for manifesting in their character the fruit of his Spirit; that for the comfort of our faith he has given to his church the sacred ordinances of Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

4. We believe that the Holy Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation; that they are the only rule of faith and practice, that is, they constitute the authoritative standard by which all religious teaching and human conduct are to be regulated and judged.

5. We believe that according to Christ's law men of the Christian faith exist for the service of man, not only in the holding forth the word of life, but in the support of works and institutions of sympathy and charity, in the maintenance of human freedom, and the deliverance of those that are oppressed, in the enforcement of civic justice, and the rebuke of all unrighteousness.

6. We believe that Jesus Christ having risen from the dead and ascended into heaven, carries forward his work of saving men by sending the Holy Spirit to convict them of sin and to lead them to repentance and faith; that those who, through renewing grace turn to righteousness and trust in Jesus Christ, continue to grow in sanctified character through fellowship with Christ, the indwelling of the Holy Spirit and obedience to the truth; that a holy life is the fruit and evidence of saving faith.

7. We believe in the observance of the Christian Sabbath, as a day of holy rest and worship; that it is divinely appointed, and its observance is essential to the welfare of the civil community, and to the permanence and growth of the Christian Church.

8. We believe in the ultimate prevalence of the kingdom of Christ over all the earth; in the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ; in the resurrection of the dead, and a future just retribution for the deeds done in the body in this life.

CONSTITUTION

1. All ecclesiastical power herein granted to enact or repeal any rule of discipline is vested in a General Conference, composed of an equal number of ministers and laymen.

2. The General Conference shall meet every four years, and oftener if deemed necessary, and shall determine the qualifications of its representatives, the mode of their election, and the number to be chosen from each conference district.

3. The General Conference shall elect, every four years, from among the elders of the church, such number of bishops or general superintendents as shall be deemed necessary for the proper administration of the work of the church. They shall preside at the sessions of the General Conference. In case none are present, the General Confrence shall elect a chairman pro tem.

The United Protestant Church recognizes but one order in the ministry, and, therefore, the term "bishop" signifies, in our economy, an office and not an order.

4. The General Conference shall divide the territory of the church into conference districts, determining their number and boundaries. Said conferences shall hold annual sessions and shall be composed of all elders, a lay representative from each pastoral charge, and licentiates who have traveled under the direction of the conference for two years, and may be admitted to membership.

5. The General Conference shall have full control of the church's printing establishments, theological seminaries, missionary and church erection societies, educational and Sunday school boards, and Christian Endeavor and Brotherhood organizations. It shall also have power to establish and control any other department or institution within the church, which it may deem helpful in promoting its larger life and usefulness, and to enact such rules and regulations as shall be deemed necessary to enhance the growth and welfare of the annual conferences and local congregations.

6. The right of appeal shall be inviolate.

7. The right, title, interest, and claim of all property, both real and personal, of whatever name or description hitherto acquired by purchase or otherwise, by any person or persons, for the use and benefit of either of the uniting churches, or that may be secured hereafter, are hereby fully recognized and held to vest in the said United Protestant Church, the same being the legal successor of the denominations composing it. The new organization shall be the legal successor to each of said denominations and is authorized to continue same in force, together with all boards, corporations, societies, associations, institutions, activities and subordinate organizations and auxiliaries, so far and for such time as may be necessary to accomplish their purpose, to discharge their obligations, to execute their trusts, to preserve their property rights, bequests, legacies, and other interests and to conserve the effort of said denominations.

8. Amendments to the foregoing Constitution and Confession of Faith may be proposed by any General Conference, two-thirds of its members agreeing thereto, and said amendment shall be submitted to the several annual confrences of the church for ratificaton, a majority of two-thirds of the conferences voting in favor thereof being necessary to adoption.

Respectfully submitted,

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON VESTED INTERESTS

Your sub-committee on Vested Interests suggest the adoption of the following resolutions by each of the denominations:

1. CONCERNING ORGANIC UNION

Resolved, That we, the Methodist Protestant Church and the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, being similar in polity and alike in the essence of our faith, and, believing that the true purpose of religion is to teach men to adore God and to save them from sin, and that the great objective of the Christian church is to teach true religion and to persuade men everywhere to accept Jesus Christ as their personal Saviour, and that we can better conserve our Christian efforts by joining in wholesome cooperation and fraternal love in one organization than by continuing our separate organization, and by unwholesome rivalry and competition, do hereby unite said denominations in one organic body.

2. CONCERNING PROPERTY TITLES

We would encourage the proper transfer of titles of all property to the new organization as soon as may be done, although they need not be disturbed or divested, but may remain as they are. Where charters provide that trustees or directors shall be elected from a certain denomination or conference or in a particular manner, such amendment to the charter may be had as to permit the election of trustees from the united body, or in a manner to suit its convenience. In the case of organizations which can not well be continued as separate organizations—such as annual conferences conveyances should be made to the successor of such organization before the existing organization is discontinued.

3. CONCERNING FUTURE ACQUIRED TITLES

These should be vested in the new organization, or in its subordinate body, for the benefit of which the property is acquired, in each instance, using the full official title of such new organization.

4. CONCERNING ABANDONED OR DISUSED PROPERTY

Funds realized from abandoned property should not be diverted from the general purpose to which same was originally devoted, and, in general, their use should be preserved, as far as may be, to the localities where the property is situated or the conference controlling same. All property abandoned at the time of this merger may be handled, controlled, and disposed of in the manner in which it would have been disposed of if this union had not taken place. When new classes are organized by members of both denominations uniting, which classes shall occupy property theretofore disused, a proper resolution of the conference controlling same should authorize such use and a conveyance be made to trustees elected by the newly organized class.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS

To the Joint Commission of the United Brethren and the Methodist Protestant Churches:

Your committee appointed to take into consideration the educational interests of our two churches with the view of a union respecfully report that we have gone over, as carefully as our limited time permitted, the various educational institutions of our churches, seeking mainly to inform ourselves as to their condition and needs, to understand their environment, and, in a very tentative way, to forecast the possible effect the union proposed would have upon these institutions.

Your committee would not be expected to offer at this time any definite suggestions with respect to the merging of any two or more of our institutions, as to whether any now existing should be discontinued, suppressed, or any new one started, whether the work of any should be modified or the scope of any be enlarged, or a policy of concentration and intensive improvement be rigorously entered upon. These questions are of great moment and effect so vitally large property interests that it would be inexcusable to attempt to deal with them until the most patient and prolonged investigation of every item had supplied us with the material for a deliberate judgment.

Another question of more general import and of no less gravity is the question of the relation of the church to these institutions, questions of ownership, control, supervision, patronage and support. How to reach a wise and at the same time an effective oversight, to set up educational standards, stimulate the deficient, prune the redundant, repress imprudent ventures, and encourage worthy ambitions, both financial and educational—this is a matter that we feel must be approached boldly as one demanding explicit and speedy solution; and yet one so delicate and sensitive to blundering legislation that only those who know nothing about it would fear nothing.

It seems to your committee, therefore, that these educational interests should be left as they are until the union is consummated, and that the united church should then promptly raise a commission to work out the problems after exhaustive investigation.

The two churches in their separate organizations seem to have the same convictions upon Christian education and the necessity, not to say the right, of denominational schools. They have both been trying to work out the problem of control. And if they should unite they would have in their united capacity no strange task in this educational work. Your committee, therefore, feels that this problem is one which the united church can best undertake, and that it would only cumber and perhaps retard the union to attempt to settle it in advance.

Respectfully submitted,

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON BENEVOLENT BOARDS

We, your Committee on Benevolent Boards, having examined the subject committed to us, respectfully report that, in view of the fact that the two churches having the management and control of the several lines and department of church work, namely, Education, Missions, Church Extensions, Sunday School, Christian Endeavor, and Brotherhood, are organized and conducted so nearly alike, we feel assured that when our commissioners have agreed upon a common doctrine and polity, it will in no wise be difficult to blend these organized agencies of each denomination into efficient organizations to do the benevolent work of the united church.

We recommend, therefore:

1. That these boards shall continue their work as directed by each church until the General Conference of the united church shall create new boards or order otherwise; and that the several boards shall press the work committed to them concerning our common Master's kingdom, and whenever possible, each shall help the other into larger and more blessed achievements

2. That when the union is consummated, in the personnel, organization, and management of the several boards, each present denomination be given equitable representation, always with absolute regard to the most hearty, consecrated and efficient service in the world's redemption, and the hastening of the coming of the kingdom of Christ upon earth.

Respectfully submitted,

THE NEWS PAPERS AND THE PEOPLE

The welufare of a nation is very much dependent on the newspapers, and this being the case, the moral tone of the papers ought to be good. The press is a very extensive educator. The papers should give out no uncertain sound. They are as trumpets, and they all have a sound, and the people hear the sound and are moved.

Each paper has a separate peculiar sound. A man having control of an influential paper is in a position to do great good. Where the people, old and young, take a good paper they naturally become more and more intelligent.

Once a poor woman took her Testament and used it for the A B C book and for the spelling book, and taught her son to read. Later he became a close reader of the newspapers. Where the people are encouraged to write to the papers, they become more and more interested in the reading. There is a higher interest to a paper than the financial interest—but of course the financial bears its part in the life of the paper.

If a paper may be termed a "great light," and some are very great lights, there are "lesser lights" that contribute to the light of the paper. Those who write for a paper bear their little part in the light of that paper.

The people—the common people—are really the intelligence to be depended on—to be trusted. The Son of God showed up these facts, "and the common people heard him gladly." If you would help society really and according to the order of Moses and the Prophets, persuade the financial powers to hand down their help so as to make a universal lifting up to the vast multitudes of the common people.

Such a course (and a real healthy reaction) would tend to the enlightenment of the world. Of course the educational is the thing- and in this every family has need of all the help possible. The adverse powers would impoverish the people, and would take the Bible out of our hands—and would also shut us off from the lesser lights. The devil hates the Bible and would prevent free speech.

There never has been a time when the people, the common people and all, had greater need of a close, clear righteous teaching. Means of diversion from the real thing, the truth, are on the increase—and the need of clean literature is greater now than ever. Good men and women who feel the impulse to preach and lecture and write and encourage for the means of life and light, had better be up and doing.

The enemy, the most dangerous enemy, hates real human life and the great "light of the world," and tries hard to stir up war, and to float out rumors of war, so as to divert the people from true knowledge and from the essential means of life and light.

If a man has ability in any way over and above his fellows, the surplus is given him not for self-interest, but to help the people. The charitable ability of the rich and the talented and the great, is the main power that should come down from above, and this by sacrifice in the way of charity.

AN INTERESTING OLD BOOK.

We were in New Bern the other day attending the Neuse-Atlantic Association. While there we carried out a long-cherished desire to look upon a certain book from which a significant page had been torn out. This book was an old volume of court records in which had been entered an account of the trial, imprisonment and whipping of three Baptist preachers at the instance of the established church because they insisted on preaching their own convictions as to what God in His word taught that men should be and do. Some one cut the page out afterwards and perhaps burned it. No wonder that they became ashamed of such a record. But the fact remains nevertheless.

The names of these men were Brinson, Purefy, and Fulshire. Our visit to the court house was in company with Hon. Samuel Brinson, a lineal descendant of one of the persecuted heroes. The Purefy, who was beaten for his faith, was an ancestor of the well-known Purefoys of Wake Forest.

We should be profoundly grateful that all this has changed, but at the same time we should be vigilant in maintaining and spreading through all the earth the precious legacy which cost our fathers their blood to hand down to us. Persecution today takes a different form from what it did in those days; but the disposition to silence the faithful witness to the truh has, by no means, passed out of the hearts of many among us.—Central Messenger.

THE TEST OF EDUCATION.

A professor in the University of Chicago told his pupils that he should consider them educated, in the best sense of the word, when they could say "yes" to every one of the fourteen questions that he should put to them. It may interest you to read the questions. Here they are:

Has your education given sympathy with all good causes and made you espouse them?

Has it made you public-spirited?

Has it made you a brother to the weak?

Have you learned how to make friends and keep them?

Do you know what it is to be a friend yourself?

Can you look an honest man or a pure woman straight in the eye?

Do you see anything to love in a little child?

Will a lonely dog follow you in the street?

Can you be high minded and happy in the meaner drugeries of life?

Do you think washing dishes and hoeing corn just as compatible with high thinking as piano playing or golf?

Are you good for anything to yourself? Can you be happy alone?

Can you look into a mud-puddle by the wayside and see anything in the puddle but mud?

Can you look into the sky at night and see beyond the stars? Can your soul claim relationship with the Creator?—Popular Educator.

LET US MAGNIFY.

What a tendency we have to pull things down to a common, natural dead-level. We seem to think it is little in us to heighten and exalt things. I suppose this is why God loves children better than He does grown people; and makes them typical of his kingdom. They magnify everything they touch, and invest it with some high and holy meaning. A child can take a bundle of rags, call it a doll and magnify it into a living child or a woman. A boy can get astride of a six foot stick and magnify it into a horse, and play with it as such. The tendency of the child is to magnify, to ennoble, to exalt.

So I suppose this is the reason God loves children better than He does grown-ups. This is God's work and He knows it is a great world. His presence is in it and His voice speaks through it. He wants us to magnify it. The sun set is glorious. Brilliant and magnificent color schemes and fancy shapes flow in the western skies. Why can't we see God's beauty and recognize His glory there?

Again and again and again David the Psalmist sings out "Oh! come let us magnify the name of the Lord." God's world is great. It is not little in us, but a sign of largeness to exalt, Him, magnify the people and things and theories around about us. Have you a great neighbor? Say so. Treat him as such, We neither make ourselves small, nor others either by honoring, exalting, magnify the many good and great people and institutions and things round about us.

—One of our exchanges argues that one of the chief causes of the lack of ministerial students is the fault of pastors in not pressing upon their young men God's call to the ministry. Humanly speaking, if we did not press upon the unconverted God's call to conversion, there would be few responses.

AN ENCHANTING SCENE.

I hope not to forget the profound and lasting impression made upon my mind while standing beside a beautiful field of corn which had rustled in the summer breezes until it was loaded with fine ears of splendid grain. It was a calm, lovely morning in October last, and the air was crisp and breathed pure with morning nature, and thinking of the greatnes and goodness of God, the attention was directed to the morning glories, pink, white and blue, blooming in rich profusion thickly set all over the field, seeming to decorate the ground with the departing glory and beauty of the Summer, and to welcome the falling yellow leaves of autumn. The sky with soft ethereal blue, and the bright sunlight gave a natural touch to the whole scene which no painter's brush could draw, nor the most gifted and brilliant pen could half describe. It was so incomparably beautiful and extremely lovely to look upon the flowers which were reflecting the smiles of God. For some time the mind was perfectly satisfied, and the soul intensely happy, looking after and searching for God through those beautiful flowers sprayed with morning dew. Then, too, to look at the leaves which had trembled in the gales and storms of summer, changing into every hue of the rainbow colors was a scene painted and suspended everywhere in the most inviting manner, and appeared to be blazing with the fire of the midday sun.

Such stupendous scenes and feelings will lift you nearer God and heaven until with a thrill of transport the imagination hears a convoy of angels, clothed in white robes with palms of victory, singing the new, everlasting song. Then a great multitude, which no one can number, of the heavenly harpers join in the happy refrain of this glad new song, until heaven seems to come down and fill the earth with glory and the world with praise.

This was an enchanting vision and a happy experience. To be able to write these thoughts and to feel this thrill of gladnesss is worth more than millions would be without the ability to do so.

Such elevating scenes and feelings ought to constitute the best part of our lives, and fill our hearts with inexpressible gladness. It is so delightfully pleasant to commune with God while passing through His wonderful works, observing the laws by which they are developed, governed, and perpetuated.

AN EXAMPLE FOR OUR CHRISTIAN COLLEGES.

Count Furuzawa, the former governor of one of the largest prefectures of Japan, comprising the two southern provinces, not long ago desired some foreign instructors to teach English in the secondary schools in his prefecture. So he went to one of our missionaries, and asked him to secure five American teachers, who must all be Christian men. The count was not a Christian himself, though his wife and daughter were; but, appreciating the moral worth and influence of Christian rather than non-Christian Americans, he insisted that the former should be the teachers of the youth of his prefecture.

What a contrast this is to the standards set up for the choice of teachers in many of our so-called Christian colleges, colleges founded by the faith and prayer and consecrated money of the fathers, colleges many of which were especially established to prepare young men for the gospel ministry!

In many of these colleges today, when a new professor or instructor is wanted, the question is never asked, "Is he a Christian man?" but simply, "Is he a scholar?" Not, "Has he fitted himself by a life of soberiety, purity, and godly livin, as well as by his learning, to exert a wholesome moral as well as scholarly influence?" but simply, "Has he given a year or two of special study to some one department of human knowledge, and won his Ph. D.?"

As a consequence these colleges, where this is the standard, have young professors whose moral influence is evil or worse than nothing; men who smoke, and on occasion drink and swear; men who seldom attend church or chapel, and whose influence is often distinctly irreligious, and some of whom even make a boast of their fidelity.

I am not speaking at random, but of things that I know.

Our Western colleges, founded by Christian men to give a Christian education, have not so far departed from the ideals of their founders, perhaps because they are nearer in time to these founders and their ideals. Let not the excuses be made that it is necessary to subordinate morality and religion to scholarship in order to secure competent teachers.

The president of one of the foremost Western colleges, than which none of its class stands higher in cholarship, numbers, and general prosperity, recently told me that he always inquired particularly concerning the moral and religious character of his new professors, and that he would have no man who was irreligious. He said also that he had no difficulty in finding men who were both Christian and scholarly.

When will our colleges learn that only a fraction of a professor's influence is exerted in the classroom, and that parents do not send their boys to college simply to learn the languages and the sciences, but to make men of them?

O for more of the old-fashioned type of professors, whose influence was always wholesome, manly, and decidedly Christian! The old definition of a college, given by one of our martyr presidents, as "President Mark Hopkins on one end of a log, and young Garfield on the other," still holds true. Such men could make a college to-day, as they did fifty years ago.—Pilgrim, in C. E. World.

THE NATION'S PRAYER.

By Rev. Irving Maurer.

O God, hear thou the nation's prayer.
We lift our cause to thee.
We wage the holy war of Christ;
We fight to make men free.

Give us to build our cities pure,
Salvation throned above;
To shelter lovely homes from ill.
And turn our mills with love.

Give us to guide the alien feet;
To teach the brother's way;
To save our motherhood from need;
To guide our children's play.

May visions call and faith enflame,
And banish lust and greed.
Make thou America to be
A land of soulful deed.

—A writer of the Methodist Review, published in St. Louis, says this about infant baptism: "It is an article of our faith that the baptism of our young children (infants) is in any wise to be retained in the church, as the most agreeable to the institutions of Christ. But yet, with searching, we have been unable to find in the New estament a single express declaration or word in favor of infant baptism. We justify the rite, therefore, solely on the ground of logical inference, and not on any express word of Christ or his apostles. This may, perhaps, be deemed by some of our readers a strange position for a pedo-Baptist. It is by no means, however, a single opinion. Hundreds of learned pedo-Baptists have come to the same conclusion; especially since the New Testament has been subjected to a closer, more conscientious and more candid exegesis than was formerly practiced by controversionalists."

—Congregationalist: "If the great Presbyterian tripartite which is to meet in Atlanta really believes in the organic union of the Presbyterian churches of the nation, as most of them claim to do, why not throw their old Confession of Faith, that no one believes, overboard, and adopt the Cumberland Presbyterian Confession, which everybody believes? Why not? As the gentle reader may suspect, this question is modestly propounded by the Cumberland Presbyterian."

—It is said that Cardinal Farley's great cathedral in New York dodges the pope's order that no admission money is to be charged at the door of any cathedral or church. It is said that admission money is no longer directly demanded at the door, but between the doors and the pews collectors stand watching beside tables that hold contribution plates, and those who enter on the middle aisle are "expected" to deposit 25 cents apiece, those who enter at the sides 10 cents.

For the same reason she cannot give it away. Naturally, I desire Palestine to become Jewish; but a statement as to Zionist plans and politics should be left to the recognized leaders of the Zionist movement."

—Rev. J. du Plessis, author of "History of Christian Missions in South africa," says in International Review of Missions: "Heathenism is receding; old beliefs are vanishing; younger members of varous tribes are clamoring ever more loudly for education, which means to them wage-earning ability; the old conservative heathen can not turn a deaf ear to the call."

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Richland.

On Thursday, the 24th of April, I left High Point for Asheboro, Bro. Whitaker was at the depot to meet me, and we drove in the neighborhood of Charlotte church, and took supper with Mrs. J. H. Redding and at 8 o'clock P. M. we met at the church and had preaching. Not a large attendance; but very attentive. At this place they have a splendid house of worship but the membership is somewhat scattered and it seems to a visitor they are a bit dilatory as to attendance. Spent the night with Mrs. Redding.

Our next appointment was at New Union at 11 A. M.; only a very few out and we only made a talk and endeavored to encourage the few to be faithful. The Supt. of S. S. was present and reported a good attendance, and he felt encouraged as to the future of the school. The church is comparatively new, and if the members would get busy they would do much better than they have been doing, and I trust they will see the necessity and go to work with a determined effort to succeed. We took dinner with Bro. J. W. Rush who is a member of New Union and he subscribed for the church paper which is a good indication of interest. We drove to Bro. S. G. Spoon's for supper. Preaching at Flag Springs at 8 o'clock; a fair attendance for night service, mostly young people, and they were good hearers of the word. Here I met Rev. W. R. Smith, a man whom I knew when I was a boy, and who held the meeting where I was converted. I shall never forget him. Spent the night with Bro. Spoon.

On Saturday A. M., Mitchfield, and a short distance was New Zion church where the 2nd quarterly conference was to meet; preaching at 11 A. M. dinner on the ground; at 2 o'clock conference met with a small attendance of the officials; but the conference was interesting and all seemed to enjoy it and I trust good was accomplished. The financial report was not what it ought to have been, and the pastor's salary is not what it should be and is not being paid quarterly as it ought to be; but this was discussed by the writer and I am persuaded the people are going to do better on this charge in the future. This charge needs to adopt the individual assessment plan as well as many others, this field can easily pay the pastor $600 and, brethren, you ought to do it, and raise every cent of the general interests assessed. Bro. Whitaker is doing an acceptable work, I heard no complaint. Claim over paid.

Why Not Ct.

Bro. Henry Bean came to Bro. Whitaker's quarterly Conf. and conveyed me to his home where I spent Saturday night pleasantly. At 11 A. M. on Sabbath I preached at Pleasant Hill to an appreciative audience. Then Bro. J. C. Lowdermilk took me to his home for dinner and we soon were on our way to Fair Grove for the 3 o'clock appointment. Here we found a large congregation to attend the funeral of Prof. Garner and the writer only had the time to make a short talk, and present claims and work of the church. Here we have a splendid church and membership. The pastor lives at this point and he says it is an ideal neighborhood.

Bro. Stowe and I made a trip of 6 miles to Bro. W. M. Cox's and took supper. We walked out to New Hope church and preached at 8 o'clock to a small congregation on account of illness from measles in the community . This church is to be improved immediately and it will be a splendid house of worship when the improvements are made. Spent the night with Bro. Cox. Monday A. M. we drove to Macedonia. On our way we passed by the place where Bro. O. R. Cox made his start in the world. We reached our appointment in due time; at 11 o'clock the people had gathered and the message was delivered. We have a new church and built of splendid timber and ought to be painted immediately. Bro. O. R. Cox's gave the pulpit, and it's nice. We miss such men as he was in many ways, he was kind not only toward the church but to all worthy interests.

We had a splendid dinner with Bro. J. H. Saunders. We drove six miles to Bro. J. W. Warner's where we spent the night, and fared sumptuously. Bro. and Sister W. can make a stranger feel perfectly at home.

On the 29th, 11 A. M. we were at Love Ju . preaching, and had came dinner and it's useless to say there was a plenty. At 1:30 the 2nd quarterly conference met, and I am aware it was a busy time; but brethren who are honored by the members of the church to which they belong ought to hanor God and respect their pastor to the extent of attending at least two quarterly conferences a year (I mean by this the the 1st and 4th.)

The conference was a pleasant one. The conference voted to hold class meeting at least quarterly.

Some of the churches made good financial reports on pastor's salary. This Ct. is commencing to use the assessment plan. I am sure the financial report will improve under this plan if worked properly. The pastor and I made our way to Star where I filled my last appointment on the charge at night. I preached to a fairly good congregation in the M. E. church. We have a small but a splendid membership at this place; but have no church house; one is under contemplation, and I feel safe in leaving the matter with the pastor and Uncle Peter Vuncanon and son and the balance of the membership. Claim paid in full except at the two lower appointments that I did not visit. Bro. Stowe is popular and acceptable on his Ct. Richland and Why Not Ct's ought to be so divided as to make three charges so the pastor's could give more time and attention to some important points on the Rail Road. This is only suggestive.

High Point, N. C., April 30, 1913.

FROM OUR PASTORS

Lincoln Circuit.

We have been very busy for the last month, always finding plenty to do.

The Sunday schools at all the churches are starting off very nicely. Some increase in the attendance at S. S. and church service at all points. But we have but one Sunday school where the attendance in Sunday school is equal to the number enrolled on church register. I can't think that a Sunday school is what it ought to be when the members of the church won't take an active part in Sunday school work. But I think the people on Lincoln circuit are taking on more interest both in church matters and Sunday school matters. But yet there is room for more interest, and let it come.

Will the brethren who pray remember Lincoln Ct. in your prayers that God may prosper us as we need prosperity? Some how I think that there are brighter days in the near future for our people here, than we have seen for some time. May God bless the entire Conference.

Yours,
H. E. Waldrop.

The good people of this circuit continue to pound us. This week we have to thank for helpful and useful donations the following people:

Mr. John Dixon, eggs; J. R. McCollum, horse and buggy to go to appointment; J. M. Weatherdy, feeding my horse, and other kindness while I was ill; Bro. C.E. M. Raper, use of horse and buggy; Mrs. J. M. Jones, butter; G. Hill, load of wood; Charles M. Waynick, load of wood; Mrs. R. A. Hopkins, honey and eggs; L. R. Dixon, load of wood.

These tokens of esteem help us, and make it plain that we have a good people to service. May God help us to be faithful in serviice for them.

The 2nd quarterly conference for this circuit was held at Modway, April 26th. The candidates for delegates are G. R. Wright and J. T. Richardson, for alternates, J. M. Weatherly and H. G. Jones.

St. Paul Charge

We held our second quarterly meeting on Saturday before the second Sunday in April at Liberty Grove, all churches represented except Brown Summit. Bro. J. W. Hopkins came to Greensboro on the way to the quarterly meeting, but let the train slip away from him, notwithstanding he has been a railroad man for about thirty years. We will excuse him this time. The business of the quarterly meeting was transacted in a very short time, yet we had a pleasant quarterly meeting, "a good meeting," Rev. W. C. Kennett said and he ought to know. We appreciated having him with us. The tendency is onward. The financial report was good. Our aim by effort should be to pay every claim. President Cecil has visited St. Paul, Liberty and Liberty Grove. The brethren all speak highly of his sermons and of his business ability. I could and I will say some good things about each church in the near future. G. F. Millaway.

Albemarle

Monday after the third Sunday in April I went to Albemarle charge and preached in Edenton at night. We had a good congregation and the best service I have ever held there. Tuesday I went to Columbia and was met by Bro. Ainsley who took me to Mt. Elma where we had preaching at night. A good congregation assembled and we had a pleasant service. The congregation raised the money to buy new song books which they had asked me to bring to them. Wednesday night was spent with the church at Woodley's Chapel. The congregation was good and our people encouraged. Thursday night I preached at Mt. Hermon to an encouraging congregation. Friday night was spent with our Creswell church. Our people there are encouraged over our work and are going right along with their Sunday school and prayer meeting. Saturday night and Sunday at 11 o'clock (the fourth Sunday) was given to Rehoboth. Our people there feel encouraged and are conducting the Sunday school with success, and are expecting to have Children's Day before a great while. The people are expecting Bro. Geringer the latter part of this month. We hope he will meet with success on the charge. Yours respectfully,

May 5. J. H. Abernethy.

Henderson

Our revival meeting began Sunday morning, April 13, and closed Wednesday evening of the 23rd. Brother S. W. Taylor, of Winston-Salem, came Tuesday and did all the preaching until the meeting closed. Prof. T. O. Pender, of Dayton, Va., was with us from the beginning of the meeting and had charge of the singing. The meeting resulted in eighteen conversions and five accessions and the church greatly revived. The congregations were large, and our own people and the people of other churches in town enjoyed Brother Taylor's pure gospel sermons and Prof. Pender's singing. Both of these brethren greatly endeared themselves to us all and their faithful and efficient services will not soon be forgotten by the people of Henderson.

Bro. C. A. Cecil preached the first Sunday of our meeting at night and the large congregation was delighted with his sermon, and we all feel that his visit was a blessing to our church.

I have filled all my regular appointments this year, and quite a number of extra services also. At first I felt a little blue, and my mind was wont to quote 137 Psalm: "By the rivers of Babylon there we sat down; we hanged our harps upon the willows. How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land?" But now all this sort of thing is gone and we quote 149th Psalm: "Praise ye the Lord. Sing unto the Lord a new song, and his praise in the congregation of saints. Let Israel rejoice in him that made him: let the children of Zion be joyful in their King."

The Lord is blessing our feeble efforts with success. Large congregations come out to hear the Gospel story of Jesus and His love. One conversion and one accession at Rose Hill last third Sabbath. Two conversions fourth Sabbath at Bethesda, one accession last Sabbath to New Hope, Mrs. Sallie Montgomery, from the Baptist church.

Sorry to say Pageland had two fires last week. Bro. Jno Smith's house was destroyed by fire Wednesday night. The Gulledge M. F. G. establishment completeabout 1:30 A. M.

Bro. Jesse A. Turner surprised us very much this morning by saying that there was something very valuable for you at the depot, so we hooked up the Princess, who is always ready to do her master's will, and drove down, and behold! two buggy loads of good things, express and freight charges prepaid, and the agent, Bro. Nelson, declared he was thinking of giving up his job and preaching too. The benefactors are unknown, yet we think Bro. M. D. Roscoe is chief. O. D. Stacy.

Dear Editor:

Your paper is somewhat like our dear Lord to me in one respect; the better we get acquainted with him the better we can see his goodness and mercy and how important it is to serve him; so the longer I read your paper the better I like it, and the more I see the great importance of every church member reading it. I find that my members become more interested in the church when they began to read it, and I am certainly glad to see that so many of our pastors are sending in so many subscriptions. I feel that it means much for them to create interest in their churches.

Well, I feel like I am knocked out of the ring, but if the Lord is willing, I hope to get in the ring again soon. But as no one can redeem lost time I feel that I will have to move at a faster pace than I have ever done if I catch up; so, dear reader, pray for me.

Our second quarterly conference will convene at Mt. Pleasant on Saturday before the fourth Sunday in May, 1913. Preaching at 11 A. M., conference at 1:30 P. M. Dear brother, if you are interested in the business of the Kingdom of Christ, show it by coming to a business meeting of His. You must be nominated or your brother as delegate to the Annual Conference and this is important business. Hoping for a good turn-out from each church, I close with love to all.

CATHOLIC CHURCH.

We are asked to explain the term "Catholic church" which occurs in the Apostles' creed in the expression, "I believe in the holy catholic church."

The word "catholic" simply means general, universal. The expression in the Apostles' creed has no exclusive reference to the Roman Catholic Church but refers to all Christians of all denominations, all who compose the body of the bride of Christ, which is the real Christian church.

—It is officially reported that there are 500 ministerial students in Baptist schools in Texas.

THE LADY IN GREY.

Martha H. Abbott.

The train was about to pull out of Winfield station when Mrs. Curtis hurried into a car and sank into a seat. She completed her toilet after the train started, by readjusting some of her hairpins, fastening her hat a little more securely, and putting on her gloves.

It had been a busy morning for Mrs. Curtis. She had prepared breakfast and done the dishes, dressed the children and taken them over to Aunt Hattie's, where they were to spend the day, put up her husband's lunch, and got ready herself in time to take the eight o'clock train for the city.

Not any nor all of these duties were sufficient, however, to cause the disheartened look which had settled over Mrs. Curtis' face. She had been planning for this shopping day a whole month. A list of things needed had been carefully made out, and the prices she expected to pay, figuring each at the lowest reasonable estimate. There were summer dresses and underwear for the children, and shirts and a stock for John. Afterward, if there was any money left, she would get a hat for herself. She ought to have a new one; hers had been worn two years, and was really very shabby.

For all this she ought to have twelve dollars at the least calculation. When she was ready to start, her husband counted out nine dollars and seventy-five cents, and said, as he handed it to her: "That's all I can spare today. You'll make it do, won't you, Mary?"

On the train Mrs. Curtis counted her money again, as if with the hope that some good fairy had increased it since it went into her pocketbook. A five-dollar bill, two two dollar bills, a silver half-dollar, and the change after her carfare had been paid—that was all!

Time was when Mrs. Curtis had looked forward with delight to a shopping day. But that was in her girlhood, when her wages were more than sufficient for her need, and in her early married life. Since the children had come there had been so many expenses that every prospective outlay had to be most carefully considered. Shopping days now carried with them the necessity and burden of making every dollar do the work of two. The anxiety to save a few paltry cents took away all the pleasure that might otherwise brighten a day like this. She was tired of it all.

The train stopped at Wrentham station. Two or three passengers alighted, and a half-dozen entered. Among the latter was a lady who took a seat directly in front of Mrs. Curtis. There was the air of the gentlewoman about her which impressed one at once. Her fine, grey street dress, cut along graceful lines, fitted her perfectly, and her grey velvet toque, with violets, was very becoming. All the little accessories of her toilet were faultless.

Mrs. Curtis loved pretty clothes, and in her girlhood she had dressed with care. But with all the burdens of the home pressing upon her, she had grown negligent as to her personal appearance. Now, for the first time since she had put them on, she noticed with a feeling of shame a long rip in her gloves, and—yes, there was a button off the front of her jacket!

The presence of the well dressed lady in front of her added to the feeling of bitterness which had already taken possession of Mrs. Curtis. It seemed as if her life was made up of sacrifice and burdens. She never had time to think of herself. Why should so much be laid upon some, when others had comfort and ease? Mrs. Curtis pondered this problem deeply, but it is one that had baffled wiser brains than her own, and the time before the train reached the city was far too short for her to solve it. The two women alighted, and went their separate ways.

The window of a modest little milliner's shop, just above the station, attracted Mrs. Curtis' attention. Hats galore, many of them so reasonable that she had an increased hope that she might save enough money to purchase one! And then rolls on rolls of shining ribbons, and roses that looked like real ones! Mrs. Curtis cast very wistful looks at them as she hurried on.

At the corner, where she turned into the business street of the city, a Salvation Army lassie stood by her pole, mutely appealing for the great organization she represented. Mrs. Curtis usually gave something for this cause, for she had a something for this cause, for she had a warm, sympathetic heart. Today she steeled herself against such weakness. She could not be expected to give. She had nothing for herself. It was for people who had well-filled pocketbooks to give of their abundance. Her face was so forbidding that the lassie, after one quick look, turned away.

Mrs. Curtis was soon in the thick of the fray, hurrying from one store to another, comparing price and qualities with great care, and crossing out from her list the names of such articles as she purchased. It was not a good bargain day. The alluring prices which had attracted her attention in the papers that week proved to be for things so poor in quality that her better judgment rejected them. So she paid more for better articles, and watched her little roll of bills rapidly diminish.

It was soon evident to Mrs. Curtis that she would not have money enough for a hat, but perhaps she might be able to purchase some ribbon for a big bow which might partly conceal the shabbiness of her old one. Accordingly she economized at noon by buying only a cup of tea ad two rolls at the baker's counter instead of having a substantial dinner as she had planned. Then she took up again her weary marches and counter marches.

Mrs. Curtis had excellent judgment and her selections were admirable. Usually she would have experienced satisfaction in the possession of the well chosen articles which were the result of the weary day, but her disappointment of the morning, and the sense of injustice to herself, had made her heart sore and bitter.

There were stockings yet to buy. Bargains in these were advertised by Dodd & Main, and thither she took her way. Passing the silk counter, she almost ran against her neighbor of the morning, the lady in grey. The clerk was waiting upon her with the utmost deference, and took down shade after shade of silk for her inspection.

When, a little later, Mrs. Curtis stepped into the elevator, the lady in grey was already before her, and they both alighted on the third floor. As the lady was moving away, she suddenly put her hand to her throat, and then stopped, with a little cry. Mrs. Curtis was behind her, and, seeing her distress, hurried up to her. "I've lost my locket," she said, in an agitated voice. "It was fastened to a chain, which must have unclasped from my neck."

They searched such parts of the lady's dress as might conceal a fallen ornament, but to no avail.

Mrs. Curtis expressed sympathy and the lady's delicately-gloved hands clasped and unclasped, nervously. "I must find it," she said. "It was very precious to me. What shall I do?"

She turned helplessly to Mrs. Curtis in her trouble, as one accustomed to have things decided for her, and the latter said: "It is an hour before my train is due, and my shopping is nearly done. I will go back with you to some of the places where you have been. We will advertise, and we may obtain some clue to it."

They went, searching carefully, to the stores where she had been, visited the hotel where she had dined, and set on foot the search for the lost article.

As their efforts seemed failure, the lady grew more and more agitated, and often wrung her hands, crying: "I must find it! I must find it!"

Both had almost given up hope when they entered one of the banks which the lady had visited during the morning. She had written a letter and read the daily at a small table, and under the chair, drawn up as she had left it, Mrs. Curtis caught the gleam of something golden. Another moment, and the locket was in its owner's hands.

The lady was overwhelmed with joy and gratitude. "I thank you so much!" she said, over and over again. "I should never have found it alone."

She touched a spring of the locket, and the lid flew open, revealing the winsome face of a little girl. "It is the most precious thing in the world to me," she said. "It is all I have to bind me to the past."

The two stood for a moment with clasped hands, the bond of mother love united them. Then Mrs. Curtis was alone. But somehow the world had a different aspect for her. She had no longer any envy for the lady whose choicest possession was a painted face in a locket. And her treasures were warm and dimpled and alive! A flood of goodness surged into her heart, almost bursting it with its force. How sacred and blessed seemed to her, now, every sacrifice she had made!

A lonely, stately home waited for the lady in grey. But there would be warm, rosy arms flung around her neck, and she could hardly wait to see the joy in the faces of the little girls, and hear their shouts when the sprigged muslin should be opened. It was so good, after all, to think for them and work for them!

The little Salvation Army lassie stood yet at her pole as Mrs. Curtis passed the corner on her way to the milliner shop for her ribbon. It had been a hard day for the girl. People had been so absorbed in their business and their pleasure that few of them had even noticed her presence, as the wind swept pitilessly around her. With a sudden impulse Mrs. Curtis emptied her pocketbook into the box, saving only her car-fare, and her face was so gladsome that the lassie grew warm in its glow.

"God bless you!" she said.

"He has blessed me," Mrs. Curtis answered, softly.—Zion's Herald.

THE SENTRY.

"I wish I was a soldier!" said Tom. One of grandfather's stories made him feel that way.

"You might be a soldier in a way," said grandfather, looking up from the shoes he was tapping.

"How?" demanded Tom. "I wish you'd tell me."

"Soldiering, you know, wasn't all fighting. We marched and made camp and stood sentry. Some of those things a man or boy might do right now."

"How?" asked Tom, again.

"It won't be any play, you know," grandfather warned.

"I know," answered Tom. "Go ahead and tell me."

"Look out of the window," said grandfather, slowly. On the river the men were hard at work cutting the big blocks of ice and floating them up the open channel to the slide where the machine carried them to the high doors of the ice house.

"Yes," said Tom. He did not quite understand just what grandfather meant.

"Well, there ought to be a sentry there. After school little boys and girls that can't swim and are too little to be trusted on the ice, any way, play there along the edge of the water, and the men are too busy to watch them; and the first thing you know one of them is going to fall in. I'd like to see a volunteer that can swim, a boy about twelve years old, go on sentry duty there—not to boss the little folks, but to keep them away from the edge, and if one of them falls in, to go right after him. I was so worried yesterday afternoon that I nearly went out there myself."

Tom thought a moment. "It would be better if I had a pair of skates," he said.

"Suppose so, but that night I was telling you about I didn't even have an overcoat. I know," grandfather went on, "it doesn't look like anything very big, but just by keeping those little folks away from that open water you may save somebody's life, and that is about the biggest thing a soldier or anybody else can do."

As soon as the school closed, Tom went to the river; and there, just as grandfather had said, were thirty or forty children playing near the edge of the open water. Tom saw grandfather at the window and waved at him, but he did not tell the children he was a sentry; he simply coaxed some of them to play a game of tag, and soon all were hard at it and far away from the danger. That, of course, did not last till supper time. When grandfather looked out a half later, some of the children were back, and Tom was pacing to and fro watching them closely. At six o'clock he burst in, fairly stuttering with excitement. "Grandfather," he exclaimed, "I'm going to have a pair of skates!"

"How's that?" returned grandfather.

"It's true. Just now Mr. Cotton, who owns the ice house came, down and said: 'What are you doing here?' At first I thought he didn't like it; but we talked a lot about it, and he wanted to know why I wasn't skating, and finally he said: 'Well, these children have worried me, too; and if you'll come down here every night after school till we get through cutting ice—that will be Friday if the weather keeps cold—I'll let you pick out any pair of skates in Dumfries and I'll pay for them.' Only, Grandfather," continued Tom, "it wasn't really work, you know. Is it all right to take money for it?"

Oh, yes," answered grandfather, "I think so. We soldiers used to get money for sentry duty."—Morning Star.

BREAKING IT GENTLY.

The evenings callers were chatting gayly with the Kinterbys when a patter of little feet was heard from the head of the stairs. Mrs. Kinterby raised her head, warning the others to silence.

"Hush!" she said, softly. "The children are going to deliver their 'good-night' message. It always gives me a feeling of reverence to hear them—they are so much nearer the Creator than we are, and they speak the love that is in their little hearts never so fully as when the dark has come. Listen!"

There was a moment of tense silence. Then—

"Mamma," came the message in a shrill whisper, "Willie found a bedbug!"

CENTER, ALAMANCE CIRCUIT

The Woman's Missionary Society met at the home of Mr. W. E. Perry last Sunday at 3 o'clock P. M. After the devotional exercise a very interesting program was rendered, which consisted of selections on missionary work, followed by report by Annie Lindley, delegate to Branch Meeting at Asheboro. She reported the meeting very interesting and helpful. Only 6 of our members were present, and some visitors. Though our band was small, yet we feel that our meeting together was not in vain. Seems that our society grows slow in number but, we trust, not in interest. Total collection, $2.46; $1.15 dues, $1.25 toward paying delegate's expenses, for which delegate was very grateful indeed, and 6c. penny offering. In the absence of our Secretary, Miss Daisy Richardson acted as Secretary. We all enjoyed very much the kindness bestowed by Mr. and Mrs. Perry. Next meeting to be held at the home of Mrs. E. M. Lindley first Sunday in June at 3 o'clock P. M. Thank-offering service will be held at the church second Sunday in July. Besides our other program we are expecting a sermon by Bro. Pike on Missions.

Children's Day is to be held at Center 4th Sunday in May at 2:30 o'clock P. M. Be sure to come and bring some one with you.

Miss Elsie Lindley went to Greensboro to the Sunday school convention and reports a real nice time.

Mr. Meacham Lindley has been ill, but is improving. Mr. Amzie Ivey still continues very sick, but we hope for a speedy recovery.

SANDY RIDGE, OAK RIDGE CIRCUIT

We did a very unwise and foolish thing when we went into winter quarters. Therefore we did but very little during the winter except to hear real good sermons from our pastor at his regular monthly appointments. Our President made his visit at the appointed time. The writer failed to be present on account of sickness. The sermon was very highly complimented. It is said that Bro. Cecil knows how to use the Gospel gun and was sure that he hit every one in the congregation. So I saved myself by being kept at home, yet I would have been willing to take all that Bro. Charlie would have given me for the privilege of hearing him.

Next Saturday, the 10th, our quarterly meeting convenes at Sandy Ridge church. A full turn-out of the official members is desired. I think it very important we lay by our secular business for one day to attend to the business of the church. God will bless us if we will.

We met the third Sunday in March and organized Sunday school. Supt., the writer; Asst., Luther Pegg; Sect., Miss Nellie Pegg. Teachers: Luther Pegg, Mary Pegg, Roeller Pegg, Mrs. Grant Wood, J. J. Frazier. After all the hard struggle and discouragements, our Sunday school is now the largest and the interest is the best for a number of years. We have a Bible Class of 14. It has been a number of years since we had a class of old people. Attendance last Sunday, 82; today, 97. Please remember us at the throne of Grace.

FLAT ROCK

President Cecil was with us on yesterday to the delight of his many old friends, preaching to a full house. An earnest appeal to the constituency of the church for her love for the church. Based on this thought: "Let my right hand forget her cunning ere I forget thee, O Jerusalem." We believe this sermon will never die. He also paid a glowing tribute to The Methodist Protestant Herald, which we all are convinced is daily growing better and is getting a strong hold upon the entire church. Every family in the M. P. Church in North Carolina should take it, and also all the new converts.

UNION CHAPEL, MOCKSVILLE CIRCUIT

Our Sabbath school is doing very well; attendance fairly good. We have 70 enrolled. It is rather late to say anything about our Easter service: it proved a success. The children acted their pieces well, showed they had been well trained. Can't help but boast of our children; they rendered their music well. I think every one present was well pleased. The offering amounted to $6.33.

You who are not acquainted with us over here don't know like we do; but some few, I have no doubt, who read this will remember what a fine crowd of little folks we have here. We have a nice choir of children that march on the rostrum and sing a song every second Sabbath in each month. Their instructor is Mrs. Neely Clement, appointed by Bro. Self. We are going to have a beautiful Children's Day service. We have ordered the literature for the service. Wish you all could come and see how well our children can render their pieces.

Bro. Self gives us uplifting sermons and news to the line.

Our church was represented in the Missionary Meeting in Asheboro by Mrs. W. H. Gaither. She reported a fine meeting. Bro. Self appointed Mrs. Gaither as organizer of the Home Missionary Society.

Bro. Self and J. A. Cheshire, our Sunday school superintendent, attended the State Sunday School Convention in Greensboro last week. Wish some one would write a piece to the Herald telling how to make a Sunday school more interesting than a lot of them are, so as to draw in all those that loaf around and won't come out. The object and purpose of a Sunday school is to teach and instruct about Jesus Christ. We have some who come and stalk around in the grove and don't take much part. Our S. S. Supt. has appointed a committee to look after people who come, giving invitations to join us in the Sunday school lessons and singing. Our song service is not so good as it was last year.

In Memory of Miss Josie Cagle.

In loving remembrance the Philathea class of the M. P. church, of Why Not, wish to pay this tribute of love and respect to the memory of Miss Josie Cagle who died April 8, 1913.

In the death of our dear friend we have lost a wise counsellor and it is with deep sorrow and regret that we do resolve:

That inasmuch as our loving heavenly Father has seen fit to remove from us this dear sister, we show our appreciation of her faithful work, her pure and upright life, by following her example, while in loving remembrance we cherish her name as one who was always ready to aid in every Christian work.

Further, That we endeavor to be more steadfast and loyal to the cause of advancing the Lord's Kingdom in the world.

That these resolutions be printed in the county paper and M. P. Herald and also a copy be sent to the bereaved family in behalf of the Philathea class.

Sallie Slack,
Cora Stowe,
Harriette Smith,
Hester Stuart,
Committee.

Smith

God has called from us a neighbor, a sister, a wife and a mother, Mrs. Sarah Smith, the daughter of David Fogleman of Randolph County. Mrs. Smith leaves a husband and three small children, a father, five brothers and one sister, and a host of relatives and friends to mourn their loss. Sarah Smith was born June 21, 1886, and was married to W. A. Smith March 15, 1903, and departed this life April 15, 1913. The remains were laid to rest in Bethany cemetery. Rev. Mr. O'Brian conducted the burial services. It is hard for her loved ones to give her up, but the Lord knows best.

Sad was the hour of parting. Here she will come no more, still we hope to meet her safe on that golden shore.

The writer wishes to extend to the bereaved family her deepest sympathy.

"What I spent that I had;
What I saved that I lost;
What I gave that I have."

OUR FOREIGN MISSIONARY WORK.

And Still They Come.

Orders for the Children's Day services are coming by every mail, are being promptly filled. You will have better success in preparing and holding the service, and you will help us, by ordering your Children's Day supplies—illustrated music pamphlets, recitation sheets, collection envelopes—at once. They will be sent to our schools free of all cost.

The splendid features of this service are not duplicated in any service published in America. It is the very best for our schools.

Remember—The black silk, gold embroidered Japanese banner is awarded for a year in the school which sends us the largest Children's Day offering in proportion to membership.

The red velvet, gold embroidered banner is longer than this one and even more beautiful, and it is awarded for one year to the school giving the largest Children's Day offering.

Last year the Sunday school of the First Church Seattle, Washington, secured the black banner, and the Sunday school of West Baltimore Church, Baltimore, Md., secured the red velvet one. They will be awarded again this year on the same conditions. When you send the offering, be sure to give number of teachers, officers and scholars.

I'm a Little Further on.

Only ten dollars are now needed to pay the balance on the Board's new type writer. This ought to be closed up at once. If more is received the excess will be applied on a multigraph.

A new type writer table and chair are assured as presents to the Board, and will complete this fine addition to the office equipment.

A multigraph would enable us to do much more work now urgently needed, and save much labor and expense. This machine sets type, uses a ribbon and produces, with great rapidity, any number of copies of a letter just like those written on a type writer. With a multigraph I could, in an hour or two, have letters to mail to all pastors in the denomination, and the same important items of our foreign missionary work could be read on the same Sunday in all our churches. It is impossible for me to reach 184,000 Methodist Protestants through the 7,000 subscribers of the "Recorder" and the "Protestant," but with a multigraph and the mail all the congregations of our church could be reached on the same day. This is only one example of what the multigraph would let me do. We cannot arouse the church to a deeper sense of its obligation to give the Gospel to the whole world, unless we reach the people, and it cannot be done by me, under present restrictions, hence my insistent appeals for a multigraph, etc. Who will give a multigraph to the Board?

THE SOURCE OF OUR STRENGTH.

Here is some excellent advice from the President of our nation especially for the Sunday school workers.

I am sorry for the men who do not read the Bible every day; I wonder why they deprive themselves of the strength and of the pleasure. It is one of the most singular books in the world, for every time you open it, some old text that you have read a score of times suddenly beams with a new meaning. Evidently the mood and the thought of that day, bred by the circumstances that you cannot analyze, has suddenly thrown its light upon that page and upon that passage, and there springs out upon the page to you something that you never saw lie upon it before. There is no other book that I know of, of which this is true; there is no other book that yields its meaning so personally, that seems to fit itself so intimately to the very spirit that is seeking its guidance.

There are great problems before the American people. There are problems which will need purity of spirit and an integrity of purpose such as has never been called for before in the history of this country. I should be afraid to go forward if I did not believe that there lay at the foundation of all our schooling and of all our thought this incomparable and unimpeachable Word of God. If we cannot derive our strength thence, there in no source from which we can derive it, if I may, inspired once more with the feeling that the providence of God is the foundation of affairs, and only those can guide, and only those can follow, who take this providence of God form the sources where it is authentically interpreted.

Some Practical Principles.

We are glad to pass along some suggestions from a successful worker.

Times innumerable I hace heard teachers say that they did not have time to prepare a lesson properly for teaching. What these teachers mean to say, in by far the majority of cases, was that they failed merely to take time to prepare. That is putting it bluntly; but it is quite clearly the truth.

Still another group is represented by the teacher who does take time, but fails to prepare properly through failing to make the most of his time.

Let us look at some axioms of lesson preparation.

1. It requires some time absolutely set apart for this one thing. It means some concentration, some going aside free from interruption, some waiting for the teaching of the lesson to one's own soul. One must be willing to be Spirit-led.

2. It requires more than one "sitting." Better four periods of a half hour each, than one period of two hours or more. Consequently, the preparation should be extended into one day or into a few hours before the instruction is to be given.

3. It calls for resolute insistence on the study of the lesson material from the viewpoint of the boy in the class.

4. It preposes an isatiable appetite for illustrative material which may be found at one's elbow—in the car, on the street, at the desk, in the factory, or wherever one may be.

5. It assumes a broad knowledge of the Book to be taught, and an ever-increasing knowledge of how to teach. In neither case is the knowledge required to be profound; whereas uncorrected ignorance in either field is calamitous.

One of the best ways to learn how to apply these principles is to start a Teacher Training class. There is no better time than right now. Remember the Board has an excellent book, Training the Teacher, paper 35cts, cloth 50 cts. Send all orders to C. H. Hubbell, Adrian, Michigan.

Class You Count on.

Here is a testimony that can be repeated by many pastors in many forms.

"It has a quality of dependableless that is a real comfort to me because I can feel so sure that it will rally to my support in any enterprise I want it to help me carry through. I do not know how we could have entertained our church association as we did last October had it not been for the Ever Ready Class. From the time the leader of the class said that she and the class would assume all the responsibility of the dinner and supper we had to provide, I knew that I need not give any more thought to the matter. Then when it came to raising our missionary apportionment and the Every Readys agreed to take charge of this matter, I again knew that the money would be raised. This class took entire charge of the refreshments and of the annual roll call of the church, and it gave the entire church and congregation a social that stands forth in our memory as the best social the church has ever had. Its contributions to the regular treasury of the Sunday school are larger than the contrbutions of a class of men almost as

A SOI-DISANT RECEIPE.

"Dear, will you please follow directions while I read the recipe?" said Mrs. Walbrook to her obedient husband.

He took the pan while she read aloud:

"First, you mix a beaten batter,
Then you take an earthen platter.
Bat the batter in the platter
Without clamor, clash, or clatter.
Stir it gently while you scatter
Milk and sugar till the batter
In the platter grows much fatter.
Pour it in a dish that's flatter
Than the first and earthen platter—
Tin will do; it doesn't matter
So the fatter batter's flatter—
Then,
Gently lifting up the latter
With a percolating patter
Flatter batter, pour the batter
In the former earthen platter,
Without clatter, clash, or splatter.
Now,
Once again in latter platter
Scatter fatter flatter batter"—

THE REMAINS OF A MAN.

We were shocked recently to find the remains of a man in an unexpected place. We were walking on a familiar street, and came to a house with a broad piazza. On this piazza was the object that gave us such a shock.

Thirty years ago we had known Timothy Wilkins. He was then a bright, ambitious young man, full of hope and promise. He went west and we had not seen him since. Great as was the change in him, we recognized him at once, by his remains. He was sitting on the piazza smoking a pipe; ambition gone, health gone, hope gone, energy gone—all gone up in tobacco smoke, and the fire was still burning. It is sad to compare what he is with what he might have been.

WITH THE MEBANE PEOPLE LAST SUNDAY.

Last week, Rev. W. E. Swain wrote that he had an urgent call to go east and asked the editor to fill his appointment in Mebane last Sunday. The call he had received was from Rev. J. H. Abernethy, who represented that two people wished to be married (he did not give their names) and wished Bro. Swain to officiate. Bro. Swain went, guessing that Bro. Abernethy was one of the two so affected, but he could not guess the other.

Well, this made a way for our pleasant visit to Mebane last Sunday. We found the church about full of attentive hearers, most of them young people. A congregation naturally grows larger when all the members of the church attend faithfully all the services. We wish that all people would realize and appreciate this fact. We have heard people express wonder that their church attendance was not better: they had a good location and good preaching. The fact was, the members were irregular in attendance, depending on a "drawing preacher" to accomplish what only a drawing congregation can do.

(We would like for some of our ministers to tell through the Herald what are the characteristics of a "drawing congregation." It might help some congregations to develop power of attraction.)

We believe our people in Mebane are unusually devoted to their church. Instead of spending time in complaining and wondering why the church doesn't grow faster, they are busy working to make the church grow.

Our church there is telling, too, in its influence on the town. Steadfast, earnest devotion to the church and what the church stands for is bound to tell upon the place fortunate enough to have such devotion.

Bro. Swain has made some noticeable improvements in the parsonage property. He takes his recreation in the use of hammer and saw and spade, and is making his mark. Mrs. Swain and Master John seemed happy in their new surroundings. John is a student in Bingham School, and had invited some of his school-mates to the church service.

We were pleased to learn that Marion Nicholson bore away the beautiful gold medal given for best declamation in the school closing on Saturday night. His younger brothers, Lewis and Murray, received certificates testifying that they had been present every day, and never tardy. One of the teachers is Mrs. McFarland, whose husband, a Methodist Episcopal preacher, died in the pulpit three years ago.

We found the Sunday afternoon prayer meeting still in progress, with a better attendance than it had a year ago. It was started as a young men's meeting, but is now open to all classes. It is an organized prayer meeting, and this helps to keep it going. There is a place for a union prayer-meeting in other small cities and towns, we believe.

There is being prepared near Mebane a resort for certain Greensboro sporting men where they will probably spend Sundays. We were told that they asked Mr. White, of Mebane, to join them in the matter, but that he replied that he was not accustomed to spend his Sundays in that way. This speaks well for Mr. White.

We enjoyed the hospitable home of Bro. J. W. Nicholson and wife during our stay. Bro. Nicholson, like his father, is a builder. He has on his hands now a number of contracts. But his hands are not so full of business that the church is crowded out. He gives the church first place, and is bringing up his children to love the church. The three sons mentioned above are of his family.

—Bro. Bethea writes that his congregations are very encouraging, the best he has had in Granville.

—Are not these glorious days—these bright spring days? Do you appreciate the privilege of seeing them, and are you thankful for them? The world is beautiful in its garb of green. Everywhere God has wrought wondrously.

—The Biederwolf meetings begin tonight (Wednesday) in the warehouse used for the State S. S. Convention. Mr. Biederwolf is an evangelist of good repute and he is accompanied by a personal worker and a band of singers. We hope this effort will be greatly blessed to the good of our city.

—J. Pierpont Morgan's will sets him in a better light before the world. He was a faithful churchman while he lived, but so are many men who are but Pharisees. But in his will Mr. Morgan expresses his belief in the atonement of Jesus Christ, and urged his heirs to defend the doctrine of the atonement. His faith in Christ shines out more brightly in his death than it did in his life, as the world sees.

—President Wilson has sent Mr. Bryan to California to confer with the governor and legislature regarding the proposed alien land law, which offends the Japanese and which they claim violates a treaty made by our government with the Japanese government. The Californians seem determined to restrict Japanese and Chinese immigration to their State, and claim the right to do so. It may require a decision of our Supreme Court to determine their rights in the case.

THE DOCTRINAL CURSE OF THE MOUNTAINS.

To the Ladies of the W. B. H. M., greeting:

Dear Sisters:

As the fatalism of Fetichism makes Africa the dark continent, and the fatalism of Buddhism and Mohamedanism makes India the land of castes and harems, so the fatalism of doctrine makes the mountains a land of feuds, murders, and immorality. For we are what our faiths have made us. The mountaineer is what fatalism has made him. He is a fatalist because of his beliefs—beliefs, drawn with his milk from his mother's breast—beliefs, the outcome of doctrines preached at almost every funeral and almost every mountain meeting for the past hundred years.

It is not the purpose of this paper to enter into a theological discussion of the doctrines of Predestination and Once-in-grace-always-in-grace; but rather to point out the fatalism to which the logical conclusion of these doctrines has been worked out in the mountains; and to point out the disaster wrought to men's souls by this fatalism. I am well aware that the fatalistic interpretation given these doctrines by the Hardshells of the mountains, is not the one given by the Presbyterians, at least, not by their leaders of today. "We are elected by faith," said Dr. Montgomery, President of Muskingum, a United Presbyterian college at New Concord, Ohio.

The Hardshell does not preach it that way. He tells us that, before man was created, God, knowing every man, woman and child to be born into the world, separated the sheep from the goats, so from the beginning, some were predestined to salvation and some to damnation. Thus each man's fate was irrevocably fixed before creation. More than this, every act of his life, also, was as irrevocably fixed, so that a man can only do what is appointed him, or rather, was appointed him before the world was. Beech Hargis killed his father, Judge Hargis the famous feudist. A Hardshell neighbor declared that Beech was born for that very purpose, and that he could not help shooting his father.

Such a deadening, damning doctrine! Is it any wonder that men are indifferent to their soul's welfare, when, without any act of their own, its destiny was fixed before Adam's creation? Of a truth, if this doctrine be true, he can do nothing but wait until God chooses to save him, if indeed he is to be saved. Every act of his has been appointed before hand of God, so what responsibility can he have in matter? This is the doctrine, carried to its logical end. But while it is not so taught everywhere, its leaven is at work, so that men deny all responsibility in accepting Christ. Thus its deadening influence stands in the way of the evangelization of the mountains. Sunday schools are opposed, because as one said, "You can not teach salvation. If Sunday school would only teach morality," he went on, "I would start a Sunday school." Another man objected to them because "Children are taught to pray, and are taught the commandments and taught to obey them." These objections all spring from the belief that man can do nothing towards coming to Christ, that he is powerless so far as salvation is concerned.

"I would like to be a Christian," said a bright young fellow, when I asked him of his soul's welfare, "but I must wait God's time; when he wants me, he will call me." Nor could I say anything to him to make him see that the desire of his heart for better things, was God's call to him, and that God's time is always today. Others will say what's the difference? If I'm to be saved, I'll be saved; if I'm to be lost I'll be lost so what's the difference?" Thus the leaven of fatalism causes men to meet the claims of the gospel with indifference.

Curiously enough, the mountaineer does not accept the doctrine of infant damnation, saying, "I read where Jesus took the children into his arms, but nowhere do I read of him ever setting them down." He fits this into their rredestination theory by saying that a child that is foreordained for hell will live until he commits enough sin to damn him. I heard of one radical saying last summer that such a child could not be killed with a sledge hammer, until he had sinned enough to send him to hell.

The other fatalistic doctrine, Once-in-grace-always-in-grace, which is to the Presbyterian a promise of God's eternal keeping power over his children, is to the Hardshell a license to sin. As a man said to me, "I know I'm a child of God," and he related his experience, while shut in a coal bank by falling slate. "I know," he went on, "that I drink a little and do other things that are not right," and he named over a list of sins, which the Bible says, "He that doeth such things can not enter the kingdom of heaven." "But when I come to die," he said, "Christ will make these things straight for me." Even where the fatalism is rejected, the doctrine prevents men from reaching after holiness. "Oh, I sin a little every day" they say with a complacency that is startling to one that takes seriously Christ's call to perfection.

The fatalism of these doctrines has been one of the strongest chains which has bound the mountaineer in a spiritual darkness so appalling that kindly hearted men can look on immorality, feuds, and even murder without horror. The gloom of this darkness, however, is breaking away before the light shining out from mission Sunday schools where the free gospel is being taught. The mountain preachers of the Free Will Baptists and of our own Methodist Protestants are bearing a worthy part in dispelling the fog of foreordination. Our hope everywhere in the mountains is the strong faith men have in the old Book as the word of God. By holding up its "Whosoevers" and teaching the doctrine of right living and of man's responsibility from its sacred pages, the fatalism of the mountains is gradually losing its hold on the hearts of the mountaineers.

THE PULPIT AND THE "NEW DANCES."

The dance craze has awakened the denunciations of the pulpit, and only a week or two ago the historic rostrum of Henry Ward Beecher, as well as Catholic pulpits in Brooklyn and Montclair, heard those dances condemned. We should not venture to say there was a parallel in the case of giving a dog a bad name and killing him; but anything named a "turkey trot" could not emerge with credit. The Montclair clergyman, the Rev. Father William A. Brothers, declared that "indulgence in the turkey trot, the tango, and other objectionable modern dances is as much violation of the seventh commandment as adultery." Father Brothers, to be sure, admitted he had not seen any of these dances in question, but he knows from the descriptions of them that they are indecent. Both the Catholic clergymen backed their argument by reading an editorial on the subject printed in the New York Sun. Father Donnely, of Brooklyn, enforced the effect of his reading by saying: "Now that does not come from a church paper, that is not from The Catholic Times, nor any other organ of the Church but from a non-sectarian paper, one might call it a pagan paper." If newspapers are "so stirred by the terrible conditions existing," he asks, "what should we of the Church think; what must be the truth; what must be our duty?" The editorial in question was named "The Revolt of Decency," and ran thus:

"That the police authorities of New York should be driven to a close inspection of the many dance halls now open to those whose idle or weak dispositions have drawn them to the miscalled 'new dances' was inevitable. Great as is the popularity of these graceless contortions and numerous tho their practitioners are, there remain a saving intelligence and morality in the community which recognize their significance and loathe their indecency.

"Let the seemingly incredible protestations that innocence and virtue may indulge in these excesses without realization of their origin and meaning be accepted. Politeness and optimism dictate this insult to intelligence. There remains on those possessing knowledge and conscience the inescapable duty of protecting the ignorant and the weak as much form their folly as from the designs of the vicious. The task is to exert every influence to prevent the loss of such ground as has been gained by society in its history-long struggle for moral progress a loss that is inevitable if such dances as are now under consideration are tolerated.

"Far from being 'new,' these dances are a reversion to the grossest practices of savage man. They are based on the primitive motive of the orgies enjoyed by the aboriginal inhabitants of every uncivilized land. Their movements and steps have been described with exactitude by explorers and missionaries to those people we are accustomed to regard as inferior. The culminating extravagances are identical with the ends sought by the benighted heathen, save only that the heathen is redeemed by a frankness of terminology and conduct that has not yet been attained here.

"Preserved through all the ages by the habitues of low resorts, by strumpets and their patrons, these dances have never lost their original reason for existence or been deprived of their appeal to the profligate and the debased. To-day, whether practiced in the lowest brothel or in surroundings more expensive, they retain without change their meaning and are unmodified in their effect. That for a moment persons of respectable antecedents have injudiciously endured their introduction in places where decorum guards chastity has not changed their nature or obscured their menace.

"Official intervention, the blow society instinctively strikes for self-preservation, can do no more than circumscribe the field of sordid exploitation of mankind's basest passions and weakness. Yet, restricted tho the field of its usefulness is, it indicates wide-spread recognition of the necessity of preserving those standards of conduct that irk the reckless,....who in their folly forget that evil communications corrupt good manners."—Literary Digest.

OUR TEXT BOOK.

We want to pass on to you the following noble and significant words of President Wilson. They are worthy of our most careful reading and application.

The only book that can have any possible significance as a text book in the Sunday school is the Bible, and as we must train your children in the rest of the thought of the world, we must, if we are to make progress as a nation, ground each generation as it comes along in the established and tested moral judgments of the world.

The beauty about the Bible is that it is most wholesome, the most perfect, the least morbid picture of life and motives of men in the world. Almost every other book has a streak of morbidness in it, but this book is wholesome and sweet and natural and naif from cover to cover. Here are no dull moralizings; here is the life of man set forth as it was simply lived from generation to generation. I take it that the problem which you would all study for the Sunday school is the biographies and the history of the Old Testament and of the New. I suppose that the Epistles of the New Testament are for the perusal of those who are mature, because in the Epistles is set forth, as it were, the philosophy of the whole thing, the thoughtful reflection based upon the providence of God and the revelation of his Son. The Epistles constitute the theology of the Bible, and the rest of it constitutes the experience of mankind in contact with Divine Providence.

How often does the Bible eulogize the man who masters his own passions. In every circumstance of life, for the child as well as for him who is grown in every day and in every turn of every day, the question is: "Shall we rule our own spirits?" and here set forth in such simple terms that the child may understand it, in the annals of the Holy Scripture, are written the histories of men of every kind, whose glory was that they did master their own spirits, and through the whole thing lies what the Greek tragedies were never able to supply—the key, the thread to the labyrinth, the solution of the problem, the answer to the eternal question.

A Spring Shower.

What is more refreshing and productive of future fruitage than a spring shower. We cannot think of anything that would be more helpful to the Sunday school of the Methodist Protestant church than a spring shower of Teacher Training classes. Sow the seed now of earnest, faithful Teacher Training study and you will reap an abundant harvest in a garden of goodness.

Why not begin your class today. There is no better time. Remember the Board has an excellent book Training the Teacher, paper 35 cts. cloth 50 cts. Send all orders of C. H. Hubbell, Adrian, Mich.

"And the Women."

From all over the country come reports of the activity of the organized classes of women and their value to the Sunday school was never greater than it is today. The Sunday school without an organized class of women lacks a source of strength that every Sunday school in the land should have. One may say, "And the women," when it come to organizating classes of men.

The average woman has more time than the average man for personal service during the week. She can do more calling and there are many things the women's class can do that the men's class cannot do. A class of nearly two hundred women in the writer's own Sunday school bears the name of the 'Ever Ready Class,' and the way in which it has lived up to its name has been a joy to both pastor of the church and the superintendent of the school. To enumerate all of the things it has done would require space more than can here be given. Suffice it to say that the class is so true to its name that both the pastor of the church and the superintendent of the Bible school find it "ever ready" to do anything it is asked to do for the church or Bible school.

Our Board will gladly send free helps for organizing classes. Write today to C. H. Hubbell, Adrian, Michigan.

A Splendid Symposium.

At the North Illinois conference convention, which by the way was a most profitable meeting, the following are some of the definite and practical answers to the question, What the Christian Endeavor Society can do.

Definite work.
Manifest interest in outsiders.
Loyalty to church and pastor.
Invite people to the prayer meeting.
Bible study.
More prayer in the meetings.
Develop latent talent.

The desire in the hearts of the older young people to help the younger young people out.

WORLD'S SUNDAY SCHOOL COMMISSION TO THE ORIENT.—III.

By C. E. Wilbur.

Seen at Haawii.

In our last letter was given a brief account of our reception and gracious treatment at Honolulu. Their own sweet word, "aloha," covering the meaning of our word "welcome," and much more, was full exemplified. We now propose to tell something of the religious conditions as we saw them.

Political and Industrial.

The present religious conditions, opportunities, possibilities and needs can not be understood fully without a brief reference to political and industrial conditions.

When the islands were taken over by the United States and erected into a territory twelve years ago, citizenship went with the flag in part. Every child, of whatever parentage, born in the islands, becomes a United States citizen, and such children, upon reaching the age of twenty-one, may qualify as voters. The fact has a double effect, it has encouraged the emigration to the islands of the more intelligent class of Orientals who hope their children may become citizens, though they themselves may be deprived of the privilege; it has led to strenuous efforts on the part of the territorial government and Christian workers to educate these children, many of whom are now twelve years of age, so that they may become good citizens. These children are numerous, especially of Chinese and Japanese parentage.

When the islands were taken over there were large numbers of Japanese and Chinese there, largely laborers in the sugar plantations. So large were the Japanese interests that Japan was thinking seriously of seizing them. While the resolution to hoist our flag in Hawaii was before Congress, the Japanese warships were training their guns upon the streets of Honolulu, waiting to hear the results from Washington. When the cablegram was received they quietly raised their anchors and steamed away.

At once our laws restricting Oriental emigration were extended to the newly erected territory. Then the sugar planters were forced to seek a new source of supply for the laborers on their rapidly growing plantations. They brought in Filipinos, Spanish, Portuguese, Porto Ricans, Russians and some other Caucasians. Those with the Oriental present—Koreans, Japanese and Chinese—give the greatest variety of nationalities and races.

The Religious Tone.

The social, moral and religious tone of the islands is very high. The missionaries that evangelized the people represented the very highest ideals of New England life in their day, and they kept them steadily before the people. The Pilgrim fathers no more certainly stamped their impression upon the thought and life of New England, and the United States in general, than these noble workers did theirs upon Hawaii. Later comers have largely received these ideals.

Religious Opportunities.

After our visit to Chinatown, San Francisco, and our observation of the work done there for Orientals, we said, "Surely this is the gateway of the Orient." But after seeing Hawaii, we said, "There is no gateway here to obstruct; the road to the Orient is wide open." The opportunities for reaching the people of the East are greater than in San Francisco. First, in San Francisco the people to be reached are huddled together in a "slum" district—in close quarters, making it hard to get near them with the gospel message; while here they are scattered over a wide territory, making them easily accessible. Secondly, a large number of different peoples can be touched, and this, too, of a class important to touch. The governor's last report to the Department of the Interior, just out, shows that there are nearly twice as many men, above twenty-one years of age, as women, showing that there is a large class that does not intend to remain in the country. They stay only for a short time, and long enough to receive the gospel, if proper means are used. Third, the relative number of workers is greater here, compared with those to be reached, and the people in Hawaii are not so completely segregated. The social conditions that exist have, to a large extent, broken down racial prejudices, and all meet more nearly on a scale of social equality.

Educational Work.

The public school work is admirably done, and the islands are fully provided with schools of all grades—primary, secondary, collegiate and industrial. The population is 191,000; thirty thousand of these are in schools of all kinds, making very nearly one out of every six of the population. Fully realizing that before long the citizenship of the islands will be decidedly changed, when these children born since annexation reach the age of twenty-one, the government is making a special effort to prepare them for their duties through education. In this work it is assisted effectively by individual beneficence and denominational activity. The Mid-Pacific Institute and the Bishop school are two of a class of schools that are doing a splendid work for both religion and education.

Christian Work.

The work begun and largely consummated by the early missionaries of the American Board is now carried by the Hawaiian Evangelical Association, a local board that is self-governing. It, however, receives an annual appropriation from the American Board, and is affiliated with the American Missionary Association.

When the provisional government was taken over and the development of the sugar interests necessitated the introduction of large numbers of foreign laborers, the Hawaiian Islands that had been practically evangelized by the missionaries of the American Board, became missionary ground again. It was recognized that the Hawaiian Association should not be expected to meet the demand of the new situation single-handed. Other denominations went to their assistance, notably the Episcopal and the Methodist Episcopal; and for physical equipment, mental attainment and spiritual power, it would be hard to find the superior of the Hawaiian churches and workers.

Sunday School Work.

The organized work of the Sunday school is done in a measure in connection with the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor. Semi-annual and annual conventions are held in which the schools and societies cooperate. These are held a solid week on account of the difficulty of getting together frequently, and they are veritable powerhouses of inspiration to the young people.

The territorial Sunday school workers seem to be fully aware of the special needs of their peculiar situation. The large number of males on the islands, to which reference has already been made, has led to special efforts to reach the men, and there has always been a large proportion of men in their Sunday schools. The adult organized class they find in the line of their need, and to this they are giving special attention.

This excess of males to be reached has made a demand for teachers, and at present a special effort is being made to encourage teacher-training. For some years teacher-training has been conducted by the Central Union Church in Honolulu; but feeling a necessity for a larger work of this kind, the Hawaiian Association has appointed Rev. H. P. Juad to be superintendent of teacher-training throughout the island. He will hold conventions and institutes, and, no doubt, will have the co-operation of the other
